I shall undertake to show, in a few words, that neither of these reasons is founded in fact. In the first place, every provision of the law of 1800 is in full force in regard to discipline in the Navy except that part which authorizes flogging; and if gentlemen will turn their attention to that subject, I think that those who desire the most rigid discipline will find their anxiety amply satisfied in that law. The third article of that act provides that—

"Any officer, or other person in the Navy, who shall be guilty of oppression, cruelty, fraud, profane swearing, drunkenness, or any other scandalous conduct tending to the destruction of good morals, shall, if an officer, be cashiered, or suffer such other punishment as a court-martial shall adjudge; if a private, shall be put in irons, or flogged at the discretion of the captain, not exceeding twelve lashes; but if the offense require severer punishment, he shall be tried by a court-martial, and suffer such punishment as said court shall inflict."

Thus we see that under the law of 1800 a captain still retains the power to, and can of his own volition, put a man in irons for misconduct; and by the fourteenth and fifteenth articles it is provided as follows:

"ART. 14. No officer or private in the Navy shall disobey the lawful orders of his superior officer, or strike him, or draw or offer to draw, or raise any weapon against him, while in the execution of the duties of his office, on pain of death, or such other punishment as a court-martial shall inflict."

"ART. 15. No person in the Navy shall quarrel with any other person in the Navy, nor use provoking or reproachful words, gestures, or menaces, on pain of such punishment as a court-martial shall adjudge."

In the face of all these provisions which run from putting a man in irons up to taking his life, it is said here that there is no power to secure discipline in the Navy, and gentlemen rise up here and say, that the fleet which is about to sail for Japan cannot go without endangering the lives of the commanders of the vessels—unless Congress, in thirty minutes, pass this law. I think I have shown by the law that this part of the argument is an error. I learn from the relatives of one of the officers about to sail upon that same expedition, that it is not expected it will leave before June, and he telegraphed some time since for his wife to come on to New York and stay with him until that time.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I would like to state, if the gentleman will allow me, that I was reported as having said, in the debate the other day, that this expedition was to leave on last Wednesday. I stated that a part of the expedition was to leave at that time. I had seen Commodore Perry a few days before, and he said he himself would not leave for a month or more. I did not state that the whole expedition was about to leave. I know that a part will not leave for a month.

Mr. STUART. Then the argument used upon that occasion, that unless the bill was passed, it would be exceedingly difficult to get the law into the possession of the officers of the fleet, so as to be of any service to them, was groundless, because if the Commodore was not to leave until the first of June, nothing would be lost, for he is the man to have the law. The argument falls to the ground in any event. I propose to look at this question for a few minutes in a twofold point of view; first, as to the power of Congress to pass such law; and in the next place, as to the policy of passing them, conceding the power.

There are several provisions in the Constitution of the United States which bear upon this question; and although, sir, I am aware that a difference of opinion exists among gentlemen in reference to their construction, it is for that very reason I wish to put forth my own opinions, and I hope, with all becoming modesty. Yet, sir, I do most respectfully ask the attention of every member of this House to those provisions, which I think will induce them, if not to agree with me upon their construction, at least to agree with me upon the question of policy. The power of Congress to make all the necessary regulations in the Constitution is provided for in these words:

"To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces."

Then, sir, in reference to the punishment of crimes, there are several provisions which, in my judgment, should be looked at with regard to some of the provisions in the bill before us. The first of these provisions is as follows:

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed, but when not committed within any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed."

By the fifth article of the Amendments to the Constitution it is provided that—

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger."

Now, sir, I know it is said that these words, "in time of war or public danger," are limited in their application to the militia, and that they have no application to the words "land or naval forces." But, sir, I submit that by no rule of grammatical construction can this interpretation prevail; and I also submit that upon no ground of necessity ought it to be adopted. We can very readily perceive, Mr. Speaker, that when the Army and the Navy are engaged in time of war, or great public danger, infinite difficulties might arise if the civil power, at the pleasure of all the civil officers authorized to exercise it, might send process into the Army and Navy to be executed, and thus interfere with and embarrass the movements and the discipline of that Army or Navy, which the Constitution and laws have placed under the direction of the President of the United States and the subordinate officers. But let me ask, if in time of peace a regiment of soldiers is stationed at Detroit, or at any other post within the United States, and one of the soldiers composing that regiment commits an infamous crime, in the language of the Constitution, what reason, what public necessity is there for deciding that that crime should not be tried by the civil authorities? Sir, there is none. And I say, if this were a new question, and if there had been no enactments under it, I should insist, and insist with confidence, that the trial for a crime committed within the United States, or within any of the States, would not be by a court-martial, and could not be disposed of in any other way than that pointed out by the Constitution. But, sir, if we are not estopped by the Constitution from this sort of legislation, let us look at the necessity. For fifty years, sir, this law has been in force, to which I have just called the attention of the House, and there has been nothing subtracted from it at the end of half a century, excepting the power to flog. Now, I ask by what process of reasoning, by what evidence of facts, are gentlemen authorized to come in here and assert, that the taking away of that power to flog has destroyed all discipline in the Navy, and left it afloat at the mercy of the men?

It has been said, sir, that those who object to the restoration of that power, and those who object to some provisions still more enormous, are exercising a sickly sentimentality, and that it is of the same character as that which sympathizes and mourns over the fate of the culprit in all cases. Mr. Speaker, I shall never be deterred from propriety of action here on account of any such charge as that; and if you will show me a man, sir, who has no sympathy whatever with his fellow-creature, let his misfortunes be what they may, you will show me a man with whom I do not desire to associate. My idea of the enforcement of the law is, to enforce it with feeling, with sympathy, and with mercy. It is enforced as a stern, imperative duty; and I should fear a man upon the bench of any court in this Union, more than I should fear the most ferocious of beasts in the forest, who was administering the law with feelings of vengeance, destitute of sympathy. This argument, sir, that our Navy cannot exist, that now floats upon every sea, and that it is to be at the mercy of pirates, in the persons of your own sailors, if flogging is not reestablished, or some other punishment equally enormous, is a stereotyped argument. Oceans of crocodile tears have been shed in times gone by, whenever the Legislature has attempted to move one inch from barbarity. Who does not remember, sir, that in every State where the attempt to abolish imprisonment for debt has been made, that it was denounced as but another means for destroying all the property and credit in the world? You could collect no debts; every man would turn scoundrel; every man in the community would be a monster in human shape, an arrant villain, if you did not retain the power to incarcerate him in prison, because he could not pay his debts.

periment has been tried of abolishing capital punishment, the very same argument has been used; and yet facts will clearly show, where the trial has been made a sufficient length of time, that crime, so far from being increased by that act, if it is affected by it at all, (but in my judgment it is not,) is decreased. You may go through the whole list, sir, and I say, and repeat it again, you cannot find a single instance where the Legislature has sought to progress from barbarity, and strike out some provision of punishment, incident to savage life only, when there have not been men enough to rise up and say that ruin would be the inevitable consequence of such an act. But, as I said before, all this will not deter me; for so long as this statute contains within it the power to punish men, even unto taking their lives for disregard of duty in the Navy, I shall treat all those cries of impending necessity as being cries founded upon something other than necessity. And now, sir, as to the question of policy. What does this bill propose to do? Why, sir, it proposes to confer upon a single man—and I call the particular attention of the House to the importance of this—it proposes to confer upon a single man the power to be accuser, witness, judge, and executioner, at his own pleasure; and upon what plan?

If we were now about to pass a law to confer that power, in civil cases, upon any man, what would be the character of the man we should select to carry it out? If we were about to enact a law, clothing any man with that power in civil jurisprudence, what manner of man should we select, to confer this authority upon? I say, sir, that we should inquire, throughout this Union, for the wisest and purest man living; but in this case, it is proposed to confer that power upon a man in the Navy, who is a man of accident—a man who comes up to a position, not from merit, but by regular gradation. You give such a man the power to be accuser, witness, and executioner; you give him the power to place his fellow-man in double-irons for thirty days, on bread and water, if he can get the surgeon, who is also under his own power and authority, to certify that, in his opinion, the man can survive the enormity. Now, I do not know but I shall vote for such a provision as that; but it will be under some stronger and stranger argument than any I have heard yet. The gentleman from North Carolina, now occupying the chair, announced to the House, the other day, that he did not intend to help the members who had defeated this bill out of their difficulties. I am obliged to the gentleman, as much as if he had expressed his intention to help us out, if we were in any difficulty. If I had voted for such a bill as this; if I had voted against the protest of the chairman of the committee, who wanted to amend it, I might think myself placed in some difficulty; but, so long as I voted against it—and for such as I conceive to be good reasons—I do not apprehend myself in any difficulty at all. I do not feel that there is any difficulty at all, and, therefore, I do not ask any gentleman to help me out of it. But, as I said before, while it will be found by those who will take the pains to make the acquaintance of all the gentlemen in this House, that they are as intelligent, as courteous, and as prudent a set of men as ever assembled upon this floor, it will also be found that they are as independent; that they act upon their own opinions, and while they will oblige you in any courteous; application for your benefit, or that of your State, or locality, they will never be flattered or dragged into any measure that does not meet their individual approbation.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] remarked, that in his State, a justice of the peace had the power to send an individual to prison, and, in some cases, to put him in the stocks; and that whenever he did that, all the people said "Amen." Upon an occasion, sir, when something was said about putting all things under the feet, the Apostle said: "It is manifest that he is excepted who putteth all things under his feet"—or substantially that, sir.

Now, sir, I suppose in the Old North State, when a man was put in the stocks, and all the people cried Amen, it was equally manifest that he was excepted who was so put into the stocks. Now, although I do not admire the logic any more than the taste, which brings forward an argument to show that law is necessary here because it prevails in a State; and although I cannot indorse it, yet I must be permitted to say that this is only a verification of that declaration of wisdom which we find incorporated in the Declaration of Independence, that "mankind are disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, rather than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed."

Sir, if you were to go into the State to which I belong, and propose, as a member of the Legislature, a law conferring upon the highest judicial power of the State authority to place a man in the stocks, and then go home and ask to be voted for for reelection, you could not find a man who would either vote for you or respect you; and yet I consider that that argument is not of very much value here.

Now, sir, not belonging to that class of men who think it best to have all temples pulled down, I propose to suggest where I think the remedy in this case should begin. I make it as a suggestion, not because I hope that Congress, at this day, will carry it out, but because I hope that Congress will this day begin to carry into the Navy of the United States that species of wise humanity which, at no distant day, will elevate it to the standard that it ought to occupy.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] told us that our sailors are made up of all the jail-birds and scape-graces of the world, and that to suppose that such men could be kept in order without whaling them, and ironing them, was a supposition not only bordering upon the ridiculous, but was the very sublimity of ridiculousness.

Now, sir, is it supposed that we are to continue a policy which brings into our Navy all the scape-graces, jail-birds, robbers, and pirates in the world, to pay those men their wages out of the Treasury of the United States, and then pay our officers for spending their time in flogging, and ironing, and starving them? In my judgment it is much wiser to pursue a policy which will rid the Navy of that kind of men—to strike at this evil at its very foundation. And as a means—so far as my humble judgment goes—and I intend, as I said before, not to impose it upon this House in anything but a very modest form—I would raise the wages of our sailors to a point which will secure American citizens. When you bring into the service of the Navy of the United States American citizens, you will find what you found when you brought your volunteers into the war with Mexico—you will find a man who has a character at stake, a man who has pride, who has personal respect, and a man who will not only discharge his duty in time of peace, but will fight as long as he finds himself alive, when there is an enemy to be fought in time of war. That is the point to strike at. Then, sir, I would strike at the system by which men hold office in the Navy. Instead of bringing a man up in all cases by grade, I would elevate him by merit; instead of keeping men in the service, with no power on earth to get rid of them, who have no business there, I would provide means for quietly sliding such men out of the way as are worse than useless. Give the power of selection; let our ships be commanded by wise, skillful, prudent, humane men; let our sailors be composed of such men as you would employ yourself in your own business, and you will have no necessity for flogging a man, or double-ironing him, or keeping him on bread and water for thirty days. These are my views, in brief, upon this subject.

Now, sir, I understand that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] intends to offer a substitute for this bill; and although it does not come up to my views of what ought to be done, I shall have no difficulty in supporting it. If I correctly understand it, it is better than the law of 1800, to which I have called the attention of the House. It is more humane. It takes from the bill which is now before us, those arbitrary powers in the hands of a single man—that man, as I said, selected by accident, and not for merit, to wield those powers, and like the law of 1800, leaves them in the hands of courts martial. On this point I concur entirely with the gentleman from Virginia. I expressed myself so the other day, and I cannot let gentlemen here place me in a false position. I am willing now, to-day, to vote to reconsider the vote by which this bill was defeated, and to give the House—so far as my vote goes—the fullest opportunity to proceed upon the consideration of this subject, carefully. I am willing to make all necessary concessions to support, as far as the little power which I possess goes, a bill which shall give as complete discipline to the Navy as it is possible to give, until the suggestions which I have made shall be carried out, and you reach this evil at its very foundation; for I am willing to venture a prediction to-day, that this evil never will be overcome until you take measures to secure such men as need no flogging, because they have character and self-respect to take care of, and sustain.

Now, sir, in illustration of the point which I am now upon, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] very happily, historically, but very unfortunately for his argument, told us that the men who fought on board the "Constitution" were officers—that the crew was chiefly made up of officers. Mr. Speaker, that is the reason why that glorious victory was won. Do you suppose that if, instead of that sort of a crew, jail birds from all God's creation had composed it, that action could have been thus brilliantly fought and won? No, sir, experience comes in to sustain the theory that if you are to have an efficient Navy, it must be a high-minded and an honorable Navy.

Now, sir, there is another thing that found its way into this bill, and constituted not only one of the emergencies, but probably constituted the only emergency for pressing it through the House under the power of the previous question, and endeavoring to force it down our throats, and that is the pension provision in it. And, sir, it is a little remarkable to me, that certain gentlemen could have so miraculously changed their tone of argument. One would have supposed, when those gentlemen were taunting us with entertaining "a sickly sentimentality," that they constituted that portion of mankind so accurately described in the psalm:

"Who know what's right, nor only so,
But always practice what they know."

And yet they turned around upon us in an instant, and told us that it was monstrous that we should object to paying the poor sailor, after he had been twenty years in the service, and placing him on the pension list. Now, I do not know why a man should be pensioned for the length of time he has been in service. We have got no such principle in our law of pensions. We have never yet adopted any such principle, and I can see no reason why we should. We give men pensions who have been injured in the service in health, or limb, or both. Men enter the Navy at fifteen years old; they stay twenty years, and if their health is good, they are in the very prime of life; and yet you propose to give them pensions. You propose, also, to give them three months' extra pay. Well, I do not object to that, if you cannot do better. I would rather give the men extra pay every month, for the purpose, as I said before, of securing the very best men. But if that cannot be done, I will give the man extra pay who has done well, and behaved himself in the service of the Navy of the United States.

But I ask, again, for what reason—upon what principle of public policy—will you pension a man simply in regard to the time he has been in the service, without any regard to his necessity? Sir, in my judgment, there is no reason, and it only goes to show what mere quackery in legislation will sometimes lead gentlemen to propose. Instead of striking at the root of this evil—instead of cutting this thing up from the bottom, and placing men in the service who have reputation and character sufficient to induce them to behave themselves, you propose to spend your time in hammering, beating, and bruizing a part, and putting the rest on pensions.

Now, sir, having done all I desired to do; having stated briefly the reasons which induced my opposition to this bill, and why I think there is no immediate, pressing necessity for anything that is temporary and partial in its character, I propose to leave the subject, with a simple declaration, which is, that there is an existing necessity for conferring somewhere, upon some committee—and I think it most properly belongs to the Committee on Naval Affairs—not only the power, but imposing upon them the duty, to revise and remodel the whole system connected with the discipline, rank, place, and pension, in the Navy; to sweep from it all that does not belong there; to provide for raising up officers of merit, and for turning out those who are a disgrace to it; for elevating the character of the officers, and for elevating the character of the sailors; and for placing the Navy of the United States in the same relative position with the other navies of the world, which the people of the United States now occupy with regard to the people of other nations. Then, and not till then, do I believe you will have a Navy such as shall be needed for efficiency whenever the occasion shall demand.

Mr. MILLSON. As this motion to reconsider has been fully discussed, and as I believe there is a general concurrence upon all sides as to the propriety of reconsidering the vote by which this bill was rejected, and as I propose—as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] has stated, if the House shall reconsider that vote—to introduce a substitute for the whole bill, upon which any further discussion that may be necessary may take place, I now demand the previous question.

The previous question then received a second.

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio. Will it be in order now to move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. CABLE. I make that motion.

Mr. MILLSON. I rise to a question of order. I ask of the Chair whether the previous question has not been seconded?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. MILLSON. Then I submit that a vote must be taken on ordering the main question before the gentleman can move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that a motion to lay upon the table is always in order before the decision has been announced by the Chair.

The question was then put, and decided in the negative.

So the motion to reconsider was not laid upon the table.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

The question was then taken, and the vote by which the bill was rejected was reconsidered.

Mr. MILLSON. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading.

The question was taken, and the vote was reconsidered.

Mr. STUART. It is necessary, also, as I understand it, to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. Certainly not. That was exhausted when the question was put upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. STUART. It was decided by the Speaker, the other day, that it must be reconsidered.

Mr. STANTON. I insist that it is unnecessary.

The SPEAKER. It has been the practice of the House heretofore to reconsider such motions.

The question was then taken, and the vote by which the previous question was ordered was reconsidered.

Mr. MILLSON then obtained the floor.

Mr. BRIGGS. I ask the gentleman to yield in order to enable me to move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MILLSON. I cannot yield for that purpose.

Mr. Speaker, when I made the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House rejected this bill, I did not suppose that it would involve the responsibility of any further action on my part. I am not especially familiar with the subject of naval affairs. I have not the honor to occupy a place upon the Naval Committee, and I did not suppose that more would be expected of me in reference to any future action of the House than from any other member of the majority which defeated this bill. Learning, however, from some members of the Naval Committee that if the subject were recommitted to them, they probably would not alter their action upon it; and wishing the House to have the opportunity of giving effect to what seemed to be the views of a decided majority, I voluntarily assumed the responsibility of preparing a substitute, which I shall presently offer for the consideration of the House. I by no means suppose that this substitute will remedy all the defects existing in our naval establishment, nor remove the objections which for fifty years past have been urged against the articles of war, by which this branch of our service has been regulated. I design it merely for the present emergency. I intend it only as a substitute for the bill introduced by the Committee on Naval Affairs, which recently passed the Senate for the especial purpose of enforcing discipline in the naval service. I concur entirely in the sentiment expressed by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART], that much will still remain to be done; and he will entitle himself to the gratitude of his country who will undertake the great work of reforming the code regulating our naval establishment.

The substitute which I shall offer is founded, in a great measure, though not exclusively, upon a bill prepared, as I understand, by a board of naval officers that met in the city of Washington some twelve or eighteen months ago, and which passed the Senate during the last session of the Thirty-first Congress. That bill was again reported to the Senate by the Committee on Naval Affairs, during the present session of Congress; and I am very much inclined to suspect that the Senate, when they passed the bill which came to us a few days ago, supposed they had only reenacted that bill which had received their almost unanimous sanction and approbation at the last session of Congress. This bill was called up by a member of the Naval Committee in the Senate, as the same that had passed that body unanimously, and he proposed certain amendments, which the Committee on Naval Affairs had instructed him to offer. These amendments, however, entirely changed the whole character of the bill, leaving scarcely a single feature of the original bill remaining. The substitute, then, which I have framed, incorporates nearly all the provisions of the original Senate bill that I deemed valuable. There are some verbal and some substantial alterations I have thought proper to make, to which I shall presently invite the attention of the House. Before I enter upon an explanation of my own proposition, however, permit me to say a word as to the character of the House bill, or rather the Senate bill, which was rejected by this House a few days ago.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] has very properly said that all the powers proposed to be conferred by this bill are given to the commanding officer. But he did not state what was the character of the power it proposes to confer.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, announcing the passage of sundry bills by that body.]

Mr. M. continued. I will call the attention of the House to some of the extraordinary provisions of this bill. They are not only arbitrary, but utterly vague and indefinite. It proposes to confer upon any commanding officer of a vessel, not only a captain, as stated by the gentleman from Michigan, but upon any commanding officer, the power to diminish the rations of petty officers and others of inferior ratings. Diminish them how much? Sailors' rations are regulated by law. The law prescribes the quantity to be distributed to each man. How much is the commanding officer to be permitted to diminish the ration of the sailor? It proposes to give to the commanding officer the power to restrict the sailor to a diet of bread and water. How long? There is no limitation upon the power of the commanding officer thus to restrict him. And this bill would, therefore, confer upon every commanding officer the extraordinary power to restrict the diet of the sailor to bread and water during a whole cruise of three years. If there be any restraint upon his authority in this respect, it certainly is not to be found in this bill. It also confers upon the commanding officer power to discharge from the service, with a bad-conduct discharge, any petty officer or sailor. Where there is no limitation to the power to discharge the sailor, and for ought this bill contains, such discharges may take place upon the coast of Africa, or in some other desert, unfrequented, and inhospitable part of the world, where the sailor may be left to perish.

I will not say anything now about the extraordinary power given to punish by solitary confinement for thirty days, in double-irons, and on bread and water. I expressed my views upon this subject a few days since. But, sir, though bad begins, yet worse remains behind. This bill authorizes any commanding officer in the Navy not only to inflict the several punishments which I have mentioned, but it gives him authority to impose them all together, for it expressly states that "the commander of any vessel in the Navy, or of any shore station, shall have authority to 'punish offences committed by petty officers, and persons of inferior ratings, by any one or more of the following punishments.'" Hence, if any petty officer shall be so unfortunate as to incur the displeasure of his commander; if he shall be guilty of some real or fancied incivility; if he shall in any way be so unhappy as to stir up the vindictive passions of the person set to command him, see the extent of punishment authorized by this bill to be inflicted upon him by that commanding officer. He may, after having adjudged the case, and pronounced the culprit guilty, address him in these words: "I sentence you to be reduced from your post of petty officer. You shall, moreover, forfeit three months of your pay"—a sum amounting in some cases, perhaps, to sixty or seventy-five dollars—"you shall then suffer confinement for two months from this day; at the expiration of that period, you shall be placed in solitary confinement for thirty days; at the end of that time you shall be kept in solitary confinement in double-irons for thirty days more; at the expiration of that term you shall remain in solitary confinement in double-irons, upon bread and water, for a further period of thirty days; and then you shall be discharged with a bad-conduct discharge, in some remote and inhospitable part of the world." Such might be the sentence, though it is not likely that this would be the language used to convey it. Now, I ask the gentlemen who support this bill, could they have understood these monstrous provisions when they gave their votes? My friend [Mr. BOCKOCK] says there are no such provisions.

Mr. BOCKOCK, (interrupting.) I would ask the House to hear me upon this subject at a future time. The gentleman tells us that a man may be put into solitary confinement for something like three months, when there is in the bill an express clause saying that it shall not extend beyond thirty days.

Mr. MILLSON. No, sir; not so.

Mr. BOCKOCK. "Provided no such confinement shall continue more than thirty days."

Mr. MILLSON. That refers to solitary confinement in irons, upon bread and water, and to each distinct and separate punishment by solitary confinement. But I stated in my enumeration of punishments, that they are cumulative, and that each separate punishment could be inflicted in its order, no one of them extending beyond thirty days—the punishment by solitary confinement for thirty days; solitary confinement in double-irons for thirty days; and solitary confinement in double-irons upon bread and water for thirty days. Each of these different punishments may be added to the original sentence. But to make this matter perfectly clear, I call the attention of my friend—and I am glad to know that he has expressed the views which he has just now intimated, for I know too well the generous impulses of his heart to suppose that he did not understand this bill, as he declares he does, he would never have given it his sanction—I would call the attention of my friend to the provision in the Senate bill, for which this is a substitute, in which it was expressly said, "And such commanding officer may combine any two of these punishments, at his discretion." That was the language of the original bill. The amendment of the Senate, however, strikes out this provision which limits the punishments to "any two," and gives him the authority to inflict any one or more of these punishments at his discretion. And all this is to be done without requiring any record to be kept; without demanding that the testimony upon which the culprit was found guilty shall be reduced to writing, or that the punishment itself shall be reported to the Navy Department. I ask, are these powers such as ought to be confided by a republican Government to any one man living? Sir, I have no hesitation in saying, that so far as I am informed, there is not a naval establishment in the world, in which these arbitrary powers are possessed by the highest officers in it; and I think I might say, without exaggeration, there are not ten men in the whole of Europe, even including those absolute monarchs whose will stands in the place of law, who possess such authority as is proposed to be conferred by a republican Congress upon subordinate officers in your Navy.

Now, I do not say all this by way of reproach to the committee who reported this bill. Very far from it. I know they did not put that construction upon the bill which I have given it. I am ready to believe that if they supposed it conferred the powers which necessarily result from it, they never would have given it their sanction. But I ask gentlemen on the other side, who have lamented the defeat of this bill, and the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE,] who supposed that the majority, in rejecting it, had gotten themselves into a difficulty, from which he would not assist to extricate them—I ask them, if any gentleman has got himself into difficulty, on this subject, upon which side of the question will he be found? The bill was hastily examined, and imperfectly understood, or I am confident it would not have received the approbation of one fifth of those who gave it their vote.

It may be said, however, that these powers will probably not be abused by the officers of our Navy. Perhaps not. I do not think they would often be abused. I have the pleasure of an intimate acquaintance with very many gentlemen of the Navy. Among them I reckon many of my most valued friends. I know their good qualities; I admire their generosity of disposition, and I bear cheerful testimony to those virtues which have endeared so many of them, and the institution to which they belong, to the American people. I have not said one word about tyranny or cruelty, although the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] was really eloquent a few days since in defending the officers of the Navy against attacks which certainly, so far as I heard, no gentleman has made against them.

But still the question is, ought such powers to be conferred upon any one man, in the blind confidence that they will not be abused? Are not we jealous, and, as a republican people, ought we not to be jealous, of conferring authority, unrestricted and unlimited? How, then, if these be the features of the bill, can the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] say, that its rejection was the offspring of a misdirected philanthropy? The gentleman himself, on several occasions during this debate, was pleased to say that he did not approve the provisions of this bill, but that he thought it not greatly wrong, and preferred to take it, rather than there should be no discipline in the Navy. It was because the Congress of the United States were unwilling to confer too much discretion upon any commanding officer of the Navy, and not so much, perhaps, on account of their repugnance to the mode of punishment, that they abolished flogging altogether. They considered that the power to inflict stripes upon any man in the naval service, was too great to be confided to any one person. Now, Mr. Speaker, upon that subject, my views do not greatly differ from those of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] himself. He would not restore the punishment of flogging, except upon the condition it should be adjudged by a naval court-martial. If restored, however, it should be reserved for crimes or offenses of an infamous nature, some of which are still punishable in this mode in several of the States. But I confess my repugnance to the application of this species of punishment to trivial breaches of discipline, involving no depravity of heart, and but little moral culpability.

The gentleman said that very many of the good sailors of the Navy themselves prefer the restoration of flogging. I do not know how the fact may be, but I am not much disposed to contest the point. I think it exceedingly probable that some of the sailors do prefer the restoration of the lash; but it was not because of the presumed wishes of the sailors that Congress abolished this mode of punishment; and I do not think very much regard will be paid to their wishes in respect to its restoration. The people of France have recently expressed their willingness that Louis Napoleon should be their master; but we are not likely to become enamored of the despotic system which prevails there, because it has been established with the consent of the people. No, sir, we ought to give such laws to our Navy as shall bear a relation to the genius of our Government—as shall be in harmony with the principles of our republican institutions; and in providing these laws, we are not necessarily bound to consult the preferences of those, if there be any, whose sensibilities have been blunted by the very system of punishments which they may wish to restore.

Within a few days past I received a pamphlet, entitled "The Naval Institutions of a Republic." Its author is Dr. Wood, a distinguished surgeon of the Navy. I will read from it a short extract, illustrating some of the views I have endeavored to present:

"The population of a republican navy consists of the efficient power of the crews, or men, and officers to direct and control it; both equally citizens of the commonwealth which they serve, in different but associated capacities. The arrangements should be such as would secure, in all grades, the best talent, and mental and physical energies, which the country can produce. The relations between these grades, their dependence one upon the other, should be just that which would best accomplish the national purpose, for which the Navy is organized and paid, and in nothing should the one be made tributary to the personal pride and arrogance of the other. Definite laws should protect the rights of the inferior, or commanded class, and restrict the exercise of the controlling power to its legitimate use."

The substitute, Mr. Speaker, which I propose to offer, provides for the establishment of summary courts-martial for the purpose of trying all of those offenses deserving greater punishment than a commanding officer is now authorized to inflict of his own authority, and yet not sufficiently severe to require a general court-martial; it directs that these summary courts-martial shall consist of not less than three commissioned officers; and in this particular it differs from the plan originally adopted by the Senate. That bill proposed, that when three commissioned officers could not be had, officers of or above the grade of passed midshipman, might be detailed as members of the court. I have thought it best to confine the court in all cases to commissioned officers.

I propose that all testimony given before that court shall be given under oath or affirmation, and shall be delivered in the presence of the party accused, who shall be allowed to interrogate the witness. No such provision was expressly made in the original Senate bill. I then propose, sir, to give to this summary court-martial the power to inflict any one of the punishments named in the substitute, according to the nature and degree of the offense, and not any one or more. I have thought that in reference to a discharge from the service, a bad-conduct discharge—

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question in regard to that? I will preface my remarks, Mr. Speaker, with this statement, if the gentleman will allow me. If it were possible, in my judgment, to organize a court summary, or of any other sort, upon the quarter-deck of a ship, so as to inflict this punishment, under the circumstances when it is necessary to inflict it, I should be as ready as any other gentleman upon this floor to vote for such an arrangement. Now, I ask that gentleman, whether, in organizing these courts, according to his bill, he intends to give the sailor a right to a fair trial? I inquire of him whether he intends to give the right to the sailor of cross-examining, and calling up, as many witnesses as he pleases? and whether it would be possible, with this arrangement, by which the sailor should have all the rights which belong to a citizen before a court-martial, to maintain discipline in the Navy in those emergencies which this bill was intended to meet?

Mr. MILLSON. I respond to the inquiry of the gentleman, and answer that it is most unquestionably the object of the substitute to secure to the sailor a fair trial; and though the gentleman thinks such a trial cannot be secured upon the quarter-deck of a ship, yet I beg leave to suggest to him, that the very bill which originally contained this provision, was framed by a board of officers, as I understand, (I do not mean to say they acted officially, though I believe they did,) convened in the city of Washington, some twelve or eighteen months ago; and they saw no such difficulty as that which the gentleman imagines.

Again: I take the opportunity of saying that I have conversed with very many officers of the Navy, and they desire the establishment of such a tribunal as this; and so much had I at heart the establishment of this summary court-martial, that two years ago, when the punishment by flogging was abolished in the Navy, I endeavored in vain, on two or three occasions, to offer an amendment by which that object might be secured. I mean the establishment of the summary court-martial.

The honorable gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLEY,] over the way, will perhaps remember that I then submitted to him an amendment which I had at that time prepared, for the purpose of offering it, if I could have had an opportunity of doing so; but the debate having been closed on the bill, except under the five minutes rule, which allowed no discussion of anything but pending amendments, I never had it in my power to submit it. I state to the gentleman from Tennessee, that it is not so impracticable as he supposes to organize a summary court-martial. Whence the necessity for the summary court-martial? It proceeds altogether from the difficulty of convening a general court-martial. For what purpose is a summary court-martial to be organized? The authority given to a commanding officer, as the gentleman from Michigan has already demonstrated, is sufficiently great to enable him to correct those ordinary offenses which involve a simple breach of discipline; and it is only for those offenses which require serious investigation that even a summary court-martial is necessary at all.

But, sir, while cases of this kind frequently occur on ship-board, yet if the vessel, though without the limits of the United States, be not attached to a squadron, and there be no officer authorized to convene a general court-martial, or if the vessel be in some distant part of the United States—on the Pacific coast, for instance—where only the Secretary of the Navy could convene a general court-martial, no trial can be now had, except after great delay. The object of this provision, then, is to give to the commanding officer the power to avoid all those delays, by convening a summary court-martial, to consist of three commissioned officers; and most unquestionably I would secure, in a trial before a summary court-martial, all those rights and privileges which are essential to the inquiry whether the accused be guilty or not guilty of the offense laid to his charge. The right to summon his witnesses should unquestionably be secured to him, for it would be a mockery, indeed, to convene a court-martial for the purpose of determining the guilt or innocence of the accused, and yet deny him the privilege of summoning the witnesses who may testify on his behalf, and even of cross-examining those brought forward by the prosecutor.

Sir, the summary court-martial is analogous to that provision in our Army, by which a garrison court-martial may be convened, by order of the colonel commanding the regiment. The powers of the garrison court-martial are not as broad and general as those bestowed by law on the general court-martial, and so I do not propose to give to the summary court-martial the same extent of jurisdiction which is now vested by law in a general naval court-martial. The punishments, then, to be inflicted by the summary court-martial are, discharge from the service with bad-conduct discharge, provided, however, that no person shall be discharged in a foreign country without the approval of the commanding officer of the squadron to which the person discharged may be attached. I think that a wholesome and necessary restriction, preventing the commanding officer from leaving in some solitary part of the world any unfortunate man who might have incurred his displeasure. I do not say that any commanding officer would so abuse his authority. I do not think it at all likely that any one would do it. I am not considering the subject in that point of view; but it would be degrading to the feelings of any man in the Navy of the United States to know that the laws had vested such authority in his commanding officer, whether he might be disposed to exercise it or not. You have many humane commanders in the Navy, but it is possible that now and then you might find a tyrant. The continuity of Trajan and the Antonines might be sometimes broken by a Commodus.

Solitary confinement in irons is one of the provisions of this bill, but not exceeding thirty days. In other words, I retain the punishments contained in the bill recently rejected, modifying one of them, however, only to the extent of not allowing a confinement on bread and water, to be accompanied with a confinement in double-irons. I omit, also, the punishment of the ball and chain. The remaining provisions in the bill do not greatly vary from the bill reported to the House by the Committee on Naval Affairs. I have, however, stricken out all that portion of the Senate bill—I speak now of the original Senate bill, which passed that body at the last session of Congress—that gave authority to the commanding officer, to punish by solitary or other confinement. I do not deem that necessary, because my friend from Michigan [Mr. STUART] has already well shown that these powers are at this time within the discretion of the commanding officer. The power to impose extra police and other duty, I omit, because that also is with the commanding officer at the present time. The right to withhold permission to leave the ship on liberty is also given to the captain by the existing law.

I do not, then, by this substitute, confer upon the commanding officer, any additional power, or rather the powers specifically mentioned here, because, in point of fact, it would not except in two cases, be conferring any new authority upon him, and in these cases I confess I am unwilling to give him any such power, and that is the power to diminish the rations of the sailor, and to restrict his diet to bread and water. I prefer to leave the commanding officer to the exercise of the authority vested in him, as my friend from Michigan [Mr. STUART] has so clearly shown by the act of 1800; and I will not consume the time of the House by repeating his argument, although I had brought the book with me for that purpose. By the articles of war adopted in 1800, he has all this authority already, and the difference between that authority so conferred in general terms by the act of 1800, and the special authority proposed to be conferred by this bill is this, that where this power is now exercised by the commanding officer to put the sailor in solitary confinement, or in irons, it is exercised at his own peril, and upon his responsibility to the military and civil tribunals of the country. I prefer to leave the power so guarded and restrained.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I understand the gentleman to say, that the power now exercised by an officer is under responsibility to the civil tribunals of the country!

Mr. MILLSON. Unquestionably.

Mr. STANTON. That is unquestionably true. I ask if the exercise of power given by this bill would not be precisely under the same responsibility?

Mr. MILLSON. Certainly not; and I will state the reasons.

Mr. STANTON. The power now given to a commander of a ship to confine in irons is given by law. This bill does nothing more.

Mr. MILLSON. The gentleman will pardon me, but this bill does a great deal more. The power given by the articles of war passed in 1800 confers a general authority upon a commanding officer to confine his men. The gentleman agrees with me in the opinion that he exercises that power with due responsibility to the civil and military tribunals of the country; but where authority is given, as proposed by this bill, to adjudicate a crime and inflict a specific punishment by confinement not exceeding three months, on bread and water, and in double-irons, then I say that there is an express limitation of the power; and the officer, if he does not transcend these prescribed limits, is not liable to any other jurisdiction, even if it can be shown that he has erred in his sentence. He is not liable to any other jurisdiction for inflicting a punishment that is within the prescribed limitation, and which he deems necessary for the punishment of the offense. There is a clear distinction between the two cases. So long as you confer upon any officer in the Navy the right to inquire and determine whether a man is guilty—a right to inquire and determine whether his punishment shall be solitary confinement, not exceeding thirty days—then I say, if he does not exceed the prescribed limits, he is not amenable to any other jurisdiction; because, if he has erred, it is only an error of judgment, for which he is not responsible to any court upon earth.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. With the permission of the gentleman—

Mr. MILLSON. I would be glad to hear my friend, but I have some few observations to make in reference to another part of the bill, which I would not like to be deprived of the opportunity of discussing. My remaining time will only allow me to call the attention of the House to another feature in the bill, to which, as I understand, there were very general objections, at least among those who voted against the bill—and that is, the power conferred by it to give the sailor after a service of twenty years, a pension of half-pay for life, I omit that provision in the bill altogether. I omit it, not from any indisposition to provide for the wants of the sailor—not because I am unwilling to secure to the veteran for those rewards which, after a life of hard service, he may deserve—but because I believe that the passage of that section of the bill might really operate to deprive him of many privileges which he enjoys at this time. There is no necessity for it at all. I have here a copy of the regulations for the United States Naval Asylum. The first article of the existing regulations provides that “it is the object of the asylum to provide a comfortable home for disabled and decrepit naval officers, seamen, and marines, who may be worthy beneficiaries of the country.” The third article secures admission to such as may produce evidence of twenty years’ service in the Navy. The seventh article provides an allowance of three dollars per month for clothing; and the eighth and ninth secure additional allowances, amounting in some cases to three dollars per month, for pocket-money.

I need not read the whole of these articles. Suffice it to say, that under existing regulations of the Navy Department, any sailor who stands in need of these benefits, and who has served twenty years faithfully, is entitled to admission into the Naval Asylum. What need of any further provision upon that subject? It does not secure him half-pay for the residue of his life, but it secures him a subsistence, and supplies him with a sufficient sum to purchase his clothing, and gives him money besides, for his reasonable and ordinary expenses. What need is there of giving half-pay to a sailor who is supported and clothed by the Government, and who has no occasion, or ought to have none, for spending money in any other way?

Mr. FLORENCE. I will state to the gentleman that the law, or rule, governing the admission of seamen into the Naval Asylum has been changed within a year or two. A very short time ago, the time of service was fixed for fifteen years, and a person who had been in the naval service of the United States was, after fifteen years’ service, entitled to admission in the Naval Asylum. I suppose that the regulations which the gentleman reads from are not the last.

Mr. MILLSON. They are.

Mr. FLORENCE. I will state for the gentleman’s information—

Mr. MILLSON. I have only a few minutes left—

Mr. FLORENCE. I wish but a moment or two, in order to correct the gentleman. There is very great complaint, whether reasonable or not, I cannot say, as to the regulations that have been made by the superintending power of the Naval Asylum. They have been changed, and may be again, unless fixed by law, and other changes may extend the time of service to forty years. I presume the gentleman was not acquainted with the fact that changes had been made. I felt it my duty to state what I have.

Mr. MILLSON. I am perfectly acquainted with the fact stated by the gentleman, that these regulations are not fixed by law. I have examined the statutes with express reference to that subject. I will state to the gentleman that I obtained these regulations from the Secretary of the Navy, who handed them to me, that I might know what the existing regulations were for admission into the Naval Asylum. They are dated the 1st of July, 1851, and signed by Mr. Graham. I say that these regulations now give to all sailors who have served twenty years, and require the aid of the Government, the privilege of entering the naval asylum, where they are furnished with clothing, and have all their reasonable wants supplied. I think these provisions are enough. The bill which was rejected the other day, could not operate advantageously to the sailor until after a period of twenty years, because it only provides for the admission of the sailor into the Naval Asylum after he shall have served twenty years, with good-conduct discharges. According to that provision in the bill, therefore, he could never have been admitted at all until after the lapse of twenty years, and he would have been obliged to fall back upon the regulations of the Department until after the lapse of twenty years.

Mr. FLORENCE. There is no regulation for continuing him there; for there have been, during this winter, two sailors turned out to the cold charities of the world, and if it had not been for the extraordinary exertions made to get one of them back—as only one was got back—he would have been an inmate of the almshouse. He was between sixty and seventy years of age. I state that fact to show the necessity of some enactment by which the sailor may be secured in his snug harbor.

Mr. MILLSON. The gentleman must recollect that the same abuses might exist under the system proposed; for if, in the course of twenty years, one single good-conduct discharge should be refused by the commanding officer to a meritorious sailor, it would as effectually exclude him from the Naval Asylum, under the law proposed, as any abuse under the old system.

I have only to say, in conclusion, that the substitute which I propose to offer, provides for securing to the commanding officers of the Navy all the authority which the present law confers upon them. I think it adequate to the suppression of such offenses as do not require investigation before either a general or a summary court-martial. Large latitude is allowed to commanding officers; much discretion is already given to them, and I do not wish, therefore, to add to that authority; but, at the same time, I have not thought it at all proper to take it from them.

Mr. BOCKOCK next obtained the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Virginia who now has the floor, as I have no doubt the members of the House desire to see the substitute printed, whether it would not be better to postpone the further consideration of this bill for the present—say till to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. A motion to commit would keep the bill from going over.

Mr. MILLSON. I have sent my substitute to the Clerk’s table for the purpose of having it read; but if it is the pleasure of the House to postpone the further consideration of the subject, of course I acquiesce.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I desire to be heard in relation to the bill now under consideration before the House, as passed by the Senate and reported to the House by the Committee on Naval Affairs; but the particular time at which I shall be heard is not an important matter to me, so it be as speedily as possible. I wish to reply to the arguments which have been presented by my colleague, [Mr. MILLSON;] and the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I would suggest to the gentleman, if he is not particular about the time, that he should move to refer the bill to the Naval Committee, and then move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It would then come up in the morning as the unfinished business.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I should prefer, for the convenience of the House, that the substitute of my colleague should be printed; and, in order to have an opportunity of doing that, I now move that the subject be recommitted to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and that the substitute of my colleague be printed.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I want to submit the original bill, in a modified form, as a substitute for the substitute of the gentleman from Virginia, and I should like to have it printed also.

The two substitutes were then ordered to be printed.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

On motion by Mr. BOCKOCK, the rules were then suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HIBBARD in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated, as the business before the committee, House bill No. 7, being a bill to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is at the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same, for the period herein specified; upon which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUNHAM] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. DUNHAM addressed the committee an hour in favor of the principle of providing, out of the public domain, homesteads for the landless—maintaining that such a policy would be not only morally right, but would conduce to the wealth, the power, and the happiness of the nation at large. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. WARD here obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. LETCHER, who moved that the committee rise.

[Cries of "No!" "No!" "No!"]

Mr. POLK. I demand tellers upon that motion. I do it out of no discourtesy to the gentleman, but there are other members who would like to speak to-day, if it be not the wish of the gentleman from Kentucky to occupy the floor.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon Mr. LETCHER's motion; and upon a division there were ayes 48, noes 38.

So the committee agreed to rise.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the homestead bill, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. POLK. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I do it for the purpose of having this bill discussed. If we have but one speech upon this bill each day, we will never reach a final vote upon it. I do not desire to appear, in the least, discourteous to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WARD] who has obtained the floor.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order—

Mr. POLK. And there are gentlemen here who desire to discuss the merits of the question.

Mr. MARSHALL. The motion the gentleman makes is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] submit a motion?

Mr. POLK. I submit the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. HART demanded the yeas and nays upon that motion.

Mr. CAMPBELL withdrew his motion.

Mr. LETCHER renewed it.

The yeas and nays were again demanded, but not ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to ask the gentleman who made the motion to adjourn, if he will withdraw it until we can refer the bills upon the Speaker's table? There are important bills there, and they ought to be referred.

The SPEAKER. Any debate upon the question is out of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman will withdraw his motion, then I will make the motion to take up the bills upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia withdraw his motion?

Mr. LETCHER. No, sir.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and agreed to—ayes 58, noes 33.

The House then adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

Also, five petitions of residents of San Francisco, California, praying the remission and refunding of duties on foreign merchandise destroyed by the great fires in that city in the years 1850 and 1851; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

Mr. HALE. I hold in my hand, and have been requested to present to the Senate, two petitions of inhabitants of Pennsylvania—one of them very numerous signed—for the repeal of the fugitive slave law. I had intended, in presenting them, to address some remarks to the Senate as to the practical operation of that law—as to the board of official ten dollar judges, who have been spawned into existence by it—as to the reptiles in the shape of attorneys and witnesses that it has called up. But as the whole subject in relation to all the compromise measures will be before the Senate in a few days, I intend to defer until that time what I have to say; and let the petitions take the usual course.

The PRESIDENT. They will lie upon the table.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. NORRIS, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to which was referred the petition of Gideon Hotchkiss, praying an extension of a patent granted to him for certain improvements in water-wheels, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Evans, praying to be allowed interest on a sum of money advanced by her father, Colonel Anthony Walter White, during the revolutionary war, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Anthony W. White, deceased; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives to amend an act entitled "An act providing for the sale of certain lands in the States of Ohio and Michigan ceded by the Wyandot tribe of Indians, and for other purposes," approved 3d March, 1843, reported it back without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of James W. Campbell, of Pike county, Missouri, reported it back without amendment.

On motion by Mr. FELCH, the report accompanying the above bill in the House of Representatives was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the memorial of Johnston Lykins, asking the passage of a law giving him the privilege of working, for a limited time, a tin mine which he had discovered; the petition of J. H. Jones; and the memorial of Hannah Dutton, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1852, reported the same, with amendments; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRODHEAD, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the memorial of Brevet Major H. L. Kendrick, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of John Tucker, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of J. Boyd, of Louisiana, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOWNS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the message of the President of the United States in relation to purloining public papers, reported a bill in addition to the several acts for the punishment of crimes against the United States; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of the inhabitants of Washington city and county, praying the enactment of a law for the punishment of trespasses on private property, reported a bill to prevent malicious mischief and protect property in the District of Columbia; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of James Lewis, reported it back without amendment, and, on his motion, the Senate proceeded to its consideration as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment being made, it was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, and was read a third time, and passed. The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to James Lewis $316, as witness fees and mileage, for attending the United States district court for the eastern district of Virginia. The witness was brought from the Sandwich Islands to Norfolk.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CLEMENS, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill to establish the subdivisional lines and corners of certain fractional sections in the southern surveying district of the State of Alabama; which was read a first and second time by its title, and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BRADBURY, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill to extend the benefits of an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the acts heretofore passed on that subject," to the wives and children of citizens; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

GUNPOWDER DEPÔTS.

Mr. FISH submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the communication from the Secretary of War in relation to the establishment of depôts for the preservation of gunpowder be printed for the use of the Senate.

REPORT OF ENGINEER ELLIS ON COAL.

Mr. PRATT submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to communicate to the Senate a copy of the report of Engineer Ellis, of his test of coals made at the navy-yard in Washington, in May and June, 1851.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. There is a bill upon the table which cannot possibly give rise to question or debate. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to take it up at this time, as I believe there are no special orders which are to be pressed now. I move to postpone the previous orders, in order to take up the bill to release from reservation and restore to the mass of public lands certain land in the State of Arkansas.

Mr. MANGUM. I hope the Senate will not agree to postpone the previous orders, with the view of taking up that bill. It is not a matter of much urgency. I would like to avail myself of this occasion to make an inquiry of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings, whether it is designed at an early period—and I think it ought to have been done before this—to call up the joint resolution making an appropriation for the extension of the Capitol? There are many interests involved in that measure. The season is passing away when the workmen ought to be at work. They are men who have come here on the invitation of the agents of the Government, who are out of employment, and are anxious to be again engaged. I very much hope that the committee may feel it to be their duty to press upon the Senate at least the consideration of the subject. I should like to know from the chairman, what is the condition of that subject, and when we may expect him to ask the Senate to consider it.

Mr. HUNTER. I am not the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings, but I am the only member of that committee present. I regret to say that the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. WHITCOMB,] who is the chairman of the committee, has been absent some time on account of sickness. Individually, I feel very anxious that the joint resolution referred to should be acted upon at once. If we are to go on with the work, the season has now commenced, when we ought to be engaged in it. It ought to be known whether or not we are going to continue the work, and I should be very glad to have the subject considered to-day, if possible.

Mr. MANGUM. I would ask the honorable Senator from Arkansas, with no disposition at all to interpose any objection to his bill, to withdraw his motion for the present, and allow an opportunity for considering this other question.

Mr. GWIN. I hope that the apportionment bill, which has been discussed, will not be put aside for any other. It is a question of great importance, and ought to be acted upon at once. The whole nation is interested in having the apportionment completed, and I hope the bill to which I have referred will be taken up and disposed of to-day.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. When I made this motion, I was not aware that there were any bills of pressing urgency before the Senate, which would be interfered with by taking up my bill. I can assure the honorable Senator from North Carolina, that I shall not press its consideration so as to interfere with any of the general or special orders, particularly with that in which he feels so much interest. If this bill should be taken up, and should give rise to question or debate, which I cannot anticipate, I would postpone its consideration, if it interfered with any other measure. It seems to me that we are consuming more time in the discussion of these preliminary questions than it would require to consider some of these bills. I hope the gentleman will let me have my bill taken up and disposed of to-day.

Mr. HUNTER. I merely rise to suggest, that perhaps we might come to an agreement to take up the joint resolution in relation to the Capitol extension to-morrow. Let the Senator from Arkansas have his bill taken up to-day, and then let us go on with the apportionment bill, and finish it before we adjourn. If we could have such an understanding, I think it would facilitate the progress of business.

Mr. RHETT. I have no sort of objection to the arrangement which the Senator from Virginia proposes. Inasmuch as the State of South Carolina is interested in the apportionment bill, and I shall be compelled to leave here to-morrow night, I hope the rule of the Senate will not be departed from, but that we shall to-day take up the apportionment bill and finish it.

Mr. HUNTER. I propose not to take up the joint resolution in relation to the Capitol until after the apportionment bill is disposed of. I ask that by general consent, the resolution in relation to the Capitol may be set apart for to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT. The motion is to take up a specific bill. It has nothing to do with the extension of the Capitol or the apportionment.

Mr. BRADBURY. I do not desire to interpose any objection to the wishes of the Senator from Arkansas; but I desire to call the attention of the Senate to one fact. It is nearly two months since a day was fixed for the consideration of the bill to indemnify the sufferers from French spoliations. Many other bills have since been considered by courtesy. I wish a day fixed for the consideration of that bill. I do not wish to be constantly presenting the subject to the Senate, and having other matters interpose. I ask the consent of the Senate to take up the bill this morning, for the purpose of assigning some day—say Monday next—for its consideration, and allow us to vote on it then. I hope a day may be fixed when it shall be considered, and that it shall not yield to any other bill. I only ask the Senate, if they do not feel disposed to fix a day for the consideration of the bill, to give me the yeas and nays. I do not desire to interpose any objection to the bill of the Senator from Arkansas; but we have not time, within the three or four minutes left before one o'clock, to consider it.

Mr. HUNTER. I shall ask the Senate to take up the deficiency bill on Monday next, and therefore I hope Monday will not be fixed for the consideration of the French spoliation bill.

The PRESIDENT. This constant discussion about other matters has no relation to the question before the Senate.

Mr. WELLER. This discussion takes more time than it would to dispose of some of these bills.

Mr. SMITH. I was about to make some remarks on the question to which the Senator from Maine referred.

The PRESIDENT. That has nothing to do with the subject-matter now before the Senate. The Senator from Maine cannot make the motion which he intimated until after the proposition of the Senator from Arkansas is disposed of.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senate will permit us to take up the apportionment bill. It is now within five minutes of the hour for the consideration of the special order, and it will be impossible to pass the bill of the Senator from Arkansas in that time.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I did not think that there would be such a discussion on my motion as to take up the whole of the morning hour, and I therefore withdraw the motion.

Mr. GWIN. I now move to take up the apportionment bill. The Senator from Maine can make his motion as well after that is disposed of as before it is taken up.

Mr. BRADBURY. I hope the honorable Senator will withdraw his motion, to allow me to have a day fixed for the consideration of the French spoliation bill. It will occupy no time to fix a day.

Mr. GWIN. With the condition that it is not to occupy any time I withdraw my motion.

Mr. BRADBURY. I now move that the previous orders be postponed for the purpose of taking up the bill I have named, with the view of assigning a future day for its consideration.

Mr. ATCHISON. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine whether this bill has not already been made a special order? and whether it does not now stand on the list of special orders?

Mr. BRADBURY. I will answer the honorable Senator. A day was assigned for its consideration almost two months ago; but we have yet been unable to consider it, because courtesy has allowed other bills to be taken up before it. I design now to fix some day when it shall be courtesy to consider it.

The PRESIDENT. It is among the special orders now.

Mr. GWIN. The bill of the Senator from Maine is a special order now; and therefore I hope the Senator will not ask to make it a double special order.

Mr. SMITH. Is it not competent for the Senate to fix a precise day for the consideration of that bill?

Mr. PRESIDENT. When a bill is deferred to a subsequent day, and made the special order, it stands among the special orders, but is not the first. When that day arrives, if there are any special orders preceding it, they must first be disposed of, before it can be taken up.

Mr. DAVIS. I beg leave to ask the Chair what special orders there are before this bill?

The PRESIDENT. The first special order is the bill which has been mentioned by the Senator from California—being the unfinished business. The next is the bill to establish a navy-yard and depot in the Bay of San Francisco. The next is the bill to improve the navigation of the Upper Mississippi. The next is a joint resolution in relation to the printing of the returns of the Seventh Census. The next is a joint resolution expressive of the sympathy of Congress with the Irish exiles. And then the bill to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of the claims of sufferers by French spoliations.

Mr. BRADBURY. I desire to make this bill the special order for Monday next, at a quarter before one o'clock.

Mr. ATCHISON. I would inquire further, whether or not it is not competent for the Senate, now or at any time, to take up that special order by a majority vote?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. ATCHISON. Then why insist on fixing any other day, when it is within the control of the Senate at any time? There can be no necessity for it. It is not only unnecessary, but worse than unnecessary.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the honorable Senator from Maine, that, by postponing the bill to a subsequent day, it throws the bill behind all the other special orders.

Mr. BRADBURY. Then I withdraw my motion, and give notice that on Monday next I shall propose to call up that bill, and shall ask the yeas and nays on the question of taking it up for consideration at that time.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill supplementary to "An act providing for the taking of the seventh and subsequent censuses of the United States, and to fix the number of the members of the House of Representatives, and provide for their future apportionment among the several States," approved 23d May, 1850; the question pending being on the amendment offered by Mr. BRADBURY.

Mr. RIETT. I have an amendment which I presume will be in order, to strike out all of the first section of the bill after the words "Department of the Interior," and insert in lieu of them:

"Provided, That the State of California shall be entitled to two representatives, in accordance with the act admitting said State into the Union, until the next actual enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States."

So that the section will read:

"That the Secretary of the Interior proceed forthwith to apportion the representatives among the several States, in accordance with the provisions contained in the twenty-fifth section of the act of 23d May, 1850, according to the returns of population which have been completed and returned to the Census Office in the Department of the Interior: Provided, That the State of California," &c.

The PRESIDENT. It will not be in order until the amendment of the Senator from Maine is disposed of.

Mr. RIETT. I shall bring it forward at the proper time in some shape. I will state to the Senate the grounds on which I suppose they should act in this matter. I do not think the question is surrounded with as many embarrassments, as some Senators suppose. In the first place, when the census act was passed, it fixed a certain number to constitute the House of Representatives. The object in limiting the number and fixing it beforehand, was to get rid of the contests, and continual heart-burnings that arise from the strifes of different States to get an additional Representative, in consequence of their fractions. I was a member of the House of Representatives, when the last apportionment bill was passed, and I may say, that there was no measure at that session which excited one half the interest that that bill excited, because different States, according to the manner in which the apportionment should be made, would be entitled to an additional Representative, or would lose one. Hence, there was a strife on all sides to alter, change, and modify the apportionment in such a way between different sections as well as between different States, to obtain Representatives in consequence of fractions. It was to avoid this controversy that the Senate and House of Representatives determined beforehand to fix the number of Representatives; and they virtually said then, that by this method it should be agreed that those States which obtain the fractions by the enumeration returned to the Department, should have the Representative. According to that act, the enumeration has been made—it has come in. The regular officer of the Government has reported to the Senate and House of Representatives what the enumeration requires; and according to it the State which I represent comes in as the lowest State under the fraction. I contend that it is neither good faith, nor can it be good policy, to alter the act or interfere with it in any way whatever. South Carolina, on the face of the act itself, comes here under the enumeration sent from the Department, as one of the States entitled to a Representative for a fraction. Upon no principle of good faith, in consistency with the previous legislation of Congress, can the Senate and House of Representatives now alter the apportionment, or eject her from the Representative to which she is entitled.

Whilst I think this is very plain, I think it is not at all difficult to reconcile with the act itself the admission of two Representatives on the part of the State of California. I will read to you the proviso which I propose to offer as an amendment, or get in, in some shape, for the purpose of settling this vexed question:

Provided, That the State of California shall be entitled to two Representatives, in accordance with the act admitting said State into the Union, until the next actual enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States.

On her admission into the Union, this stipulation was entered into, that until the next enumeration was held, she should have two Representatives. The question occurs here, has there been an enumeration? Have the inhabitants of California had their population enumerated? It will not do to say that there has been a partial enumeration; for a partial enumeration is as good as no enumeration at all. It is no enumeration, so far as California is concerned; and, taken in its broadest sense, it is not an enumeration of the United States. I mean it is not a complete one. And if it is not complete, it cannot be recognized as an enumeration. What is our difficulty? California has not been enumerated, on account of causes which the Government say they could not control, and the people of California say they were not responsible for. That is true on both sides. I am not disposed to blame the Government and accuse them of laches; nor am I disposed at all to visit the people of California with any evil arising from the non-enumeration of their population. It is a matter with which they have nothing to do. It was not given to them to perform, and the non-performance of it ought not to be visited upon them. You cannot send back to have another enumeration. That is impossible, and it would do injustice to California if you attempted it. Suppose that you should go back and say that the enumeration of the people of California should be again taken, what would be the operation of it? There are a vast number who were there at the time when the enumeration was required to be taken, who are dead. A still greater number have left the country, who went there with the intention of remaining, but who, in consequence of adversity, or failure, or some other cause, have not made plenty of money, and have left the country, and returned to the Atlantic States. Would it be just to send back to California to obtain the number of her inhabitants as they were at the time the returns ought properly to have been made? You would do great injustice to California to attempt such an enumeration now? It cannot be made. It is impossible to do justice in that way.

What other course is left to you? I say let California fall back upon the stipulations in her behalf, at the time of her admission. We then stipulated that she should have two Representatives until the enumeration was made by which her rights would be determined. That enumeration has not been made, so far as she is concerned. What, then, is our course? Let us keep to the terms of our agreement under the census law. Let South Carolina have her Representatives. Keep also to the terms of our agreement on the admission of California into the Union, and give her two Representatives until a proper enumeration is made, and equal justice can be done to her, as well as to the other States. That appears to me to be a fair, plain course. Our faith will be kept on either hand, and thus the State of South Carolina will come in under the census act, and the State of California, in consequence of the stipulation at the time of her admission, will have the two Representatives to which she is entitled. It seems to me that this is a plain and simple course, by which we may be entirely unembarrassed, as to all difficulties as to the question of enumeration and conjecture.

I admit that we cannot go into conjecture in this question. I acquiesce very strongly, indeed, in the reasonings of the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. Downs.] If you once begin in speculation as to what is the population of one State, I defy you to come to any accurate conclusion. It is said that the enumeration of California is defective. I answer that the enumeration in my own State is defective. I presented a petition here, the other day, in which the census-taker says he did not get sufficient compensation; and I understand that in that district the census was not taken by near twenty per cent. I saw it stated in a French work, recently, that any enumeration of people, in any country, if it comes within ten per cent., would be a very correct enumeration. To say that because the enumeration of California is not correct, we will therefore go into a conjecture as to the amount of population she possesses, we will have to extend the same principle to other States. There is Wisconsin, increasing with almost as much rapidity as California. Thousands and tens of thousands of emigrants are going in there every day. If we open the question as to speculative population, I have no doubt that my friend from Wisconsin will come in and show that there are a vast number of errors in the census returns from that State, and therefore will ask that the question may be opened as to his State. Then there is Louisiana. I have no doubt that with a more correct enumeration the Senator from Louisiana can show, not merely that Louisiana is only a thousand short of South Carolina, and her fraction, but perhaps ten thousand beyond her. I have no doubt of these things; and therefore I say that if you go into this question of speculative numbers, there is no end to it. It is impossible to adjust the question on that ground; and I see no ground satisfactory to these States, satisfactory to our faith under the census act, as well as fulfilling our stipulation with California by which we admitted her into the Union, except, on the one hand, to fulfill the faith implied in the census act itself—to admit South Carolina to a Representative for her fraction—and, on the other hand, fulfill the faith pledged to California on her admission, and let her have two Representatives until another enumeration shall be made.

Mr. BADGER. I concur with the honorable Senator from South Carolina in the object he has in view; I wish California to have her two members; and I wish South Carolina to retain the representation to which she is entitled under the census, including a member for the largest fraction; but I desire to ask the Senator, if his amendment should be adopted, and no additional member be added to the number of which the House of Representatives is composed under the law as it now stands, how are both of these objects to be accomplished?

Mr. RHETT. Both objects will be accomplished by it. The mere adoption of the amendment will add one to the number. It is not necessary to state that one more is added, because anybody can see that if you add one member to the number, you will have one more. It is not necessary to state it; it is a result which necessarily follows from the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. RUSK. It seems to me that I see a way in which we cannot violate the Constitution, and yet reconcile this matter properly. The Constitution requires us to apportion the Representatives according to the actual enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States. This, it seems to me, fixes this matter so far as the actual enumeration has gone. We cannot, by our enactment here—unless we choose to violate the Constitution of the United States—deprive any State of any number to which it is now entitled under the actual enumeration, taken in pursuance of the Constitution; neither can we increase the number. We can neither increase nor diminish so far as the actual enumeration has taken place. It is evident that no actual enumeration has taken place in California. Then, can we, under the Constitution, fix the number of her Representatives? We cannot; because the Constitution is very definite that it must be done according to the actual enumeration of the inhabitants; and that enumeration has not been made in that State. But California is now entitled, by the law of her admission into the Union, to two Representatives. Were those Representatives given to her constitutionally? I think there can be no question about that. The power to admit a State carried along with it the incidental power to fix her representation. It is true we were bound and did, as far as there were any lights before us, attempt to fix it in the ratio of her population; but it carried along with it the incidental power of fixing her representation. Such has been the practice of the Government; and such must necessarily be the case. The power to admit a State certainly presumed that we shall also admit her with Representatives in the other House of Congress. Then an amendment, which shall not alter the terms of the law in apportioning according to the actual enumeration, and give South Carolina, and all other States in the Union, according to the actual enumeration, the number to which they are entitled under the law to take the census, and retain the two members for California by virtue of the act of her admission, and not by giving it to her, it seems to me, will not violate the Constitution; and I am prepared to vote for such an amendment.

Mr. BRADBURY. In accordance with the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Texas, I propose to change the phraseology of the amendment which I offered, by striking out the words "that State now has," and inserting in lieu thereof, the words "prescribed by the act admitting said State into the Union." I suppose, as the amendment was offered by myself, I can so modify it.

The PRESIDENT. It can only be modified by the approbation of the Senate. If it is not objected to, it will be so modified.

No objection was made.

Mr. BRADBURY. I desire to say that I have examined, with some care, the amendment which the honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] proposes to offer, and have become satisfied that unless something more be added to it, the legal construction of it would exclude South Carolina from her additional Representative. I think my amendment, as modified, will meet the views not only of the Senator from South Carolina, but also of the Senator from Texas.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the State of California shall be entitled to the number of Representatives prescribed by the act admitting said State into the Union, and that for this purpose, the act of May 23, 1850, providing for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States, be so amended that the whole number shall be two hundred and thirty-four, instead of two hundred and thirty-three, until an apportionment under a new census.

Mr. DOWNS. I now wish to present a question which I shall desire to take up some time, and this will, perhaps, be as proper a time as any other to present it. I shall, therefore, move to amend the amendment, first by striking out "four," and inserting "five," so as to make the number of Representatives two hundred and thirty-five, and then adding, at the proper place, "Louisiana shall have five instead of four Representatives."

The PRESIDENT. The question will first be on the first part of the amendment to the amendment, striking out "four," and inserting "five."

Mr. DOWNS. The grounds on which this proposition is made are the following: The two States having the largest fractions—much the largest; no other State comes near them—are South Carolina and Louisiana. South Carolina has a fraction of forty-seven thousand in round numbers, and Louisiana forty-six thousand, there being a difference of about a thousand between the two. The position I take is, that if, by any computation or estimate, or equitable arrangement, you allow California, when the actual returns do not show a fraction so large as Louisiana, an additional member, you cannot in fairness and with propriety exclude Louisiana, which has so large a fraction. This proposition will produce no further alteration in the arrangement, because there is no other State which has near so large a fraction as Louisiana and South Carolina. Arguments have been urged with a great deal of force and propriety, and will be urged again, that South Carolina should have the additional member, because of her fraction. You say she ought to have it; and everything that is said in support of that argument applies with equally as much force to Louisiana; both have large fractions, though one happens to be a very small amount above the other. In order to get at what you are aiming, you have to increase the number, and in principle it is immaterial whether you increase it one or two; and if you do increase it one in order to give South Carolina and California each an additional member, and refuse to extend one more to Louisiana, which has a fraction very little less than South Carolina, you certainly do great injustice to Louisiana. I would have assented at any time to the proposition to give South Carolina and Louisiana each an additional member, and the two to California, and that would have done justice to all parties; but certainly I could not agree, and I hope the Senate will not decide; that the difference is so great that they will allow an additional member to the others, and refuse it to Louisiana.

There is another reason why it would be more convenient to increase the number of Representatives two instead of one. According to the apportionment, as it now stands, it is fixed at an odd number. It is not absolutely necessary, but it may be convenient, to have an odd number, because otherwise in an election for President you might have a tie and no choice. If you make the number two hundred and thirty-four, there may be an equal division. At any rate, whatever objection there may be to increasing the number, there can be no material objection to increasing it two any more than one. I do not propose this out of over anxiety or solicitude to increase the strength of my State, but she stands in a very peculiar position; no other State is similarly situated; and I do not think ample justice can be done to either of the States concerned, unless the settlement is based upon that principle.

I must repeat again what I stated yesterday, that Senators, in my opinion, too readily assume that there are no returns from California. That is not the fact; there are returns either strictly official, or as authentic and binding as if they were official, for every county but one, and there is a doubt whether that county existed in 1850 or not. That there are erroneous returns, does not make them no returns. There are returns. Gentlemen must not base their argument on the ground that there are none; the Secretary of the Interior has sent in returns from all the counties except some three or four, and the committee have them for every county except one, the existence of which in 1850 is doubtful. There are then returns, and you cannot consider these as a nullity. They do not amount to a nullity because they are imperfect. As has been said, there may have been, and no doubt are, imperfect returns from other States. No doubt great errors exist in the returns from my State, because it happened that when the census was taken there were great overflows, and no doubt the population appeared less than than it actually is. No doubt errors may be found in other States; and whenever we find an error shall we say there is no return at all? I cannot think so. But I say the question is a difficult one; it is surrounded by difficulties on all hands. That a full population has not been given to California, we may assume or suppose from all the facts in the case, but still you cannot say that there are no returns whatever. Under the difficulties which surround the case, I think it would be fair all round to give an additional member to South Carolina, to Louisiana, and to California. They are all equally entitled to it; but if you select two, and leave the third out, I think you do great injustice to the latter. I hope my amendment to the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I know of no question which has arisen in the halls of Congress that has excited a deeper and stronger interest than the partition among the States of the political power of Congress. I think every gentleman who has been present, after a census has been taken, and witnessed the struggle for this power, will confirm what I say in regard to it. It is a very delicate question. It is one that involves very delicate considerations, and I approach it as such, when I come here to act upon it in any shape whatever. In order to get rid of this exciting difficulty which has characterized the passage of acts heretofore, Congress passed the law under which the present apportionment has been made, in advance of the census; and, in the passage of that law, they adopted a new principle—a principle which, if my memory serves me correctly, is derived from a suggestion made by General Washington, in giving his interpretation to the Constitution at one of the earliest apportionments made. He suggested the propriety of representing the fractions that amounted to more than one half of the amount of apportionment. That is the way I recollect it. Upon examining that principle, I thought it a sound one; and, on various occasions, contended for its adoption, but without success. It has now been adopted, and adopted antecedent to the taking of the present census.

Well, sir, the passage of the law of 1850 was very well calculated to get rid of all the difficulties which we have heretofore encountered. But now an embarrassment arises from an unanticipated source. Upon the dividing of the aggregate Federal population by the number of Representatives, which were fixed by that law to two hundred and thirty-three, it turns out that the number required for a Representative is ninety-two thousand and a fraction. And then there is a considerable number—I do not recollect the exact amount of the fractions to be represented—enough to make whatever number is wanting after the division takes place, to come up to two hundred and thirty-three. A difficulty arises here, and one, I apprehend, of a good deal of interest. The returns from California, it is said, are inaccurate. It is said they are in some respects quite erroneous. But I will defer examining that point at this moment. It is said that South Carolina, if the census of California be taken and considered as it is returned, is entitled to a member by her fraction—the fraction being forty-seven thousand and odd. Louisiana also comes in, having a fraction of forty-six thousand and odd, and claims also to be represented on that fraction, provided California receives the additional member which she claims. These three claims to one membership, raise the whole question as it presents itself to my mind. There are, in fact, three claimants to one seat—California, South Carolina, and Louisiana. But gentlemen propose to get over the difficulty by giving two additional seats, to the number provided for by law. One proposition is to give a seat to California, leaving South Carolina in possession of hers; and now the honorable Senator from Louisiana [Mr. Downs] moves to let Louisiana also come in for another seat.

Now, Mr. President, do not gentlemen perceive that when you undertake by corrections to add to the aggregate of the Federal population, you disturb the whole proportion? If you increase that aggregate, you make a new divisor and a new apportionment among the States; and if you diminish it, it has the same effect, changing, at least, all the fractions. It disturbs the whole proportion as it is made under that law; go which way you will, that is the result of it. Perhaps there is no insuperable difficulty in all this, as possibly it might work out no actual change of right. But what I wish to draw the attention of the Senate to, in regard to the question now before us, is this, more particularly: is the process to extricate us from difficulty now proposed? I suggested on Monday, when this question was up, that I should be glad to be informed what evidence has been adduced here which shows that there is a sufficient number of persons in California to entitle her, by a fraction, or by a full number, to an additional Representative. This is what she claims, and this is the point of inquiry. I heard it said, on the other side, that there were certain estimates made by the legislative body of that State, and by commissioners, which placed the number of the population at three hundred thousand; and they made the apportionment of their political power in the State, for the State Legislature, upon that assumed basis. I should be glad now to see those estimates; for I suggested there were returns made here by the enumerators of the census, which, so far as I understood, were not questioned. I would be glad to see what sort of estimates were made for counties of which the returns of the census are supposed to be correct, and then I could form some opinion, by comparing the estimates of these counties with the returns, how far the estimates for counties admitted to be erroneously returned, are reliable. I have not seen that paper, but I should be glad still to see it.

But, Mr. President, I will ask attention for a moment—I do not propose to occupy much of the time of the Senate on this matter—to some returns as they are printed and laid before us in the document connected with this subject, and see how the estimates compare with the returns which are made. For example: I take some three or four counties; as far as I know, and can see, they are unquestioned as to accuracy. Trinity county is returned at one thousand six hundred and thirty-five; while the estimate made, in a letter from a gentleman, which is printed with the report of the committee, of the population of that county is eight thousand. The county of Yuba is returned at nine thousand six hundred and seventy-three; that same gentleman, who was chairman, it is said, of the committee of the State Legislature, estimates the population at thirty thousand. The county of Sutter is returned at three thousand four hundred and forty-four; he estimates its population at seven thousand five hundred. The county of Shasta is returned at three hundred and seventy-eight; he estimates it at six thousand. These four counties are returned at fifteen thousand one hundred and thirty; and the estimate contained in that gentleman's letter is fifty-one thousand five hundred. I will turn to the document, and read the foundation of those estimates:

"The data from which the committee formed their estimate of the entire population of the State, was sufficient to satisfy them that it amounted to three hundred thousand souls. We informed ourselves first as to the number of emigrants who had crossed the plains, and the number who had arrived by sea, and the total number who had departed, which left us a population of three hundred thousand."

"This number, of course, included the arrivals by sea from the first of June, 1850, to April, 1851—the census was to be taken on the first of June—and which, for present purposes, should be deducted—I think forty thousand—a large estimate of the number who arrived during that period. I might add, as corroboration of the accuracy of the estimates of the population of the State, as taken by the committee of the Legislature above referred to, that the State conventions of both the political parties, which were held a few weeks subsequently, in assigning the representation of the counties according to their population, exceeded the estimates of the committee of the Legislature, the returns of the commissioners being held, by the circumstances, as unworthy of notice."

The writer goes on to say, "As an illustration of the gross inaccuracy of the census returns from California, I will give you"—what, Mr. President? what will he give you to correct "the gross inaccuracy" in the enumeration taken by the public officers, under oath, upon the spot? He says: "I will give you my estimates of a few counties in the northern part of the State," &c. That is to correct the census taken under the law, and by officers, under oath, upon the spot. It is to be corrected by the estimates of this gentleman, which I have read to you, which gives fifty thousand and odd persons where the census-takers found only fifteen thousand and odd. Now, without going into this subject—for I do not wish to make myself tedious, I have no desire to examine into it beyond what is necessary to enable me to do my duty understandingly—if California has the population which entitles her to an additional member, I wish to give it to her; but if she has not, I do not see why she should not submit, as other States do, to the share of the political power which belongs to her according to the terms of the Constitution itself.

It is said that we may get over this difficulty by reference to the law which was passed for the admission of California. I have not that law before me, but I believe I recollect what it is. It provides that California shall have two Representatives, until an enumeration under the Constitution. An enumeration of what? An enumeration for a new apportionment; an enumeration to be taken in 1850, under the terms of the Constitution; and that provision is the same thing as if it had been limited to the year 1850; referring it to the enumeration is substantially referring it to a point of time. The Constitution requires that the enumeration shall be taken in 1850. California was to have two members until that enumeration was taken, and a new apportionment made under it. Has not that enumeration been taken? Has not the apportionment been made? Has not the political power been distributed under the act? It has everywhere, saving and excepting the questions which are now raised here. There is nothing else left open; no one proposes to disturb the proportion given to your State, or to mine, or to any other State. The proposition is, to make some new arrangement as regards these three States. Then, sir, I do not think that the Senator from South Carolina, when he gives his construction to the act of 1850, admitting California, gives to it a correct construction. It is an erroneous view of the meaning of that law. That is simply a limitation of time—a limitation to the period when the enumeration should be made.

My main object, Mr. President, was to call the attention of the Senate to these considerations. We now stand upon this alternative. The law of 1850, which was passed for the purpose of taking the census, limited the number of Representatives to two hundred and thirty-three. That distribution has been made, and it is not desirable to disturb it if it can be avoided. The true question, if we take the construction and interpretation of that law, is this: South Carolina appears to have a fraction of forty-seven thousand and over; and unless California has a larger fraction, South Carolina is entitled to the member. My friend from California, [Mr. GWIN], says that California has a larger fraction. That brings us to an examination of the documents and to the evidence; and the real question is, does the evidence sustain the view which the gentleman takes of this subject? Does it authorize the conclusion that California has as large a fraction as South Carolina? The gentleman will say, perhaps, that is not necessary. If he says that is not necessary in order to add a member, I say it is necessary to raise the fraction above that of Louisiana, which amounts to the same thing, for Louisiana has a fraction of forty-six thousand. Then, the question is: can you go to work and, by any evidence which is before us, correct the errors in taking the census of California, so as to enable you to add enough to the population of California, as returned, to entitle her to another member? That is the true question to be settled here; and if you settle that question wrong, you disturb the whole apportionment, you derange the whole system of representation from beginning to end; for when you add a new member to California, you take from the power of the other States, to the extent to which the power is given to California.

We agreed to limit the number to two hundred and thirty-three, and the true question is, whether California can override South Carolina in this matter? Can she, or can you, make out, by any reasonable calculation, by correcting errors, or otherwise, that she has a larger fraction than South Carolina? If you proceed on such evidence as that contained in the letter of the gentleman, which is published, and which I find in this document, (the report of the Committee on the Judiciary,)—and I do not mean to imply anything derogatory to the respectability of the writer—but I will take the language there employed, which certainly is plain and frank; and I appeal to you, sir, and to the Senate, whether we can take the estimates here submitted in the manner in which these are proposed, and substitute them in place of the returns made by the sworn officers of the Government? and whether it is quite respectful for a person, whose estimates are made in the manner alleged upon conjecture, however well acquainted with the country, to assert that the returns made by sworn officers are grossly incorrect? This information does not strike my mind as being satisfactory. I am desirous that it should be so.

It is said to be a hardship to California to have the number of her Representatives reduced. That hardship, if it be one, has devolved on many States. There are some eight or ten States that have suffered diminution in the number of their Representatives. But it must be remembered that the apportionment was made under the Constitution of the United States, on an enumeration made by virtue of that instrument, and that the agreement is, that you shall send as many Representatives as your enumeration will authorize under the law on which the census is founded. That is all. California is no more wronged than Vermont, or New Hampshire, or Connecticut, or Maine—the Senator's own State—or many other States which have lost a member by the new apportionment.

I throw out these matters of suggestion, having gathered them up from the facts contained in the report by the committee. I waive all question of constitutional difficulties, though I think it is very well taken, indeed; and I think the wisest and best course is to maintain the apportionment made under the act of 1850, and thus settle the question between South Carolina and California. If the gentleman can show me, by any reasonable calculation, or by such satisfactory evidence as a reasonable man can be satisfied with, that his fraction overrides that of South Carolina, I will then say he is entitled to an additional member, and will vote with him.

Mr. GWIN. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts has alluded to the report of the joint committee of the Legislature of California, and expressed a desire to see it. I have it before me, and will read an extract from it. The Senator from Massachusetts says the language used by my colleague, [Mr. McCORKLE], is hardly respectful to the census agent and his assistants, sworn officers of the Government. He did not discredit these census returns here for the first time. He had good and sufficient reasons for the opinion expressed in the communication addressed to the Judiciary Committee, for he had examined these census returns on another quite different theater of public duty. He was the chairman of the committee of the Legislature of California to which was referred the question of apportionment. He then examined these census returns, and I will read what he said on that occasion. It may be proper to remind the Senate that the report was made with no design to affect this body, for it was supposed then that the census would be retaken correctly by the agents of the United States Government. The report is this:

"The joint select committee, appointed by the Senate and Assembly to report a bill to reapportion the members of the Senate and Assembly among the several counties of the State, have carefully considered the same, and report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

"From all the reliable information within the reach of the committee, they believe that the Federal population of California now exceeds three hundred thousand souls. They have arrived at this conclusion from information derived from all parts of the State, as well as from a record of the overland emigration, the arrivals and departures by sea in the last two years, and the estimated number of resident Californians at the time of the change of flags. It is to be regretted that the insufficient means furnished by the United States Government to the commissioners appointed to take the census, the migratory character of our population, the impracticability of reaching the greatest number of said population in the gorges of the mountains, have rendered the census, so far reported, incorrect and unsatisfactory."

I have said that my colleague [Mr. McCORKLE] speaks from information collected on another occasion, when acting in another capacity, and not supposing that his testimony would be called for here; for it was then believed by all that the census of the State would be completed according to law. Therefore, what he says now is the result of a thorough examination of the subject, and is consequently entitled to great weight. I will read in this connection the second section of the act admitting California into the Union; and leave it for the good sense of the Senate to say whether this law has been complied with in taking the census of that State:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, until the representation in Congress shall be apportioned according to an actual enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, the State of California shall be entitled to two Representatives in Congress."

The Senator from Massachusetts stated, the other day, that the census agent and his assistants were to inquire of every person in California whether they intended to reside there. This is not correct. They were to enumerate the inhabitants, and those who started to California before the 1st of June, 1850. This act was passed after the one authorizing the taking of the seventh census. Being a subsequent law, which says there shall be "an actual enumeration," until such actual enumeration of the inhabitants of the whole United States, California included, that State is entitled to two members. I deny that any such enumeration in that State has ever been made. So says the census agent, and we are bound to believe him; for he has sworn to make correct returns, and in these returns we find there has been no actual enumeration. Is it any disrespect to the census agent in my colleague [Mr. McCORKLE] to repeat his own language? I take it for granted no member of the Senate will say that an actual enumeration of the inhabitants of California has ever been taken. The second section of the act I have just read, admitting California, contains a guarantee that we shall have two members in the other House until an actual enumeration is taken, which cannot be violated with honor by this Government.

Mr. DAWSON. My desire was to have voted for the additional Representative to the State of California; but upon an examination of the testimony—the result of which I will submit to the Senate—I am unable to do so; and, if California is to have an additional member, I cannot resist the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Louisiana. The principle, in both cases, is precisely the same. This, Mr. President, is a matter which is to be regulated by fact. The principle is established by law, that all fractions of population over and above a certain number entitling a State to a Representative in Congress—except in the case of certain large fractions specified—are to go without representation, in order that the number of members of the House of Representatives may be confined to two hundred and thirty-three. Then let us examine this matter fairly, with a view to come to a just conclusion—a conclusion founded upon truth and fact, and not upon estimate and conjecture; and let us not violate principle upon the alleged ground that we are not correctly informed. We have information founded, I suppose, upon facts; and the facts stand thus: The State of South Carolina has a fraction of population over and above the ratio of representation, of forty-seven thousand four hundred and seventy-eight. The State of Louisiana has also a fraction of forty-six thousand one hundred and ninety-six. The enumeration of the people in the State of California, as taken and returned to the Census Office, amounts to ninety-two thousand five hundred and ninety-seven souls. These were the returns made in the State of California. That amount, supposing it to be a true return of the population of that State, would not have entitled her to a Representative at all; and she would only have had one, on the constitutional provision that each State shall be entitled to at least one Representative. But there were three counties not included in the enumeration I have just mentioned, namely: Santa Clara, Contra Costa, and San Francisco, with a population, correctly taken, I suppose, by the assistant marshals, and returned to the census agent, of twenty-five thousand two hundred and twenty-four, making a total of one hundred and seventeen thousand eight hundred and twenty-one persons, who constitute the entire enumeration of the population of the State of California.

But it is now stated, Mr. President, that this enumeration is not correct in point of fact; that there are great errors in the returns; and that California ought not to suffer in consequence of the neglect or failure of the officers of the General Government fully to discharge their duty. I admit that position, Mr. President, as far as it goes; but how are we to ascertain the extent of the failure to perform the duty, and the means by which California is to be deprived of a member in the House of Representatives? It must be by proof only. And where shall we obtain it? Is it to be obtained from estimates of gentlemen residing in California? No, sir; that proof must be obtained from the highest practical source. What proof is it? Why, sir, it is the evidence of the census agent of the State of California—a man sworn to discharge his duties faithfully and honestly, a man who was not only responsible to the General Government, but a man who was made in some measure responsible to the people of the State of California for the information which he was to lay before them. Now, what is the truth on that subject? Let us come to it fairly. Who is the census agent of California? Mr. J. Neely Johnson. It seems, sir, that on the 15th of April, in the year 1851, Mr. W. Van Voorhies, Secretary of State for the State of California, called on the census agent there to communicate to him, and through him to the Legislature of the State, correct information in relation to the census; and here is a letter which he transmits to the President of the Senate in California—the honorable David C. Broderick:

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE, }
SAN JOSE, April 15, 1851. }

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a communication received from J. Neely Johnson, Esq., United States census agent for California. The communication explains itself.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. VAN VOORHIES,
Secretary of State.

And what does Mr. Neely Johnson say:

"UNITED STATES CENSUS AGENT'S OFFICE, }
SACRAMENTO CITY, (CAL.), April 10, 1851. }

"Sir: I have been necessarily delayed in complying with the resolution adopted by the General Assembly of this State, requesting me to furnish an abstract of the census returns; in consequence of the many causes which have transpired to retard this work; and, at the present time, I am able to render but a partial and incomplete statement of the same, as the full returns have not been received. A letter of recent date from the deputy to whom was assigned the district embracing the first two named counties, informs me that he has completed his labors there, but furnishes no information as to the number of inhabitants. I have made repeated efforts—thus far ineffectual—to have the census taken in the county of Tuolumne. I have as yet received no information from the deputy last appointed there.

"In some instances, as you will observe, the returns are given in round numbers. In such cases those figures are predicated upon the information furnished by the respective deputies, which will be found a near approximation to the returns.

"The counties of Trinity, Shasta, and Colusi, are given as comprehending one district. The gentleman who performed this duty in those counties, received his commission in the month of September last, he being then a resident of Trinity. He entered upon this duty without the means of determining the proper subdivision of this district; and so erroneous in fact was the general impression then prevailing amongst the population residing there, regarding the northern boundary of the State, that a large population on the Klamath river was not enumerated, being supposed to be comprehended in the Territory of Oregon.

"The result of this enumeration, when completed, will, with all reasonable probability, fall short of the entire population of the State, from thirty-three to fifty per cent. Such a result must naturally occur to the mind of every person conversant with the circumstances surrounding those engaged in the mines—probably the most numerous of our population—residing, as many of them do, in unknown and unfrequented localities; whilst others are constantly changing their places of abode; thus absolutely precluding the possibility of their being found at all by the census man."

And then in another letter, he says:

"The counties of Trinity, Shasta, and Colusi, are given as comprehending one district. The gentleman who performed this duty in these counties, received his commission in the month of September last, he being then a resident of Trinity. He entered upon this duty without the means of determining the proper subdivisions of this district, and so erroneous, in fact, was the general impression then prevailing amongst the population residing there, regarding the northern boundary of the State, that a large population on the Klamath river was not enumerated, being supposed to be comprehended in the Territory of Oregon. The result of this enumeration—"

The result of what enumeration? Why, of the three counties of Trinity, Shasta, and Colusi.

"The result of this enumeration, when completed, will, with all reasonable probability, fall short of the entire population of the State, from thirty-three to fifty per cent."

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] has shown that the census was taken in all the counties, and that there is a large portion of the returns the accuracy of which nobody pretends to doubt. This is a fact.

Now, what are the correct returns about which there is no dispute, and which have come properly into the Census Bureau? Sir, the first twenty-two counties, proper returns from which have been had, give to California a representative population of ninety-two thousand five hundred and ninety-seven, and it is alleged that the other three counties contained a population of twenty-five thousand two hundred and twenty-four, which together made a total of one hundred and seventeen thousand eight hundred and twenty-one, all of which is correct, and which nobody doubts. But these three counties come not within what is said of the thirty-three or the fifty per cent. There is a material question. Now, these are the whole facts, and here is the proof from the superintendent of the business in California. And will any Senator upon this floor, in order to obviate the principle adopted by Congress two years ago, in consequence of the testimony which is here adduced, add one member for California? If that is done, then on the same principle, another member must be given to Louisiana, and also one to South Carolina, and thereby increase the number of the House of Representatives to two hundred and thirty-five. I hope that will not be done without good cause.

I propose, now, to show that California cannot cry out "injustice;" and I will show it upon proof, and give them to the full extent everything they ask. This census agent reports that in California no returns were made of from thirty-three to fifty per cent. of the population. Now, what is thirty-three per cent. on the whole alleged population, as shown by the returns?—I mean of the ninety-two thousand five hundred and ninety-seven. Taking that number as the population of the whole State, what will be the amount of thirty-three per cent.? Let it go over the whole State, instead of the three counties, to which it is said to apply, and it would only make the population of California one hundred and twenty-three thousand four hundred and sixty-three souls. And what is the ratio of representation? It is ninety-three thousand seven hundred and twenty-one. Take that number from one hundred and twenty-three thousand four hundred and sixty-three, and it leaves a fraction of over twenty-nine thousand, for which a representative is asked; while South Carolina has a fraction of forty-seven thousand, and Louisiana a fraction of over forty-six thousand.

But take another view of the matter. Take the calculation for the whole State at ninety-two thousand five hundred and ninety-seven, and then add fifty per cent., which is the maximum of the assumed deficiency in the returns—thirty-three being the minimum, and fifty the maximum—and what is it? The addition of this fifty per cent. makes the whole population equal to one hundred and thirty-eight thousand seven hundred and ninety-five. Take from that number the ratio of representation, namely, ninety-three thousand seven hundred and twenty-one, and it leaves a fraction of a little over forty-five thousand. Now, the State of Louisiana has a fraction of over forty-six thousand, and the State of South Carolina has a still larger fraction, amounting to over forty-seven thousand. Can California, therefore, complain when we take the question even on these estimates, and concede everything which is assumed, even to its fullest extent?

Let us come down to the fact as proved. This thirty-three to fifty per cent. applies to the three counties of which the superintendent of the census of the State of California was speaking when he sent that communication to the Legislature of his own State, and with every disposition, no doubt, to increase the population so as to give the State a greater degree of political strength. And with these facts before me, after having fully investigated the matter, can I be reasonably called upon to violate a principle—an established and acknowledged principle—merely for the gratification of the people of California, unless, at the same time, I gratify the people of the States of South Carolina and Louisiana? That is the very question. Will we give to the State of Louisiana one Representative for her fraction of forty-six thousand, and one to South Carolina for her fraction of forty-seven thousand? And, sir, there is another State of this Union, which has a fraction of forty-three thousand.

Mr. BADGER. Which State is that?

Mr. DAWSON. I believe it is the State of Vermont. These are the facts; and I am willing, if I did not regard it a violation of principle, to do California justice—yea, more than justice—as we have always done. But they contend about the population. Sir, the reason why these large estimates are made by the gentlemen who have presented their letters as evidence before the committee, is, that many, very many, persons go to California without any design of making it their permanent residence. At least five hundred of my constituents, actual residents of the State of Georgia, are now in California. They go to the gold mines without any intention of remaining permanently in the State, and thus they come within the enumeration of the population of California. Every steamer that leaves our shores carries out a large number of this class of population; and if they were honest and patriotic citizens, when the marshal came round to take the enumeration, they would respond that they belonged to the old States. Sir, the transient population of California to-day is almost equal to the whole of the settled population of that State. Have gentlemen turned their attention to the number of families settled in California? Have they looked to the vote which was given for the Governor of that State, and then multiplied it by five, the usual mode of finding out the whole population of a State? And when you remember that there are at least ten males to one female, you will see that, notwithstanding there is an immense population there, it is not a resident population. I think this is fully understood by gentlemen; but, under my convictions of this matter, I am constrained to vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana. If either of these amendments should pass—if California gets another member—or rather, I should say, if she gets one more than she is entitled to by her present population, as it is known to us here, then I shall think myself under an obligation to vote for one for Louisiana; but I think the better plan is to adhere to principle; and I would ask, if the State of Georgia had a fraction of ninety-two thousand three hundred and seventy-one, only wanting one thousand to make her entitled to another Representative, whether, after establishing a principle, if another had a fraction nearly as great, you would not let that State have a Representative too?

Mr. WELLER. Although I am laboring under a hoarseness which, I know, will prevent me from being heard in the Senate; yet I should fail to discharge my duty, if I did not make some response to what has fallen from Senators on the other side of the question. I did not suppose that there was any person acquainted with the state of affairs in California, who seriously intended to strike down one of her Representatives in the other branch of the Legislature. This is a very important question, so far as the interests of California are concerned. It is always a question of importance when you regulate the political power that any State shall exercise in the National Legislature. California is begging nothing from you; she is only asking that she shall have her proper weight, her proper influence in the other branch of Congress, in the enactment of those laws by which her citizens and the rest of the American people are to be governed. She is only asking that, when you come to apportion out the political power of this Government, two hundred thousand men, standing upon the shores of the Pacific ocean, shall exercise the same political power as two hundred thousand standing upon the shores of the Atlantic.

We are only asking that that same meed of justice will be extended to us which is extended to other portions of the American family; for we form part of the American family—we are bone of your bone, and flesh of your flesh. We are planted on the shores of the Pacific, and stand under the protection of the same flag under which you stand—the flag that was never disgraced, never dishonored. The Senators on the other side are desirous of showing that California should be deprived of one of her Representatives. But why, sir? Before you undertake to strike down a member from a seat in the other branch of Congress, you ought to be sure that you have right and justice on your side. Have the people of California failed to discharge their duty? Is there any obligation resting on the authorities of California that they have not complied with? Who pretends it? Has there been an actual enumeration of the inhabitants of the State of California? Who says it? The Senator from Massachusetts says it; but the census agent does not say so. You have selected an officer under your law—under the law of the Federal Government, whose duty it was to take the enumeration of the population of California. You sent him there. We had no agency in his appointment or selection. You sent him there with the power of the Federal Government. How has he discharged that duty? What does the census agent himself say? He says—and my friend, the Senator from Georgia, skipped over this rather hastily—

“So erroneous, in fact, was the general impression then prevailing amongst the population residing there, regarding the northern boundary of the State, that a large population on the Klamath river was not enumerated, being supposed to be comprehended in the Territory of Oregon.”

There is the statement of the census agent that there was a large population residing on the banks of the Klamath river, which, because of the ignorance of the geography of the State, they supposed to be within the Territory of Oregon.

Now, if that population is within the limits of California, I ask you whether they ought not to be enumerated when you come to fix on the population of that State? The census agent tells you that there was a large population on the Klamath river, which was not enumerated, because they were supposed to be residents of the Territory of Oregon. Now, suppose—and I put this question in all fairness to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts—that an agent, appointed by the Government to take the census of his State, had failed to enumerate the population of several towns which lie on the frontier of that State; and suppose that he mentioned the fact in his report, that he had not enumerated the population of certain towns—naming them—because he supposed they were outside the limits of the State—would the Senator consider it fair—would he consider it just, on the part of Congress, to refuse to take evidence relative to the population of those towns which were not enumerated by the census agent?

Mr. DAVIS. Does the Senator consider me as refusing to receive evidence? I based my whole argument on the ground that we should receive any evidence necessary to make the corrections in the census as taken.

Mr. WELLER. If I comprehended the argument of the Senator upon the other side, it was this: that it was utterly impossible to rely upon the statements of Mr. McCorkle, or any other gentleman, however familiar he might be with the state of affairs in California; because you have the returns of the census agent, your own officer, which are quite different. I will show you the unfairness of the manner in which the Senator from Massachusetts quoted the statements of Mr. McCorkle. He affirms that we are seeking to set aside the returns of the census agent, because Mr. McCorkle has said:

“As an illustration of the gross inaccuracy of the census returns from California, I will give you my estimates of a few counties in the northern part of the State.”

The Senator from Massachusetts stopped there. I will read to you the balance, and that will show the degree of weight and importance to be attached to the declarations of Mr. McCorkle. The Senator from Massachusetts stopped in the middle of a sentence. The balance of the sentence is in these words:

“Counties with which I am perfectly familiar, and in which I have resided for the last two years and a half.”

Now, I ask why the Senator could not read that statement, and give it whole?

Mr. DAVIS. Does the Senator really suppose that I had any motive in stopping where I did, when the document was here, before the face of every one? I did not wish to spend the time in reading.

Mr. WELLER. There was but a line and a half more, and that was very important, for the reason that it states the ground upon which Mr. McCorkle based his opinion. The importance to be attached to the estimate, depends upon the means which he had of being familiar with the facts of which he speaks. He says, that he had resided in those very counties two years and a half, the population of which he has estimated. But my ingenious friend from Georgia, [Mr. Dawson,]—and he is very remarkable for his ingenuity—has construed this declaration of the census agent in this manner: that the thirty-three or fifty per cent. is to be added to the population returned in the counties of Trinity, Shasta, and Colusi. Let us read the statement. There is nothing about the language that the plainest understanding cannot comprehend. What is it?

“The result of this enumeration, when completed, will, with all reasonable probability, fall short of the entire population of the State, from thirty-three to fifty per cent.”

He says, “it will fall short of the entire population of the State, from thirty-three to fifty per cent.” Now, I ask upon what ground the Senator can assume that it was the intention of this agent to confine this expression to the counties of Trinity, Shasta, and Colusi?

Mr. DAWSON. I will answer the Senator with great pleasure. The marshal who wrote this letter to the Secretary of State of California, to be laid before the Legislature of that State, was a resident of San Francisco, I think.

Mr. WELLER. He resided at Sacramento.

Mr. DAWSON. It is quite immaterial. He was the responsible man; and if he was sworn to discharge his duties, and the returns have been made to him from twenty-two counties, by deputies sworn to discharge their duties, my construction was that that was at least prima facie evidence of the correctness of the returns, and that when he went on to identify a particular district, and said that this district had been imperfectly taken, and then said that the enumeration would necessarily fall short some thirty-three or fifty per cent., I drew the inference that the superintendent would consider that enumeration as correct which he had taken. The declaration with regard to the three counties induced me to draw that inference. But I took the estimated population of the twenty-two counties at ninety-two thousand five hundred and ninety-seven, and then added, first, thirty-three per cent., and then fifty per cent., so as to give California the utmost liberality, which I was desirous of doing, and I even added to that the twenty-five thousand and odd for the three counties, and it still left her short of the fractions of Louisiana and of South Carolina; for the fraction of California would then be but forty-five thousand, while that of Louisiana is forty-six thousand, and that of South Carolina is forty-seven thousand.

My object was not in the least to make an unfavorable impression, and when I commenced the calculation I was hopeful that the thirty-three per cent. would make for California a larger fraction than Louisiana has. But instead of that I found it to be smaller than that of either of the other States I have named. That was the reason I presented the view I did, and I intended to present it fairly and deal as liberally towards California as I possibly could, and as I am sure the Senator is well aware.

If you adopt that principle, the State which has the next lower fraction will want to come in; and thus you will establish a precedent which will control all future legislation on the subject, and the business of representation will not be settled so quietly as we intended when we established the law; because every Senator will feel constrained to make an effort to secure for his State a larger representation than she is entitled to whenever there happens to be a large fraction. Now, that we are about to carry this law into operation, let us stand on principle—a principle which may affect California now, and, at a future time, may affect the State which I represent. Some one of the States must be in the condition of South Carolina and Louisiana. It is their time now, and may be ours next. But, when the principle is once established, if there is no change, we shall get along smoothly. Hence, my determination now is to vote against both; but if one be adopted, I shall feel constrained to vote for the other, if I have an opportunity.

Mr. WELLER. I have no disposition to engage in the business of special pleading. The Senate can determine this question by looking at the phraseology of the sentence; but, as the Senator from Georgia has undertaken to cipher out this matter, I have one or two propositions to put to him, and I will be glad if he will take his pen and cipher them out.

Mr. DAWSON. I will.

Mr. WELLER. Then I ask the gentleman to turn to the tenth page of this report, and look at Exhibit A. He will find that, according to that table, the population of California is set down at one hundred and seventeen thousand three hundred and eighteen.

Mr. DAWSON. That includes San Francisco, Contra Costa, and Santa Clara.

Mr. WELLER. San Francisco, Contra Costa, and Santa Clara are in the table; but Tuolumne, San Diego, Los Angeles, and Klamath counties are not in it. There are four counties of the State, then, not included in this estimate of one hundred and seventeen thousand three hundred and eighteen. If the gentleman will turn back to the eighth page of the report, he will be able to find out, in part, what are the returns from Tuolumne. That county is set down partially at eight thousand three hundred and fifty-one. Los Angeles is set down at three thousand five hundred and thirty, and San Diego at seven hundred and ninety-eight. I am not able to say whether the county of Klamath was or was not then organized; it was taken off, I believe, from the county of Trinity. There are three of the oldest counties in the State which are not embraced within the estimate of one hundred and seventeen thousand. If you add to the one hundred and seventeen thousand three hundred and eighteen, the returns from Tuolumne as far as they have been received, the returns of Los Angeles and San Diego, and you have a total of one hundred and thirty thousand as the population of the State. I have said before that the census agent did not undertake to call this an enumeration of the State of California. The United States were required by law to make that enumeration. Did their agent make it? He says that, in these tables the returns were incomplete from Butte and Tuolumne counties. Is that an enumeration of the State of California? Is an enumeration of four or five precincts within the limits of a county, an enumeration of that county? When the agent comes in here himself and says to the Government, that he has only taken an enumeration of parts of counties of a portion of the State, I ask you whether you are to regard that as an enumeration of the State? I admit there would be great difficulty about this question, if we impeached, by collateral testimony or by secondary evidence, the correctness of the return of the agent.

Mr. DAWSON. For the purpose of showing my friend that I have looked into this matter, permit me to point him to the tables. At page 8 of the report, table No. 5, Butte county is put down as partially returned, and as having, according to those returns, a population of three thousand five hundred and seventy-four. According to exhibit A, page 10, Butte county has a population of four thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, and there is nothing said about partial returns. Then, in the same exhibit, the returns of the other counties, including San Francisco, Contra Costa, and Santa Clara, are given and added together, making an aggregate of one hundred and seventeen thousand three hundred and eighteen.

Mr. WELLER. But three counties are still to be added to that, making a population of one hundred and thirty thousand. Taking that estimate of one hundred and thirty thousand, and adding to it the lowest amount which the census agent says ought to be added, that is, thirty-three per cent., and you have the population of California as one hundred and seventy-two thousand, giving her the largest fraction of any State in the Union. I ask you, upon this showing, with what sort of justice and propriety can you strike from that State one of her Representatives in the other branch of Congress? The correctness of this return is impeached by the officer himself. It is true there is secondary evidence impeaching its correctness. There are declarations of men, who are familiar with that State, who undertake to say that no confidence is to be placed in it. It is true that it has been impeached by the legislative power of California, who have declared that the population of that State at that time was three hundred thousand. It is true that we as Senators here may know that there is no confidence to be placed in the estimate which has been sent in. But we do not rely upon that. We rely upon the declaration of the officer who was intrusted with the duty under the law that no confidence can be placed in it.

Now, I ask you, Mr. President, and I ask Senators, whether we are to be deprived of one of our Representatives because of the failure of your own officer to perform his duty? There has been no failure on the part of the people of California, but the man whom you sent to discharge this duty has failed to perform it. Would there be justice in making the people of California suffer, because the agent of your selection has failed to discharge his duty? And yet “to this complexion it must come at last.”

In order to deprive California of one Representative in the other branch of Congress, you must flatly contradict the return of your own officer. He says that there has not been an enumeration of the inhabitants of California; that he has only been able, because of the existence of an extraordinary state of things there, to obtain partial returns from some of the counties of that State. You are now asked to disbelieve him, and to assume that an enumeration of the whole State has been made. I ask whether you are to raise these presumptions in order to deprive a State of a Representative?

Sir, neither you nor I can tell what will be the population of that State before the next census is regularly taken in 1860. With the immense emigration that is now flowing into that country, nobody can estimate what will be its strength and power ten years hence. With its agricultural resources, and its commercial position, aside from its mineral wealth, ere that day shall arrive it must be one of the mightiest States of this Republic. I ask nothing from you as a matter of charity. I ask nothing from your sympathies; but I ask you to look at the evidence, to look at the return of your own officer, and upon that evidence to decide the important question whether the State of California shall lose a Representative in the other branch of Congress.

Mr. BRADBURY. The Senate will recollect that there are several other States that have large fractions. If we proceed to give a Representative to Louisiana for her fraction, New Hampshire will present herself with a fraction of thirty-six thousand seven hundred and seventy-one, and Vermont with a fraction of thirty-two thousand nine hundred and twenty-seven, and so with several other States. The principle upon which it is urged that the amendment in reference to California should be adopted is this: we have no accurate census of that State; and having no accurate census, we cannot fairly undertake to change the number of Representatives provided for her in the act for the admission of that State into the Union—a principle entirely different from the one upon which the honorable Senator from Louisiana relies. I hope, therefore, that his amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. DAWSON. I wish to say a few words, merely for the purpose of setting myself right. I wish to show that there is no difference about this matter when we understand each other as to time. Time is vastly important in this discussion. When the committee called upon the head of the Census Bureau in this city, he sent them the following information. It is dated February 25, 1852:

"I have the honor to send you a statement of the returns now received from California, by counties, with the amount of population carried out. It will be seen that the returns from two counties, Butte and Tuolumne, are incomplete, and that from three counties, Santa Clara, Contra Costa, and San Francisco, no returns have been received."

There are, then, but those five counties which have not been returned. Leaving them out, the population returned into the office was ninety-two thousand five hundred and ninety-seven. About that there is no dispute; that is official, and comes in as being the population on June 1st, 1850. When the census agent was corresponding with the Legislature of California, it was April, 1851. We have now got the returns from the three last counties, Contra Costa, Santa Clara, and San Francisco—twenty-five thousand and some odd hundred. Against those returns nothing has been said; adding them to the ninety-two thousand, we have a population for California of something over one hundred and seventeen thousand. Then there are these two other counties, Tuolumne and Butte, from which but partial returns had then been received. These two are spoken of by the gentleman who took the census, in his letter, or report, which is rather hard to be comprehended. When he spoke of the population, in 1851, to the Legislature of California, who were about to regulate their representation according to the enumeration, he said that the population had greatly increased. He thinks that thirty-three and a third or fifty per cent. ought to be added to it. Whether he applies that back to the time of taking the census, or to the condition of the population at the time he made his report, I do not know. But it is very evident that no allegation has been made against the returns of the twenty-four counties which have been actually received at the Census Bureau. To show that the county of Butte was at first but partially taken, you have but to refer to document No. 5, accompanying the report, where it is put down at four thousand seven hundred and eighty-six—it had previously been put down at three thousand five hundred and seventy-four—showing that the returns had been corrected. The returns, then, as corrected, added together, made up an aggregate of one hundred and seventeen thousand. For the purpose of putting myself right, a little while ago, I added the thirty-three and a third and fifty per cent. to the ninety-two thousand taken at the time when the census properly was taken, and I could not find that the fraction would be larger than that of Louisiana or South Carolina. I could not make it out so; and I have not had the matter sufficiently explained to me to enable me to come to the conclusion that California has a larger fraction than South Carolina or Louisiana. I shall, therefore, have to vote against the amendment.

Mr. GWIN. I would call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the letter of the agent himself as to the county of Butte. The Senator said that the returns from that county were complete.

Mr. DAWSON. No, sir; I say that they were changed from three thousand five hundred and seventy-four to four thousand seven hundred and eighty-six, and were said to be complete. I cannot tell how that is.

Mr. GWIN. I have here the last letter of the agent himself, after suits had been ordered to be brought against him for not having performed his duty. He says that he has a copy of the returns of Butte county, but declines transmitting it to the department, on account of its not being executed in accordance with the law, but that he has instructed his assistant to make out a copy in conformity with the law. That has never yet been received here. He also says that he has not made returns from Tuolumne county. The returns of Butte county were never completed.

Mr. RUSK. I cannot see that the proposition to give Louisiana a member, and the proposition to give California a member, are at all parallel, or stand upon the same footing. Nobody pretends to say that there has not been an actual enumeration in Louisiana. That actual enumeration has been returned, and taking the law and enforcing it as it is, Louisiana does not get an additional member for her fraction. She is therefore deprived of no right by not having one. If I were to be guided by my feelings in this matter, and not by my sense of duty, I should certainly vote to give Louisiana a member; but I am bound to act according to my sense of duty. The cases of California and Louisiana are not parallel. In the case of California, nobody pretends that there has been an actual enumeration of her inhabitants returned upon which we can act. The Constitution is imperative, that we shall make an actual enumeration of the inhabitants. Here the very agents that you sent out to make the enumeration, say they have not made it. The agent of the Census Bureau, who took the census, tells you himself that he has not been able to complete the enumeration. The facts of the case show that, so far as California is concerned, the Constitution has not been complied with, and no actual enumeration has been made. How, then, does the case stand? I am not disposed to extend favors, or to do injustice to California. I do not put it upon either ground. She was admitted here with certain privileges; one of those privileges was to be represented in the other branch of Congress by two members. That she has by law; and it is strictly constitutional. Now, can you deprive her of one of those members? Is it just to deprive her of one of them? What means have you to deprive her? The Constitution points out the means. You have a right to apportion her Representatives again, provided you do it according to an actual enumeration. Have you that actual enumeration produced? I cannot see it; and therefore I cannot vote to do her injustice. If we had a strictly complete and accurate enumeration of California, and that enumeration showed that she was entitled to but one member, there could be no question about it; but there has been no actual enumeration to show that.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have been somewhat struck by the remarks of the honorable Senator from Texas. I did not listen to the earlier stages of this debate, but, if I have understood the remarks of the gentleman aright now, it seems to me to be a very plain case. There is not, in my humble opinion, an accurate, and correct, and constitutional enumeration before us of the population of California; or in other words, there is not before us data that will enable us to increase or diminish the representation of that State. I hold that you must have this data before you can either increase or diminish the representation of a State. That is the ground upon which the gentleman has put it. I think we cannot patch up the returns of the census, as the attempt is made to do here. Take the case of Massachusetts. Suppose there had been no enumeration of the population in that State at all. How is that State in that case to be treated? You are not authorized to increase her representation. You have no data on which to increase it. You are not authorized to diminish it. You have no data that will authorize you to do that. In my judgment you must have the enumeration before you; you must have data of such a character as to authorize you either to increase or to diminish. If you have not such data, then you must leave the representation of the State as it stands—permit it to remain as it is. How is California in that case? She has two members. According to my view, you cannot take away one of those members upon a mere supposition, without doing injustice to that State; and you cannot increase the representation, for you have no enumeration to justify it; therefore you must leave the matter as if no enumeration had been made, and no census taken—as if we knew nothing of the population there. That being the case, it occurs to me that the condition of California does not affect South Carolina at all. California stands upon her own basis—upon her own merits. South Carolina, by the law as it now stands, is entitled to her Representative. There is no question about that. The condition of California, which is irregular, ought not to change, in any respect, the rule as to South Carolina. That is the consideration which will govern my vote.

I am willing, therefore, as there is no enumeration—no correct and perfect enumeration—in this case that will justify us in changing the condition of California, to let that State remain as she is—keep her status—the one you have given her when you brought her into the Union. You are not authorized to change that except upon some data. The data must be regular, must be correct, must be as perfect as your agents can make them, before you can change her condition. Then let California stand as she is until you have that data, and let South Carolina have the member to which she is entitled by the law as it now stands. But I cannot go further than that. I cannot, as I now feel, vote an additional member to the State represented by the honorable gentleman from Louisiana, though I should be glad to do so. I think that the law, as it now stands, gives South Carolina a clear title, without any change, to this Representative. As you have no returns from California upon which you can base a correct and satisfactory action, you must permit California to remain as she is until you have these returns, and not change her condition.

Mr. BELL. I wish to make a single inquiry of the honorable Senator from Texas, and also of the honorable Senator from Illinois. If they are right, I certainly do not understand this question. I do not profess to have investigated it with so much care as the gentlemen who have discussed it. I do not perceive that South Carolina must be entitled, under the act of 1850, to a member for her fraction. If it be true that we have no ground upon which to deprive California of two members, I think the argument is strong, and it would be very difficult to refute it, inasmuch as by the act we have passed for the admission of California into the Union, we have provided that she shall be allowed two members until the next enumeration of the inhabitants shall be made under the Constitution. Well, upon what assumption was that law enacted? It was enacted upon the assumption by Congress, that from the facts then before Congress, California was fairly entitled to two members, according to her population. The ratio, then, I believe, was seventy-two thousand. We assumed then, at all events, that she had twice the number of seventy-two thousand, and we provided that she should continue to hold two members in the House of Representatives until an actual enumeration. I have not heard it disputed yet, though I think the honorable Senator from Georgia, in his first argument, intimated that that was not a true state of the case; that the officer of the United States who took the census himself, admits that there is no actual enumeration of the inhabitants of California; that it is imperfect; that it is partial; that some sections of the country had not been returned at all. If that be the case, there is no actual enumeration of the inhabitants of California.

We have a law upon the statute-book providing that until there is that actual enumeration, under the Constitution, California shall be entitled to two Representatives. Then we have the act of 1850, providing that the whole number of Representatives shall not exceed two hundred and thirty-three; consequently we are in a dilemma in regard to California. We cannot very well reduce her number, because she may stand up here and say you gave us by law two Representatives, upon the presumption that we had a population sufficient to entitle us to them, and that we should have them until there was an actual enumeration. She might very well, then, ask us under what authority we could proceed to say that we had allowed her too many Representatives heretofore. It is a violation of the condition on which California was admitted into the Union, if you divest her of one Representative before you have enumerated the inhabitants under the Constitution. Now, I should like to know from my friend from Georgia whether he has reexamined the tables and documents, and is prepared to say that the officers of the United States have reported that they have made a perfect enumeration of the inhabitants of California, according to the act passed for that purpose.

Mr. DAWSON. There are twenty-four counties which have been enumerated.

Mr. BELL. Has their census been taken perfectly or imperfectly?

Mr. DAWSON. It is stated that the census has been imperfectly taken in some of the counties.

Mr. BELL. So I understand. It is an imperfect enumeration. There is no actual enumeration, and we cannot indulge in speculations or conjectures as to how many more inhabitants there were in California than were enumerated. We cannot assume that the officers of the Government have done their duty without giving great dissatisfaction to the people of California. We cannot reduce the number of her Representatives without leaving it to her people to say that it is a violation of the law under which she was admitted into the Union. How, then, is the case left under the act of 1850?

The honorable Senator from Illinois, and the honorable Senator from Texas, seemed to go upon the assumption that South Carolina is entitled, under the act of 1850, to a member for her fraction. The act of 1850 provides that the whole number of Representatives shall not exceed two hundred and thirty-three. If you are bound, then, to allow out of that two hundred and thirty-three, two members for California, then there is no fraction to be represented for South Carolina under the act of 1850. And it seems to me that we come back to the question stated by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. It is a question whether you will allow South Carolina to have the benefit of her fraction, or will let the representation stand as provided by the law, which already provides two Representatives for California until you make an enumeration under the Constitution. If California is entitled to two members, then, under the act of 1850, South Carolina is not entitled to a Representative for her fraction, and you will have the full number of two hundred and thirty-three, without giving her a member for her fraction. If this enumeration had been completed, and we could then see that California ought to be divested of one of her members, South Carolina would, of course, be entitled to a member for her fraction, and it would be a hardship to deprive her of it; but until that time, it seems to me that South Carolina has no just right to complain, because the act of 1850 having been passed in anticipation of an actual enumeration, she took the risk of being unrepresented on a large fraction. Louisiana stands on ground affording scarcely less reason for complaint on her part. It does seem to me that if we depart from the act of 1850, and allow two hundred and thirty-four members for the House of Representatives, it might be a very serious inconvenience. It might turn out to be a great inconvenience in having an even number. If we were to have one member more, it would still further unsettle the ratio established by the act of 1850; but even that seems to me preferable to allowing the even number two hundred and thirty-four. I would ask, again, the honorable Senators from Illinois and Texas upon what ground they take it for granted that South Carolina is entitled to an additional member on her fraction of forty-seven thousand? It seems to me that the contest is between South Carolina and California, and if the case is so situated that we cannot deprive California of one of her Representatives, then, under the act of 1850, South Carolina is not entitled to a Representative for her fraction.

Mr. RUSK. That would be true, if by this bill it was proposed to give representation to California; but that is not so. The amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Maine is, that the representation from California, in consequence of the incorrect returns from that State, shall stand at what it is now. By the act of admission, she was entitled to two Representatives. Nobody disputes the constitutionality of that. I admit the fact suggested by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, that we get into difficulty by not having correct returns from California. We are in difficulty in determining what number shall be divided by two hundred and thirty-three, so as to give the ratio of representation. That is a difficulty which is in our way, and it is not very easy to get clear of it. I propose to get clear of it by taking the returns as we have them made to us. The point is not very material, because it will only make a very slight change in the number which is to be divided by two hundred and thirty-three, in order to get the ratio.

Mr. BELL. Still it unsettles the matter, and that is my objection to it.

Mr. RUSK. If you make up for California, and exclude South Carolina, you commit a greater error, because you have to assume, not only that the returns of California are not correct, but that they give her a fraction larger than that of South Carolina.

Mr. SHIELDS. I admit the dilemma as stated by the Senator from Tennessee. We must get out of it in some way. Now, I assume that the case of California is an abnormal case, as it were; that you must provide for it by itself, as if there were no law on the question, it being a peculiar case. The question, then, is this: Will you leave her without any representation? Will you increase her representation, or will you diminish it? What data have you to do either of these? Then you must legislate for California precisely as if there were no law in existence in regard to the subject. You must make a law and apply it to the particular case.

Every one admits that South Carolina is entitled to a Representative under the general law. Her fraction entitles her to that. You must, therefore, let South Carolina have that to which she is entitled; for any derangement, any confusion, any irregularity that has occurred in California ought not to deprive South Carolina of a member for her fraction. It would be unjust to deprive her of her member. I agree that you have to abandon your law; that you must provide for California as a separate case, and legislate for it by itself.

Mr. HALE. I feel no desire to do anything here, except to vote as I ought to vote on this subject. But it strikes me that there have been one or two mistaken views presented by several gentlemen who have spoken on this subject. Some of them have gone upon the idea that some of the States now have a vested right to one Representative in Congress under existing laws, and they speak of depriving a State. That is not so. The statute under which the several States are represented in the present House of Representatives expires by itself when the seventh enumeration is made. And the act under which the members of that body now hold their seats is entitled "An act for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States according to the Sixth Census." The Constitution requires the census to be taken once in every ten years. Then that act is dead. If I may be excused for using two Latin words, it is functus officio.

Mr. BADGER. Not exactly, for the new apportionment will not take effect until the 3d of March next.

Mr. HALE. It has performed everything, or it will have performed everything, by the expiration of the present Congress; and, without some new legislation, no State can be represented in the next House of Representatives. The State of

New Hampshire, from which I come, will have, in the next House of Representatives, but three members; but then she is not deprived of any Representative, because the present act will have expired by that time: and to find out what she is entitled to, she will have to look to the seventh enumeration, which the Constitution requires to be made, and to the legislation of Congress, which is necessary to give efficiency to the provision of the Constitution. It is perfectly idle to talk of California, or any other State, being deprived of a Representative, because she does not get as many under the seventh, as under the sixth enumeration. I beg gentlemen to lay aside any idea of depriving California, New Hampshire, or South Carolina, of a Representative. They are not deprived of a Representative until they are deprived of one to which they are entitled under the seventh enumeration, and the acts of Congress which have been, or may be passed in accordance with it. There can be no possible view of the case, in which it may be said, that California is absolutely and certainly entitled to two Representatives; and that, if she does not have two, she will be deprived of her rights—unless we look at it as a part of the great compromise measures which saved the Union; and, looking on this as a finality which would be disturbed by taking away one of the members of California. I do not suppose anybody takes that view of the subject. I am perfectly willing, if there is any good proof on which her claim can be established, to give California an additional member; but it must be upon some competent evidence.

If the evidence is sufficient to authorize us to proceed to give to California another Representative than the one provided for, it must be because we have evidence to satisfy us that she has the necessary population, while the same evidence must satisfy us that no other State, not having a fraction so large as California, can have a Representative for that fraction. It seems to me that is perfectly plain, unless we are going to abandon entirely the law we passed for the taking of the Seventh Census. If we abandon the whole of it, and say that the number of Representatives shall not be two hundred and thirty-three, which is the number fixed by that law, but that it shall be some other number, will not other States, upon the same principle, come in with their fractions of thirty-six thousand, of thirty-eight thousand, or of forty-five thousand, and ask that the question may be reconsidered, and claim an additional member in the general division which we are going to make?

It seems to me, that if we are to proceed under the Constitution and under the law, the question is, whether there is sufficient evidence to satisfy us that California has a larger fraction than South Carolina? If you have got that evidence, then give her the Representative, because she is entitled to it. If there is the evidence to satisfy the Senate that she is entitled to it, and you do not give it to her, then, and not till then, you deprive her. But the very same moment you come to that conclusion, it seems to me, if there is anything in the evidence, you come also to the conclusion that South Carolina is not entitled to the Representative.

We live in a day of compromises; and I have no sort of fear that we shall get into any difficulty here. It is said that we have got into a dilemma. Well, the way to get out of a dilemma is easy, particularly after the experience of the last two years. It is by compromising. I suppose there will be a compromise here. Inasmuch as California is not willing to give up her Representative, because she thinks she has evidence enough to entitle her to it, and South Carolina is not willing to give up what she thinks she is entitled to, as the record now stands, we shall settle the matter; it seems to me manifest destiny will settle it. They will both take the Representative. That is the result to which we shall come. That is the result to which we point. But when we do that, let me tell gentlemen they take a wide departure from the Constitution, and they open a very wide door. I believe it will be the first time, to say the least of it, that Congress has ever undertaken to give a Representative over and above what was shown to be due by the actual enumeration which they had made. That will not be the case in regard to California, if you say that you have evidence enough to satisfy you that the enumeration has not been made. But, in the case of South Carolina, it will be manifestly giving a Repre-representative as it now stands. I confess the matter is difficult. I do not know exactly how to get out of the difficulty. If I had not been in the Senate for the last two or three years, and seen the way in which we can get out of the most difficult labyrinths into which we can possibly be thrown, I would have no faith in it. But pass any act you please, and call it a compromise, and it will lead us safely through the difficulty, and glorify the authors of it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think I can tell the gentleman how to get out of the dilemma, by reading to him a clause of the Constitution, and making a few remarks upon it. The Constitution says:

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons."

There is the great constitutional rule. It says that Congress shall apportion Representatives and impose direct taxes according to federal numbers. That is the rule. That is the essence of the Constitution. But now it is asked how are the numbers to be ascertained? The subsequent parts of the Constitution are merely directory. The subsequent parts of the Constitution say that during every ten years you shall make an enumeration—an actual enumeration is the language. But these are directions of an executive character, given for the purpose of obtaining information on which you are to act. The difficulty in this case is that it is said that you have not got the information—you have not got the actual enumeration. Admit it—what then are you to do? If you have not got precisely what the Constitution has directed, what are you to do? I say that, like every other case, you are to take the best evidence of which the case is susceptible. You are bound to carry out the injunction of the Constitution—to apportion the representation according to federal numbers. The rule is given by which you shall inquire and ascertain these numbers. The rule, it is said, has not been accurately observed in this case. In the absence of the required information, which you would obtain by the execution of the rule, what are you to do? You are to get the next best testimony that you can, and, when you have got it, you are to execute the great injunction of the Constitution.

Let me now advert to a case. There are in Tennessee, by way of illustration, three districts—Eastern, Middle, and Western Tennessee. Suppose the marshal of the middle district of Tennessee should make no return at all, but that the marshals of the eastern and western districts make their returns. Then you would have the constitutional information upon which to do justice to Eastern and Western Tennessee; but you would lack the information as regards Central Tennessee. What are you to do in such a case? May you not consider that correct information as far as it goes? and then, may you not go into an estimate of the probable increase of the middle section, by comparing the increase in the various decimal periods for ten, twenty, or thirty years back, and make an estimate in that way? You may do that. You can thus use the information as far as you have obtained it, and you can use the rate of increase by comparison, taking the different preceding decades and making a rule; or, if you please, you may resort to the statements which gentlemen conversant with the middle district of Tennessee may make. All this, you perceive, will be adopting the second grade of evidence. It is approximating—doing the best you can in executing the great constitutional rule.

Suppose, now, the case which has been put in regard to Massachusetts. Suppose there was no return at all made of Massachusetts. What would you do in such a case? Then you must of necessity cut down the State to the one Representative allowed by the Constitution, under all circumstances; for the Constitution says each State shall have at least one Representative; or if you enlarge her above one Representative, you must do it by endeavoring to ascertain the population of the State. May you not, in pursuing this investigation as I have suggested, ask yourselves, has the State increased since the last census, which was accurately taken, or has it fallen off? Suppose that, by comparing two or three preceding decades, you should find that the State had been standing still—had neither increased nor fallen off—might you not consider the relative situation of the population at different decennial periods, for the purpose of ascertaining whether you ought to take the population returned ten years before, or adopt a different rule? It is clear to my mind that in a case of that sort, if no return should be made from Massachusetts, it would not follow that you should reduce the State down to one Representative, but you may take the population of the preceding ten years, and compare it with periods of ten years for twenty or thirty years back, and by this comparison Congress might come to a conclusion as to what it would be right to allow the State. Without going into any calculation—without intending to go upon the figures which gentlemen in various parts of the Hall have presented, it does seem to me that it is our duty to ascertain, as between South Carolina and California, which is entitled to this member, and to adhere to the number two hundred and thirty-three, at which the House of Representatives was fixed by the law of the last Congress.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, it seems to me that a part of this discussion has proceeded upon a misreading, or at least upon a misconception, of certain words of the Constitution. It is as to the meaning attached to the terms, "actual enumeration." Some Senators have used the word "actual," here, as synonymous with, and equivalent to, the word "accurate;" thus proceeding upon the assumption or supposition, that prescribed an "accurate enumeration." Such is not the language, and such could not have been the meaning of the Constitution. While it was certainly desired, and was as certainly contemplated by the Constitution that accuracy in the enumeration should be sought, and must be at least approximated, it as certainly was not prescribed in terms, and is not attainable in practice. If such a requirement had been made, it could not have been complied with. It is utterly impracticable. It will not do to assume that because the Constitution requires "an actual enumeration" upon which to make the apportionment, and because California is found not to have had an accurate enumeration of her population, therefore there has been no such enumeration as prescribed by the Constitution. The effect of that would be to exclude the returns from every State in the Union; for, I apprehend there is not a Senator here who will not say that the enumeration of the population in his State has not been accurate. I can safely say that it has not been so in my own State. I am satisfied that the Senator from Texas [Mr. Rusk] will say that it has not been accurate in his State by a very large number, perhaps forty, or fifty, or sixty thousand. The Senator from Texas asserts to the extent of sixty thousand. There has been an "actual enumeration" for California, in view of the Constitution, precisely as there has been in the other States. There has been a count there, and that is what the Constitution means by "actual enumeration;" but whether that count has been accurate or not, is another question.

Mr. WELLER. It is not contended, in the case of California, on the face of the returns that they are full. It is in regard to the other States.

Mr. BORLAND. This view, I have so far presented, does not affect, at all, the vote I shall give upon the proposition before the Senate. I suggest it to show the manner in which I arrive at the conclusion which determines my vote. It brings me to the conclusion, that South Carolina is entitled, beyond dispute, to an additional Representative. I assume what we are bound to assume, unless we undertake to revise the returns from all the States, and decide upon the accuracy of all that the returns from all the States constitute an "actual enumeration," under the act of 1850, passed in compliance with the Constitution.

This "actual enumeration," of all the States, clearly entitles South Carolina, as she has the largest fraction, to an additional Representative. Although we might undertake to repeal the act of 1850, to strike it out from the statute-book, we could not deprive South Carolina of the Representative to which that act, by virtue of the Constitution, has given her. It has become her right by virtue of a law passed by the Congress of the United States in conformity with the Constitution, and we cannot now deprive her of that right. It is hers, by our constitutional act, and beyond our control.

We are, also, in my opinion, equally precluded from taking advantage of California to her injury, by an act which must be called "our own wrong." In the sense I take the words, the returns from that State are defective and inaccurate; yet, in view of the Constitution, and of the act of 1850, and for all legal effect, constitute an "actual enumeration." But their inaccuracy is our fault, and not that of California; and as the effect of that fault of ours, unless corrected and counteracted by us, will inflict serious injustice and injury upon her, there is nothing clearer to my mind, or more binding upon my sense of justice, than the obligation upon us to afford her protection in the only way now in our power.

Mr. BELL. I should like to ask the honorable Senator why it is that he says that South Carolina has a vested right under this act? Let me read him the words of the act of 1850:

"That so soon as the next and each subsequent enumeration of the inhabitants of the several States, directed by the Constitution of the United States to be taken, shall be completed and returned to the office of the Department of the Interior, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain the aggregate representative population of the United States," &c.

Now, I want to ask him, has that ever been done?

Mr. DOWNS. Returns have been made.

Mr. BELL. But have they ever been completed? When I was up before, I meant merely to state that I saw no vested right in this case at all. What I objected to was the unsettling of the number, two hundred and thirty-three, which was fixed for the House of Representatives. I say that there is no vested right about the matter under this act. I assume that ground; and I should like the honorable Senator to allow it to be inquired of the Secretary of the Interior whether he has made any report upon this subject—whether there has been a complete enumeration according to the words of the act of 1850?

Mr. BORLAND. I will answer the honorable Senator according to my knowledge and understanding of the act. It is very certain that the act of 1850 meant, by the completion of the returns, the close or ending of the official action of the agents employed by the Secretary of the Interior to take the enumeration. It could have no other meaning. It would not apply to the accuracy of returns; and of course meant a performance of the duty, and a return of what the officers had done. Then commenced the duty of the Secretary of the Interior, which was to take these returns, which constituted the "actual enumeration" which the Constitution requires, ascertain their aggregates by addition, and then divide them by two hundred and thirty-three, to determine the ratio of representation as required by the act of 1850. These were not to be, and were not, arbitrary acts of the Secretary; nor was the number to be ascertained by the addition and division an arbitrary number, at his discretion. The "actual enumeration" was prescribed by the Constitution, was provided for by the act of 1850, and was "completed" by the returns being made by the marshals to the Secretary of the Interior. Upon the occurrence of this series of events, the whole "actual enumeration" was complete, the ratio of representation was fixed, and the number of Representatives to each was determined. The further action of the Secretary was ministerial only, and was to be performed by a very simple arithmetical calculation, whereby the aggregate of the returns was to be divided by two hundred and thirty-three, and the result, or in arithmetical language, the "quotient," was the ratio of representation; and then the division of the returns, or "actual enumeration" of each State respectively, by this "quotient," or ratio, ascertained the number of Representatives due of right, by virtue of the Constitution, and under the act of 1850.

I wish the Senator from Tennessee to understand that I proceed upon the ground that an "actual enumeration," whether accurate or not, is what is prescribed and intended by the Constitution. Upon this "actual enumeration," without regard to its accuracy, of which he has no power to judge, the Secretary of the Interior was bound, under the law, to make the addition and then the division; and thereby having ascertained, not fixed, the ratio and the representation, to announce the result to the country, so that each State should learn her rights, and conform her action to them.

I find no fault of the Secretary of the Interior, for not having performed that duty at once. I find no fault of him for deferring his own final action, until he had communicated to Congress a statement of what he could not have failed to see was the great injustice and injury to be inflicted upon California, as a consequence of the defective and inaccurate returns of the "actual enumeration" he had received from our officers in that State. What I mean, however, is to say that, in my opinion, the law left him no discretion. He was bound, upon the receipt of the returns, whether they were accurate or not, to make the addition and divisions, and announce the result. That is my idea of the requirement of the law, and of the Secretary's duties under it. But, under the circumstances I have mentioned, he very properly postponed the performance of these duties to afford Congress an opportunity, by further legislation, to interpose a remedy for our own wrong in a matter deeply affecting the interest of a sovereign State. This was proper in itself from the magnitude of the interest involved, and could, in no way, do harm, as there was ample time to do justice to all parties. I repeat, the law did actually require him to proceed; and he had, strictly speaking, no legal right whatever to defer it for one moment after he received the returns, and he would have been responsible for any injury to the public interest which such postponement might have occasioned, had he acted indiscreetly; yet he has done well under the circumstances, as he has contributed to save one of the States of this Union from suffering, and the Federal Government from inflicting grievous wrong.

While, therefore, Mr. President, I insist that the right of South Carolina to the additional Representative which the fraction (being the largest) gives her, by authority of the Constitution, as exemplified under the act of 1850, accrues to her, and is beyond our control; I insist, with equal earnestness, that we owe a duty to California which we cannot disregard, or refuse to perform. That she had a population sufficient to entitle her to two Representatives, when we admitted her into the Union, in 1850, is, I apprehend, not disputed. At any rate, we, here, in our legislative capacity, can neither dispute nor refuse to acknowledge it. We declared it to be the fact, by the most solemn act of legislation. It is "a fixed fact," then, for us. And it will be as little disputed, as I apprehend, that she has as large a population now as she had then. Her Representatives claim that she has more. But admit it to be equal, and there is the same reason to allow her two Representatives now, as there was then. Sir, I do believe she has, now, enough population to entitle her to two Representatives under the new apportionment. I am willing, therefore, she shall have them. If the returns do not show it, the fault is ours, not hers; and I will not consent—in my opinion, we have no right—to take advantage of it, of our own wrong, to inflict injustice and injury upon her, or any other State of this Union. And in making an arrangement, by which her rights will be secured, and our duty performed, I meet no difficulty whatever. I think the proposition now before us, is a simple, plain, and proper one. Let all the other States stand as the "actual enumeration" has placed them; for, besides being "actual," their enumerations are, at least, approximately accurate, also. And then let us, by amending the act of 1850, as we have the undoubted power to do, increase the aggregate number of Representatives to two hundred and thirty-four, and assign the additional one to California.

Mr. DOWNS. Some arguments have been advanced to which, as a member of the committee, I feel it my duty to reply; and especially the remarks of the Senator from Texas and the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CHASE. If the honorable Senator will give way, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. DOWNS. If it is the wish of the Senate, I will give way.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 7, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER stated, as the first business in order, the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] made on yesterday, that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. GOODENOW asked the unanimous consent of the House to enable him to present the resolves of the Legislature of the State of Maine, in support of the memorial to Congress, asking the assistance of the United States Government in behalf of the European and North American Railway.

Mr. GORMAN objected.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I wish to suggest, if the House will consent to it, that the morning hour shall be occupied in the reception of reports from committees.

Mr. POLK. I withdraw my motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

DISCIPLINE IN THE NAVY.

The SPEAKER. The motion being withdrawn, the first business in order is the consideration of the bill providing discipline for the Navy, on which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOGOCCK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOGOCCK. If that bill is passed over informally, will it be the first business in order to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. BOGOCCK. The substitute offered by my colleague from the Norfolk district, [Mr. MILLSON,] and also the substitute offered by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee,] were expected to have been printed by this morning, so that the whole subject should have been before the House. I desired that to have been done, before I submitted to the House the remarks which I propose to make upon the subject. This has not, however, been done; and as it is evidently the disposition of the House to proceed to other business, I would suggest that, by unanimous consent, the bill be passed over informally.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. ALLISON moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the special order.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that there is a very large number of reports in the hands of committees, ready to be submitted to the House; and that it would very much facilitate business if they could be received this morning, by unanimous consent.

Mr. DOTY. Will the Speaker inform the House what is the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business this morning, is the call of committees for reports, beginning with the Committee on Public Lands. A motion, however, is submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALLISON,] that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and that motion is in order.

The question was then taken on Mr. ALLISON's motion, and it was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER then announced that reports were in order from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HENN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill "for the relief of C. L. Swazey, in relation to the location of certain Choctaw scrip;" which was read twice by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

SALINE LANDS IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. HENN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back Senate bill No. 19, "to extend the time for selecting the lands granted to the State of Wisconsin for saline purposes," without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. H. said: This is a bill to which there can be no objection. It merely extends the time for selecting the saline lands granted to the State of Wisconsin. If it is the wish of the House, I think it ought to be put upon its passage now.

The bill having been read through, was ordered to a third reading, and subsequently read the third time and passed.

WABASH AND MISSOURI RAILROAD.

Mr. HENN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back House bill No. 118, "granting the right of way and making a grant of land in aid of the construction of a railroad from the Wabash to the Missouri river," with sundry amendments, and with a recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill do pass.

Mr. H. said: In reporting this bill, I will merely say for the present, that this is a bill of a great deal of importance—and particularly to the central portion of the United States, commencing at Philadelphia, and extending, in connection with other roads, to the Missouri river. It is one for which, I think, all Pennsylvanians can vote, and it has been made to conform to the other bills of a similar nature which have been reported from the Committee on Public Lands. Were it not that this House has determined to refer all these bills to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I should ask that this bill might be put upon its passage now. But as that has been the action of the House in regard to other bills of a similar nature, I will move that this bill and the amendments be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that they be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ATLANTIC, GULF, AND CENTRAL RAILROAD.

Mr. ORR, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill "granting the right of way and making a donation of a portion of the public land to the State of Florida, for the benefit of the Atlantic, Gulf, and Central Railroad, and for other purposes."

The bill having been read the first time by its title,

Mr. HOUSTON said: Before the bill is read the second time, I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from South Carolina, who has reported this bill, or else to ask for the reading of the bill, with a view to raise a point of order which it is probably proper to raise now, if at all. I understand this to be a bill—

Mr. ORR, (interrupting.) I do not know by what right the gentleman takes the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to object to the second reading of the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. I thought I had distinctly stated the reason why I took the floor.

The SPEAKER. If, however, discussion is to follow, the gentleman from South Carolina is certainly entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not proposing to discuss the bill. I do not intend to do it.

Mr. ORR. I had hoped the gentleman would have allowed the bill to be read, before he commenced the discussion.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not propose to discuss it.

Mr. ORR. Well, then, let the bill be read the second time.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think now is the time to get the information I desire. To save time, I wish to inquire of the gentleman from South Carolina whether this bill has a section in it, abolishing the duty on railroad iron?

Mr. ORR. The gentleman will ascertain that fact when the bill is read through.

Mr. HOUSTON. If it is there, I take it for granted the gentleman does not want to conceal it.

Mr. ORR. Certainly not.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I do not see the profit to be obtained by the gentleman's diplomacy. If that provision is in the bill, I desire to raise a point of order now, and I therefore ask that the bill may be read through the first time. I have a right to have the bill read through entirely; and if the gentleman will not give me the information which I desire, I ask that it may be read.

Mr. ORR. I should have no objection to give the gentleman the information he seeks, but it is certainly a very unusual proceeding in this House for a gentleman to rise in his place and attempt to catechise the member of the committee reporting the bill before the second reading of the bill. If it is proposed to debate the bill, the debate should ensue after the second reading.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman will allow me to state the facts, I do not think he will call the course I have pursued either unusual or improper. I understand there is a section in that bill pro posing to abolish the duty on railroad iron, and if that be true, I intend to make the point of order whether it is competent for the Committee on Public Lands to report to this House a bill of that sort.

Mr. ORR. If that is the purpose of the gentleman from Alabama, I will state to him that there is a section in the bill proposing to abolish all duties upon railroad iron.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I rise to a point of order, and I will state my point of order, though I do not desire to argue it at all. It is this: that the bill reported from the Committee on Public Lands is one to modify the tariff—to modify the duty upon one or more articles embraced in the revenue laws of the country.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will suspend for a moment, the bill will be read through, so that the Chair and the House may understand its provisions.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is not an alternate section bill, but a bill to modify the tariff.

The Clerk then read the bill, in which was included the following section, viz:

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the iron for the construction of this and all other railroads in the United States, or the Territories thereof, may be imported free of all duty: Provided, nevertheless, That in all cases hereafter, whenever it is proposed to claim the exemption from duty in case of the importation of iron for such purposes, it shall be the duty of the person or persons importing the same to give bond in such manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, conditioned to show that within three years from the time of said importation the said iron has been laid down for permanent use on some railroad; or, in the event of failure to make it so appear, then the person or persons importing said iron to be required to pay double the rates of duty now required by law: Provided further, That in the event of it being made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that the omission to lay down said rails has not occurred by reason of any fraudulent purpose to evade the payment of the prescribed rate of duty on such iron, that then it shall be his duty to give further and reasonable time for the bona fide application of said iron to the purposes of railroads.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That all duties now due on account of the importation of iron for railroads be and the same are hereby remitted: Provided, however, That in all such cases the importation shall be in the name and for the use of some legally incorporated railroad company, or for a State or Territory of the United States."

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire now to call the attention of the Chair to the rules in relation to committees.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. With the permission of the gentleman from Alabama, I ask for the reading of the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

"A bill granting the right of way and making a donation of a portion of the public lands to the State of Florida for the benefit of the Atlantic, Gulf, and Central Railroad, and for other purposes."

Mr. HOUSTON. I predicate my point of order, first upon the rules of the House. By looking to the rule in reference to the Committee on Public Lands, the House and the Chair will see that it provides, that:

"It shall be the duty of the Committee on Public Lands to take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things respecting the lands of the United States as shall be presented, or shall or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House; and to report their opinion thereon, together with such propositions for relief therein as to them shall seem expedient."

It is made the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to take charge of the reference from the House of all propositions relative to the revenues of the Government.

Those two rules define what is the duty of each committee; and it is evident to my mind, that without a reference of this express subject particularly and distinctly to some other committee than the Ways and Means, that that other committee has not the charge of it.

The subject embraced in the latter sections of this bill, is one that has already been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and is now before that committee; and the Committee on Public Lands has no legitimate connection with it, either under the rules of the House or under any order of this House making that reference. But, sir, I do not propose to make an argument until the Chair has decided the point of order. But I would call the attention of the Chair to the decision made at the first session of the last Congress, in the case of the homestead bill—a bill reported from the Committee on Public Expenditures, and such a bill, I believe, as we have now got before us in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. A point of order was made by Mr. Vinton, objecting to the reception of the bill on the ground that the subject-matter of the bill had not been referred to the committee which reported it to the House, either by resolution or by the rules of the House. That is the precise point of order which I make now. The Speaker stated the point of order made by Mr. Vinton, and decided that the bill was not in order. From this decision of the Chair, Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, appealed, and the question being put, the decision of the Chair was sustained as the judgment of the House, and the bill was not received by the House.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The result of the course proposed to be pursued by the gentleman who is at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means, will be very apparent at one glance. It will be this: If committees are confined strictly and directly to those particular questions and duties which are assigned to them, and are not permitted to take action on questions incidental to those which are assigned to them, this House may be placed in such a situation that matters of the highest importance to the nation cannot be brought before us at all.

Now, suppose we had a Committee of Ways and Means that would not or could not give to this House any distinct proposition on this subject—and it might exist in regard to other subjects as well as this—the consequence would be that this House never could get before it for consideration any matter, however vital, or however important to the interests of the people.

Sir, a committee is entitled to consider not only those subjects that come directly and legitimately before it, under the rules, but it is also entitled to consider everything incidental to those subjects.

Now, sir, the gentleman who is at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means, by pursuing the course which he proposes, would confirm a system which is wrong and corrupt—a system by which the whole of the important and national business that comes before this House would go to one committee, and no other committee could get hold of it at all. That must be the result, though there be precedent on precedent for the practice.

Now, for my own part, I desire to enter a protest against gentlemen coming here, upon a bill like this, which is complete in itself, and saying that a subject contained in it is not in order, when the whole of the bill is introduced as an original proposition. This committee, in the discharge of their duty in regard to the public lands, have reported a bill granting lands for the purpose of constructing a railroad—a subject-matter which, by common consent, comes properly before them. As incidental to that purpose, they have included a provision in the bill exempting from duty the iron necessary in the construction of said road. Shall the committee be curtailed of the power which, by common consent, has been conceded to them—that is, of reporting a bill for the purpose of constructing a railroad? If not, then why deprive them of the incident, which is one of the highest importance and necessity to the execution of any scheme upon the part of this Government in aid of the construction of railroads? It cannot be. This is a matter entirely incidental to the subject which properly comes before that committee.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If the gentleman will permit me, I wish to call the attention of the Chair and the House to the last clause of the rule defining the duties of the Committee on Public Lands, which has been referred to by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. HOUSTON,] and which, as it seems to me, covers directly this case, "and to report their opinion thereon, together with such propositions for relief therein, as to them shall seem expedient." Now, that committee have reported, this session, general propositions for the relief of railroads, and to make railroads; and can it be pretended that a proposition to aid in the making of this railroad, by allowing them to import iron, free of duty, is more out of order than the propositions themselves for the making of the roads? The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means says, however, this provision interferes with the revenue of the country. Why, that gentleman's argument amounts to just this—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I must interrupt the gentleman. I would be glad to accommodate him, but I must leave him to make his argument out of his own time, and I will not interrupt him.

I have merely to state further, that the result of the argument made by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] if carried out, would be the absorption, by the Committee of Ways and Means, of all the business of the House, although the members of that committee feel, and have long felt, sensible, and have acknowledged it, that there has been an amount of business thrown upon that committee which involves too much labor for any one committee to perform. It is too much, if they would do justice to themselves, or to the country. Then, sir, I object to such a construction being put upon the rules in regard to the relative powers of these two committees. I maintain that any matter which is incidental to the subject-matter under consideration by a committee, is a legitimate one for them to consider; and when it is reported with the bill as one bill, you cannot, upon a point of order, strike it out.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be glad to hear any explanation from gentlemen in regard to the construction of the rules in relation to the point now before the House. The Chair has, however, made up his mind upon it, and is ready to decide if insisted upon.

Mr. BAYLY. If the ideas which the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] has presented to this House as to the rights of these committees were to prevail, the House will see at once, with a moment's reflection, the infinite embarrassment in which it would involve itself. The reason for the rule which provides that no committee shall report upon any subject which is not committed to it, is, that when these committees are called for reports, they shall not be permitted to thrust upon the House matters which it has not expressed a willingness to entertain. If the idea expressed by the gentleman from Arkansas were to be put into practice, it would put it within the power of any of the committees of the House, at any time, to bring before the House, and press upon its consideration, any matter they might choose, no matter what its character might be. We know that it is one of the ways in which, even with a strict construction of the rules, this House is embarrassed more than any other. They have done it by bringing before the House subjects which it has expressed no willingness to entertain. The reason for this rule is a wise one. It is to restrict the action of committees to subjects committed to them, either by the rules of the House, or by the express order of the House. It will never do to put it in the power of any committee of this House to report or bring in matters which the House, by its order, has not shown its wish to act upon. I hope the rule may be strictly enforced in this instance.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. There is no difficulty—

Mr. BAYLY. I cannot yield. I only wish to advance one idea further; and it may not be necessary to press that; for I believe the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] advanced the same in his speech, though I did not hear that speech. I allude to this matter in connection with the revenue of the Government. I say, that if this House permit questions affecting the revenue of the Government to come from any other committee than that of the Ways and Means, it would lead to infinite embarrassment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia whether all these donations of land are not questions affecting the public revenue?

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I understand the gentleman from Alabama to make the point that a particular clause of a particular section of the bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands, is not in order. Now, that would involve the necessity, upon the part of the Speaker, I suppose, to resolve, upon a question of order, that these sections shall be stricken out of the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Not at all.

Mr. STANTON. It is admitted that the general purposes of this bill come within the scope of the duties of that committee. In making this argument, I do not pretend to express an opinion whether these provisions of the bill ought to be adopted. But when you impose upon a committee of this House the duty of reporting bills upon subjects which bear upon the general interests of the country, and do not permit them to incorporate in their bills the provisions which may be necessary to carry out the great purpose and objects of the policy proposed, why you destroy the usefulness of committees entirely. You cut up the business of the House—

Mr. MEACHAM, (interrupting.) If the Committee on Public Lands are to report upon everything belonging to railroads, they will have the right to make provisions for surveying them, and for placing engines upon them after they are made. I do not see why one is not as well within the reach of that committee as the other; and according to the definition the gentleman has given, that committee can report bills making such provisions.

Mr. STANTON. Unquestionably that is true. The Committee on Public Lands, or any other committee, may report everything they choose in reference to a subject which is legitimately before them. And concerning the question before the House, this provision that is complained of, is an accessory to the main object the Committee on Public Lands have legitimately in view, in proposing a disposition of the public lands.

Now, it is a matter of no consequence—it cannot be a matter of any consequence, as far as the revenue of the country is concerned—from what committee a measure comes. It does not impose upon the House the necessity of adopting this bill, because it is reported by that committee. The sense of the House can be as well taken upon a matter of public policy, whether the bill comes from the Committee on Public Lands, or the Committee of Ways and Means. I should like to know by what precise rule, or question of order, you can eliminate this section from the bill. I should like to know what is the purpose of this question of order—whether it is to strike this section out of the bill, or whether a distinct motion is to be made to refer the bill back again, with instructions to strike it out? If that motion is made, it is not a question of order. And can you strike this section from the bill upon a question of order? You cannot do it. You may make a motion to refer it back to the committee, with instructions to strike it out. That motion may be made; but I ask again, whether, upon a question of order, you can strike out a section of the bill? You cannot do it.

Mr. CLINGMAN obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER. If it is the pleasure of the House, the Chair will now decide the question of order, for until that decision is given the debate is not a regular one.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, however, was anxious to hear the opinions of gentlemen upon the question, for it was rather a new one to him.

We have some thirty-six standing committees, to each of which peculiar duties have been prescribed and defined. By the 84th rule, it is made the duty of the Committee on Public Lands "to take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things respecting the lands of the United States, as shall be presented, or shall, or may come in question and be referred to them by the House; and to report their opinion thereon, together with such propositions for relief therein as to them shall seem expedient." Again, it is made the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means, by the 78th rule, "to take into consideration, all such reports of the Treasury Department, and all such propositions relative to the revenue as may be referred to them by the House; to inquire into the public debt or the revenue and the expenditure, and to report from time to time, their opinion thereon; to examine into the state of the several public departments, and particularly into laws making appropriations of moneys," &c. Now, the Chair is clearly of the opinion that the subject of reducing or abolishing the duty upon railroad iron, does not belong to the Committee on Public Lands; but it does belong to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By reference to the bill, it will be seen that provision is made for a grant of lands to aid in the construction of a certain railroad, followed by a provision to repeal the duty generally upon railroad iron. That provision, in the opinion of the Chair, is not in order; or rather, it is not in the province of the Committee on Public Lands to report such a bill. The Chair, therefore, decides that the bill itself is out of order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I beg leave respectfully to appeal from the decision of the Chair. I have no disposition to detain the House long upon this matter, but I wish to reply to the only objection that has been raised to the reception of this bill by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. Houston,] and which has been repeated by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Bayly.] The House will bear in mind that the only objection that has been made to the bill is this: They say that to the Committee of Ways and Means properly belongs everything connected with the public revenue, and that no other committee can report a proposition which in any way interferes with the public revenue. That is the argument now. I beg gentlemen to bear in mind that last year we derived upwards of $3,000,000 of revenue from the sales of these public lands; but we derive from the iron importation, as duties upon it, only about $2,500,000 or $2,600,000. And yet, these gentlemen admit that the Committee on Public Lands may report a proposition to deprive us of the revenue we get from the lands, and yet cannot interfere with the revenue which we derive from importations of iron. There is no force at all in the argument. This argument would apply just as well to the proposition making the grant of lands for the railroad as to that in regard to the abolition of the duty on iron. It will apply to any proposition, provided you do not make it interfere with the revenue or appropriations; for it is well known that the Committee of Ways and Means is the guardian of the public Treasury, and they may object to any committee (as not coming within the sphere of their duties) reporting a proposition which has a tendency to take money out of the Treasury. This proposition rests upon the clearest principles. The Committee on Public Lands, as the guardians of our interests, reports bills here, and with a view to open the public lands to a market and to make them sell at a high price, recommends donations to aid in the construction of railroads. Now, why shall they not, as incidental thereto, recommend that all these railroad companies may import iron free of duty? It is one of the facilities, one of the very means, to enable them to make roads easily and expeditiously. The only argument that gentlemen rely upon, is one which applies just as well to every land bill that has been reported this session as to the present bill.

I promised not to detain the House with an argument, and I will yield the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Having entire confidence in the correctness of the decision made by the Chair, and not wishing that the House should be detained upon this business, I move that the appeal be laid upon the table.

Mr. ORR. I demand the yeas and nays upon that proposition. I will see who it is that is in favor of keeping up duties upon railroad iron.

The yeas and nays were then ordered.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the Chair state the point of order raised?

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Public Lands have reported a bill which provides, first, for granting alternate sections of land to aid in the construction of a railroad, and then provides for abolishing, altogether, duties upon all railroad iron. The Chair does not understand—and he would like to have the ear of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Clingman] upon that point—that any matter connected with duties upon railroad iron has ever been referred to the Committee on Public Lands at all. This subject has never been referred to them in the first place, and if referred, then the Chair must decide them very improperly referred to that committee, it being a matter touching the revenue, and therefore belonging exclusively, in the opinion of the Chair, to the Committee of Ways and Means. The Chair therefore decides that the report made from the Committee on Public Lands is not in order.

Mr. BROOKS. In what state is the bill before the House?

The SPEAKER. The objection was made upon its first reading.

Mr. BROOKS. The difficulty in my mind, and upon which I want to be instructed, is this: While I agree with the Chair upon the principles laid down, I should be unwilling to vote against receiving a report from the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have an opportunity of voting his views.

Mr. STANLY. The Chair, as I understand it, decides that the report is out of order—

Mr. HIBBARD. I rise to a question of order.

The yeas and nays have been ordered; and debate is out of order, for the reason—

The SPEAKER. The Chair trusts that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Stanley] will be permitted to make an inquiry of the Chair.

Mr. STANLY. I have not the pleasure of sitting by the side of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. Hibbard,] and therefore cannot know all that he does; and, as I cannot get the information from him, I am compelled to ask the Speaker.

Mr. HIBBARD. The motion pending is to lay the appeal upon the table, and it is not debatable.

Mr. STANLY. I ask if the Chair decides, that the bill reported by the Committee on Public Lands is out of order, because it repeals the duties generally upon railroad iron?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does so decide.

Mr. STANLY. I think it is a right decision.

Mr. HIBBARD. I call the gentleman to order. The question is not debatable.

Mr. ORR. I desire to ask the Chair a question for information. What is the effect of the decision of the Chair upon the bill? Does it exclude merely those sections of the bill, which relate to the duties upon iron?

The SPEAKER. It excludes the bill entire, on account of the improper matter contained in it.

Mr. ORR. The entire bill?

The SPEAKER. The entire bill.

Mr. McMULLIN. I would like to have those two rules of the House read, which were referred to by the gentleman from Alabama. I want information.

The SPEAKER. The Chair trusts that there will be no objection to the reading of the rules, as they have a bearing upon the subject.

[Cries of "I object!" "I object!" on all sides of the House.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair must, then, put it to vote whether they shall be read.

The question was then put, and it was disagreed to.

So the rules were not permitted to be read.

The question was then taken upon the motion to lay the appeal upon the table, and there were—yeas 125, nays 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Allison, William Appleton, Averett, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Bartlett, Beale, Bennett, Bocock, Bowie, Bragg, Breckinridge, Briggs, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, Buell, Burrows, E. Carlington Cabell, Lewis D. Campbell, Chandler, Chapman, Clark, Cobb, Cullom, Daniel, George T. Davis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dockery, Dunham, Durkee, Edger-ton, Faulkner, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Gentry, Goodenow, Goodrich, Gorman, Grey, Grow, Hamilton, Isham G. Harris, Hart, Haws, Haven, Hendricks, Hibbard, Horsford, Houston, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jackson, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, George G. King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Landry, Letcher, Mann, Martin, Mason, McDonald, McLanahan, McMullin, McNair, Meacham, Milson, Minter, Murray, Nabers, Newton, Olds, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Penn, Perkins, Polk, Powell, Price, Riddle, Robbins, Robinson, Ross, Russell, Sackett, Savage, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Scudder, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smith, Stanley, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, Thaddeus Stephens, Stratton, Stuart, Sweetser, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, George W. Thompson, Tuck, Walbridge, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Wells, Wilcox, and Woodward—125.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Brenton, Joseph Cable, Thompson Campbell, Clingman, Doty, Edmundson, Ewing, Ficklin, Freeman, Hall, Heun, James Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Lockhart, Mace, Humphrey Marshall, McCorkle, McQueen, Miller, Molony, John Moore, Morehead, Orr, Outlaw, Pennington, Porter, Rantoul, Seury, Smart, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Venable, Wallace, Watkins, Addison White, Williams, and Yates—39.

So the appeal was laid upon the table.

Mr. ORR. I propose to submit the bill with the section in regard to railroad iron stricken out, and also with the words "and for other purposes," stricken out of the title.

Mr. DUNHAM. I rise to a question of order. This bill is one reported from the committee. I submit whether the gentleman has a right to alter a bill reported from a committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Orr] asks the unanimous consent of the House to allow him to introduce the bill, with the provision in reference to railroad iron stricken out.

Mr. KUHN. I object.

Mr. ORR. It is a matter of no sort of consequence.

FLORIDA AND ALABAMA RAILROAD.

Mr. ORR, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back, with an amendment, House bill "granting the right of way and making a donation of public lands to the States of Florida and Alabama, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the waters of Pensacola bay to Montgomery;" which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

RAILROADS IN ARKANSAS AND MISSOURI.

Mr. ORR, from the same committee, also reported a bill "granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the States of Arkansas and Missouri, to aid in the construction of a railroad from a point on the Mississippi, opposite the mouth of the Ohio river, via Little Rock, to the Texas boundary, near Fulton, with branches to Fort Smith, and the Mississippi river;" which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I would inquire of the Chair if the morning hour has expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then I move that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was then taken, and it was agreed to.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HIBBARD in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated, as the business before the committee, House bill No. 7, being a bill to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting to every man who is at the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same, for the period herein specified; upon which, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WARD] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. WARD occupied the floor his allotted hour in discussing the subject of the Presidency; in doing which he asserted that General Scott had contributed much, indirectly, towards the enactment of the compromise measures; that he was known to be in favor of these measures as a final adjustment of all the questions involved therein, although he had not written a letter upon the subject to influence the action of the approaching nominating convention. His past life—he said—his patriotic devotion to, and perils in defense of his country—was a sufficient guarantee that, if he were elected President of the United States, all interests, of every section of the Union, would be safe under his administration. He believed that in his nomination was involved the question whether they should have Whig rule for four years longer, or Democratic rule for four years, or even half a century.

[Mr. WARD's speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. AVERETT next addressed the committee, in opposition to the bill under consideration. He denied that Congress had any constitutional power to dispose of the public domain in the manner proposed by the bill. He argued to show that the voting of grants to railroads, to individuals, and for insane asylums, involved a violation on the part of Congress of the trust reposed in it to dispose of the public lands for the common benefit. Without concluding, he yielded to

Mr. BOCOCK, who said: It is now, Mr. Chairman, nearly three o'clock; and, as my colleague is unwell, and his voice failing, speaking with great labor, I hope the committee will indulge him by rising.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield for that purpose?

Mr. AVERETT. I do; but if it is the pleasure of the committee I will go on.

The question was then put, and it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the homestead bill, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

On motion by Mr. STANLY, by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Elijah S. Bell be withdrawn from the files of the House and referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. CABELL, of Florida, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House the petition and papers of G. B. Kurfed, for the purpose of their reference to the State Department.

Mr. COBB. Our usual hour of adjournment has not yet arrived, and why shall we not take up the business on the Speaker's table and refer it to the different committees—I mean such communications as will not give rise to debate? I make the motion that the House proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table, and hope no one will object—

Mr. BARRERE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled, "A bill for the relief of Theodore Offut;" which received the signature of the Speaker.

Mr. STANLY. I do not see any object in the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, unless it be to have taken from the table some bill in which he feels an interest.

Mr. COBB. I want nothing except what will promote the general good. I have nothing which I am especially desirous of having taken up.

Mr. STANLY. That is my purpose, and for that very reason, actuated by that motive, I object to the motion because the House is too thin.

The SPEAKER. It is in order for the gentleman to submit his motion.

The question was then put, and it was decided in the negative—ayes 45, noes 31; no quorum.

Mr. KING, of New York, moved the House adjourn; which motion was agreed to.

And the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, &amp;c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

HISTORICAL PAINTINGS.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I hold in my hand an application from Mr. Leutze, the distinguished American artist, author of the painting representing "Washington Crossing the Delaware," exhibited for the last two or three weeks in the Rotunda of the Capitol, and which, I presume, you and most of the members of this body have seen and admired. The application of Mr. Leutze is addressed to Congress, and proposes to repeat, with such emendations as experience may suggest, the beautiful painting to which I have just referred, together with a fellow to it, the subject of which is to be likewise drawn from that portion of American history which represents Washington rallying our retreating troops at the battle of Monmouth.

I need not state, Mr. President, that subjects better calculated to inspire the genius of the artist, or awaken the patriotism of the American spectator, can hardly be selected. Of the truth of this there is evidence in the painting which the memorialist proposes to repeat. Who that has looked upon that admirable picture, and contemplated the majestic form, and composed, yet inflexible, determination which beams from the countenance of the heroic chief, working his perilous way through the ice of the Delaware to reach the enemy and strike a decisive blow for freedom, then almost expiring, has not felt his patriotism stimulated, and his blood flowing in warmer and quicker currents through his veins? And who, in addition to this, has not experienced a just pride in learning that this fine, stirring representation of one of the great acts of the drama of our Revolution, was the production of American talent? No one, I am sure, could contemplate this noble picture without experiencing the glow of both of these emotions of patriotism and pride. With the true tact of genius, the artist has seized the turning point in the great struggle for independence—the moment when hope was attending with despair, to present the leader of our armies, upon whom all hopes were concentrated and all eyes were turned, in the attitude of striking a great and decisive blow, calculated, if successful, to revive the drooping courage and cheer the fainting hearts of his almost desponding countrymen. It was the critical moment, pregnant with the result of the pending contest, with the hopes of humanity, with the destiny, perhaps, of the world. All these hung suspended on the events of the night, and the success of the morning which was to follow it. The crossing of the Delaware was an event more justly memorable than the crossing of the Rubicon. The spirit of all this the artist has caught, and transmitted to the canvas with a fidelity and truthfulness which must have struck every beholder.

The other event which the artist proposes to commemorate, when embellished by his fine imagination, and graceful, but vigorous touch, can scarcely fail to result in a beautiful, soul-stirring picture. The subject is one of the most striking in the history of our revolutionary war. General Lee had been sent forward to bring on the action, and keep the enemy employed until Washington, with the main body of the army, should come up; but instead of doing so, he retreated in disorder at the approach of the enemy. Washington arriving on the ground, vexed and disappointed at the conduct of Lee, and losing for a moment the lofty and habitual composure, which, until then, had never forsaken him, even in the most trying situation of his life, rebuked the retreating General with asperity. Then, turning to his troops, upon whom the enemy were pressing, asked them "if they could fight, and ordered them to face about and charge." The subject is a fine one, and well calculated to develop the highest powers of the artist. I hope, therefore, that the matter will not end with the presentation of the memorial; but that the Committee on the Library, to whom I design to refer it, will give it an attentive and favorable consideration. Liberality, intended to adorn and beautify the Capitol, at the same time that it operates to encourage the development of American talent, will never be disowned by the American people.

Since the application of Mr. Leutze was placed in my hands, Mr. Healy, an artist of equal eminence and merit, has expressed his wish to execute for Congress, from subjects connected with our revolutionary history, two paintings—the subject of one to be the "Throwing overboard of the Tea in Boston Harbor;" the other, "The Battle of Bunker Hill."

In the first of these events was contained the very germ of the American Revolution. The second will represent the first of the great battles, in which our untired troops measured their strength with veterans of England. Both are subjects of deep and lasting interest, well calculated to draw out and develop the highest powers of the artist.

Mr. President, I pretend to no very refined judgment in matters of art; but if I were permitted to express an opinion on the subject, it would be to state, that "Healy's Webster Replying to Hayne in the Senate," and Leutze's "Washington Crossing the Delaware," are amongst the finest modern historical paintings which I have anywhere seen. Of such artists the country may well entertain a just pride, and if her Representatives would but echo her sentiments, they would receive encouragement.

Allow me, sir, one word more. It seems to me that it is the duty, as well as the privilege, of Congress to do something to encourage the development of native talent, in this most attractive and refining branch of art. We have evidence in the pictures of Leutze and Healy, exhibited in this city during the present session of Congress, to prove that American genius, in this branch of the fine arts, needs but scope and encouragement to give it a commanding and enviable reputation. But in this country public taste, in this direction, has not yet been sufficiently educated and developed. Congress should, in my judgment, take the initiative and lend its aid. Private fortunes, possessed by men of refined taste and judicious liberality, are still too rare amongst us, to afford either constant or certain encouragement to the artist. There is one individual in this District, to whom the friends of art are indebted for an intelligent dispensation of his ample means, in collecting a gallery of pictures; and it is to be hoped his example will be followed elsewhere, and by others in similar circumstances. Let others, like him, thus dispose of their abundant means, and they will thereby acquire, as he has done, a just title to the gratitude of the artist and the friends of art wherever they are found.

In other countries the fine arts are objects of the patronage of the Government. They are encouraged, not only for their refining influences, but likewise with a view to the perfection of the more useful arts. Schools of painting and design have done much to perfect various branches of manufactures, furnishing patterns for tapestry, brocades, laces, carpets, and various kinds of damask and figured fabrics. Heretofore we have been obliged to resort to Europe for designs for all these kinds of articles which are produced by our artisans. But, by encouraging painting and the kindred art of design, we would soon cease to be dependent on Europe for our patterns.

The memorials were referred to the Committee on the Library.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to which was referred the memorial of John S. Russworm, legal representative of William Russworm, deceased, submitted an adverse report. I would (said Mr. W.) say that since I have been chairman of that committee, this claim has once before been referred to them. It was then reported back, and the committee was discharged, upon the ground, that an adverse report had previously been made by a former committee. No additional testimony having been submitted with the case, the committee now makes an adverse report, the which is, that the claim, upon the proofs now submitted, ought not to be allowed. I hope that the papers may not again be improperly withdrawn from the files, and referred to that committee.

The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FELCH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the petition of the registers and receivers of the land office at St. Augustine, Florida, praying compensation for making locations of lands under the Arredondo grant, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for their relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

The report was ordered to be printed.

NOTICE OF A JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. BORLAND gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a joint resolution, to amend the joint resolution of August 3, 1846, in relation to the public printing.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DOUGLAS, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to amend certain acts for the establishment of territorial governments in Oregon and Minnesota; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Territories.

Mr. BROOKE, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to provide for the cession of certain lands to the States within which they lie; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CHAPLAINS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the compensation of Chaplains in the Navy of the United States.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to consider the expediency of providing by law for the appointment of a commissioner to revise the public statutes of the United States; to simplify their language; to correct their incongruities; to supply their deficiencies; to arrange them in order; to reduce them to one connected text; and to report them thus improved to Congress for its final action; to the end that the public statutes, which all are presumed to know, may be in such form as to be more within the apprehension of all.

HISTORICAL PAINTINGS.

Mr. COOPER submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be, and it is hereby instructed to inquire into the expediency of employing Mr. Lutze to repeat for Congress, his painting representing "Washington crossing the Delaware," together with a fellow to it, representing "Washington Rallying the American Troops at the battle of Monmouth;" also, of employing Mr. Healy to paint two pictures, one representing "The throwing overboard of the Tea in Boston harbor," the other, "The Battle of Bunker Hill."

EXPEDITION TO JAPAN.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. BORLAND, some time since, in relation to the objects of the expedition to Japan.

Mr. MASON. I do not feel at liberty to vote for the resolution offered by the Senator from Arkansas. If there was any proper reason stated by any Senator, on his own information, why this call should be made, I should not object to it. If any Senator can state that he knows that such an expedition is about to sail, and that it is important that we should know what are its instructions, so far as they may affect our foreign relations, of course I should feel bound to vote for it. But I have no personal knowledge on the subject, and I do not learn from the Senator from Arkansas, if I apprehend him correctly, that he has any other information than the general rumors in the newspapers, which we all know are not to be relied upon. This resolution might possibly embarrass the Executive, who has the proper command of the Navy, and the power of sending it to those parts of the world that the service of the country may require; and unless there be some good foundation on which to base this call, I should be reluctant to make it.

Mr. BORLAND. The other day, when the resolution first came up for discussion, it was objected that there was no evidence of the Executive purpose of such an expedition, before the Senate, sufficient to justify such a call. It was intimated that this was a volunteer act of mine, without any information which either warranted me in introducing the resolution, or would justify the Senate in its adoption. I am at a loss to understand the force of such an objection. I think it is of no great consequence where a Senator may get his information—what may be the sources of it. The question should be: is the expedition, as he has understood it, or as others may understand it, of sufficient importance, of itself, to command the attention of the Senate of the United States? Does it so far relate to public interests as to warrant its consideration? Now, if I had no such sources of information as I then alluded to, I should consider myself, even on the mere rumor which has been spoken of, fully warranted in introducing the resolution. I stated on that occasion, that I had specific information which I thought was reliable, that this expedition had been ordered, and was about to sail. At that time I stated the source of information upon which I did act, to be the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the House of Representatives. Some doubts were then intimated whether that gentleman had made such a statement as to warrant such an inference as I had drawn.

In matters of opinion, I am as liable to error as any one, perhaps more so than most men; but upon matters of fact, when I state them as such, I am not in error. When a bill in relation to discipline in the Navy was under discussion in the House of Representatives, on the 29th of last month, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. STANTON], in urging the House to act upon it, made this remark:

"This bill has been carefully examined in the Senate, and has passed that body almost unanimously. It came to this House, was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. That committee have examined it, and instructed me to report it with one amendment. The East India squadron is about to sail, under the command of Commodore Perry, and unless this bill passes before the sailing of that squadron, it is not likely that the information of its passage can reach the squadron in less than twelve months; and during that time they will be in a condition which will be very deleterious to the discipline of the service."

There is his statement, that the squadron was "about to sail." Continuing the discussion with others, he further said:

"The East India squadron is about to sail, and it is urged by the Navy Department, as well as by the commanding officer of that squadron, that the bill should be passed before the sailing of that squadron."

Still further, during that discussion, he said:

"I cannot consent to any postponement of this bill, if it is to be a matter of doubt whether it will be taken up, as it is known that a portion of the Pacific squadron will sail during this week, on Wednesday next; and it is exceedingly important that this bill should be acted upon previous to that time."

The "Wednesday next" after these remarks, was the very day I offered this resolution.

There was the declaration of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives: How could he have known that the Secretary of the Navy desired a bill to pass in reference to this expedition, and that the commander of the expedition also desired it, without having been informed officially by these officers that it was about to sail? At any rate there are his positive and repeated declarations of a fact, in his place in the House of Representatives, and under circumstances which gave them the effect of an official announcement from the Navy Department, and authorized me to assume them to be such. Since I made this statement to the Senate, the gentleman in question, Mr. STANTON, has seen me in person, and expressed the opinion that I was mistaken as to his remarks. Here they are, as reported for the official paper appointed for the purpose. I took them as I found them, and here they are just as they will be found in my original statement. Since then, again, that is on the day before yesterday, in reference to this matter, Mr. STANTON, the gentleman alluded to, in the House of Representatives, said this:

"I would like to state, if the gentleman will allow me, that I was reported as having said, in the debate the other day, that this expedition was to leave on last Wednesday. I stated that a part of the expedition was to leave at that time. I had seen Commodore Perry a few days before, and he said he himself would not leave for a month or more. I did not state that the whole expedition was about to leave. I know that a part will not leave for a month."

Whether the gentleman said the whole, or only a part, of the expedition was to sail on Wednesday, is no matter. It is the fact of the sailing at all of which I spoke, and the only one that is at all material.

Here, then, is a large naval expedition ordered to the Indian ocean, and to the coast of Japan in particular, and for some important objects. Here is evidence that the Navy Department has acted in the matter. Here is public, official information of the fact, stated in the House of Representatives. So, whether of my own mere motion, it would have been right or wrong to have introduced the resolution, I think this must satisfy those gentlemen, who consider information derived from official sources as necessary to warrant an inquiry, and to justify the action of the Senate.

I have read these portions of the debate in the House of Representatives, to show to the Senate the foundation upon which I based my remarks, when the subject was up before. I did not consider it necessary to authorize me to introduce the resolution; but I gave it as the basis of the information upon which I did introduce it. I needed no such authority. I neither need, nor do I recognize any authority, beyond my own sense of duty, and the rules of the Senate, to do or to say anything upon this floor.

In regard to the propriety of making public, and laying fairly before the people of the United States the action of this Government, no matter by what Department, in any way affecting the interests of the people, I have no more to say now in addition to my former remarks. But I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the importance which seems to be attached to this expedition, by its friends, and by the Administration. We find it announced in all the newspapers. We find communications written from this city, evidently based upon information from official sources, stating that this expedition is about to sail, and that it is of a very important character. There is a remarkable concurrence, as to its general objects and its importance, between all these published statements. I find in a paper published in the city of Boston, established, and recognized throughout the country, as the especial organ, the especial representative and exponent of the political views, and the advocate of the political aspirations and advancement of the distinguished Secretary of State; I find in that paper, the last number of which reached me through the mail yesterday morning, articles in reference to this expedition, in which it is heralded to the world as a great national movement, involving most important political considerations, and evidently thrown into the canvass, for the purpose of producing its effect in the approaching presidential election. I will read them.

Mr. DAVIS. What is the paper?

Mr. BORLAND. It is a paper called "Our Country," specially devoted to the advocacy of the election of Mr. Webster to the Presidency of the United States. Here is one of them:

"THE UNITED STATES AND JAPAN.—The following is a correct list of the squadron destined for the East Indies and the Coast of Japan, under Commodore Perry:

"United States steam-frigate Susquehanna, flag ship, Commodore M. C. Perry, Commander in Chief; Commander Franklin Buchanan, Captain of the ship; Commander Henry A. Adams, Captain of the fleet; Lieutenant John Cottey, Flag Lieutenant.

"United States steam-frigate Mississippi, Captain Wm. J. McCluney.

"United States steamer Princeton, Commander Sidney Smith Lee.

"United States ship Plymouth, at present in the East Indies, Commander John Kelly.

"United States ship Saratoga, Commander Wm. S. Walker, in the East Indies.

"Armed store-ship Supply, Lieutenant Commanding Arthur Sinclair.

"Commodore Perry goes out in the Mississippi, and will hoist his broad pennant on the Susquehanna on his arrival in the East Indies.

"Our readers are aware that we regard this expedition to the Pacific coast as one of the most important ever undertaken by our Government. Not that it is to be viewed in the light of an armed invasion. Such is by no means the case. It would be simply ridiculous to suppose that the United States would send a few ships, like the above, to overrun and subjugate the populous and powerful empire of Japan. No one but an idiot would think of such a thing.

"But this diplomatic movement is of vast importance in its ultimate results; and, as such, reflects great credit on its originators, especially on the distinguished Secretary of State. We are glad to learn that the Washington Union approves his patriotic course.

"Mr. Webster understands this matter well. He is perfectly aware of what is due to the commercial interests of the whole Union, and he will continue to suggest to the President, as he has done in this case, such sagacious measures of diplomacy as will protect and advance those interests in all quarters of the world. He knows what is due to the rights of American seamen, shipwrecked, plundered, and outraged on the Japanese coasts; and he will never consent that the wrongs which our hardy tars endure in distant lands shall go unredressed, while the United States Government has so power to redress them.

"This expedition, then, is not only perfectly justifiable, but highly honorable to all concerned; and we hope to see it carried through in a manner worthy of the American flag and the American name."

I shall not stop now to indulge in the expression of certain reminiscences and reflections, suggested to my mind by this eloquent laudation of the very paternal regard for the interests of American commerce, and the welfare of American seamen, as affected by our relations with foreign countries, by the distinguished gentleman who is now Secretary of State, and a prominent candidate for the Presidency. Here is the other article from the same paper:

"EXPEDITION TO JAPAN.—Nothing can be more ridiculous, says the New York Courier and Enquirer, than the telegraph dispatches and Washington correspondence, in regard to the objects and purposes of the expedition about to sail for the China Seas, under the command of Commodore Perry. We have already treated this subject at some length, and demonstrating the importance of demanding redress from the Japanese for past grievances, and securing respect for our commerce in future. But we expressly repudiated the idea that the expedition contemplated any conquest."

"Indemnity for the past—security for the future!" This, Mr. President, was our motto in the Mexican war. But, sir, I confess it is a little surprising to me; indeed, it is what first arrested my attention, and induced me to examine the subject somewhat curiously, that the political party which opposed that war, and is now embodied in, and represented by this Administration, should so suddenly have shifted its ground, faced about, and adopted the very position upon which they looked with such horror, and so horrified the country about, by the pictures they drew of its consequences. And I must express my surprise, especially, that Senators on the other side of this Chamber, who are of the Administration party, who joined in the anti-war cry, denounced the doctrine of "indemnity for the past, and security for the future," and were opposed to establishing more extended relations than then existed with other countries, particularly if such relations threatened war, or looked to increased possessions of territory, should now be found so suddenly enamored of, and converted to that policy, as to be engaging Hermit, in a crusade against a strange people, of whom we know but little, and against whom we certainly know not that we have any cause of quarrel whatever. The article before me goes on:

"That we have a right to claim the use of harbors on the coast of Japan for protection from stress of weather, nobody can deny; nor will it be questioned that it is alike our right and our duty, to insist that the shipwrecked mariner on that inhospitable coast, and the disabled whaler, shall no longer be treated as pirates. This we owe alike to our commerce and to humanity; and this Commodore Perry will doubtless insist upon. The whole civilized world will not only justify but applaud this proceeding."

Now, sir, we find editors of newspapers, believed to be in the confidence, and who are specially engaged in sustaining the views of this Administration, and advocating the presidential aspirations of certain leading members of it, fully possessed of information as to the objects of this expedition, and the means that are to be used to carry out those objects. We find them all in possession of this information, which enables them to shadow forth, rather dimly to the public, to be sure, some great project to be undertaken—some mighty scheme, pregnant with vital consequences to this nation, and which must, to a greater or less degree, require the coöperation of Congress during its progress, or at its close; and yet Senators rise in their places here, and deny alike the competency of the Senate to ask for information in respect to it, or the necessity, or even propriety, of making the call, or receiving an answer. Strange, indeed, sir, if private individuals and editors of newspapers, for personal or political purposes, shall be put in possession of this information by the Government, to be used in such parts, and for such purposes as interest or ambition may dictate; and yet that the Senate of the United States is not competent to ask for it, and may not properly receive it. Mr. President, the idea that the public interest may suffer by our getting this information, and making it accessible to every man in the country, is, to my mind, strange indeed. Sir, I have no such conceptions of public affairs and the public interests, and entertain no such contemptuous opinion of the popular intelligence of this country. How strange, sir, to hear such opinions expressed, and that, too, right in the face of the fact that the information is not locked up in the breast of the Administration, but is dealt out here and there, in New York and Boston, in certain quantities and for certain purposes—what purposes I pretend not to say, further than is already indicated; and that is to favor certain presidential aspirations.

I repeat, sir, it does seem strange to me, that with these things before the public—with this imperfect information which is given, and evidently derived from sources which are in possession of all the objects of the expedition, any one should refuse, to either branch of Congress, information which will enable us to understand the whole subject, when all its consequences, be they good or bad, are to fall upon those whom we represent; and when (let the result be what it may) we will be called upon to pay the expenses of the whole project, and to that extent, as we have already been told by the friends of the Administration on this floor, and by its organs of the newspaper press, that we shall be held responsible to the country. They tell us that we have the power, that the Constitution has placed it in our hands, and that we are responsible for its exercise, and will be held to that responsibility before the country.

Before I resume my seat, I have a word upon what I noticed in the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MANGUM,] who first spoke in opposition to this resolution, when he undertook, if I understood him, to read a lecture to a portion of the Democratic party, for those views of progress which lead it into interference with the affairs of other countries; alluding, as I understood him, in one direction to the favor which some had shown to what was called the Cuban expedition.

Mr. MANGUM. I do not remember when I attempted to lecture the Democratic party, or anybody else, on that subject. I wish the gentleman would remind me when and where I did so.

Mr. BORLAND. I understood his remarks to be a general lecture, in brief terms it is true, to certain members of the Democratic party who favored an interference in the affairs of foreign nations, including the so-called Cuban expedition; and further as a sort of rebuke in general to those who favored what is called the doctrine of "intervention;" intimating that theirs was progress in the wrong direction, when it led them beyond our own borders to interfere in the affairs of another people. That is what I understood his remarks to mean.

Mr. MANGUM. I have no recollection, at any period, of having indulged in any remarks of that sort. I will very frankly avow, however, that, in regard to this doctrine of intervention, the gentleman does not misrepresent the views which I have individually expressed and entertained—not at all. But I do not remember having expressed such views in this Chamber. He will pardon me for saying, additionally, that I never undertook to lecture this great and powerful Democracy. Sir, it moves with a momentum, physical and political, so great, that my lectures would be but a small drawback to it.

Mr. WELLER. No doubt of it.

Mr. MANGUM. It would be so; and I must be supposed to have some inklings of common sense. I would not attempt a thing so impossible. I would as soon attempt to explode the rock of Gibraltar with a single grain of powder, as by any lecture I might give, attempt to enlighten, to control, or to improve, (which is vastly more to be desired,) the Democratic party. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORLAND. I am very happy to hear that the Senator from North Carolina entertains an opinion so favorable of the Democracy of the country, and views with such respect the power of that party. And, sir, it is well he does; for, doing so, he will doubtless escape the disappointment and mortification which await those of the party to which he belongs who enter the great contest which now approaches, disparaging the power or spirit of the Democracy, or flattering themselves with that vainest of all sentiments—the hope of success.

But, sir, my purpose in alluding to the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MANGUM,] was to indicate what seemed to me something like inconsistency on his part; for, while he denounced the spirit of progress leading to that sort of intervention—the purpose which some had evinced to interfere in the affairs of foreign nations—he manifested for himself, and defended in the Administration—not in terms, it is true, yet none the less certainly—a willingness, indeed a well-defined and fixed purpose, to go abroad, even upon the high seas, and interfere directly, and by force and arms, if necessary, in the affairs of a nation with which we are not only at peace, and with which we know of no cause of quarrel, but with whom we have no relations at all.

I am not objecting to this expedition. I am very willing to establish commercial relations with the Japanese, or any other nation where they are likely to result in advantage to us. But it seems to me that a Senator who will one day denounce those who would connect our country with those nations which are comparatively near our shores, and on the next enter himself upon a crusade against the most distant people on the globe, for a purpose no more beneficial, and by means no more proper, must be considered as either not altogether consistent with himself, or, at any rate, as not willing to govern his own course and that of his friends, by the same rule he would impose upon others. Does the magic power of party make that right in one, which was so wrong in another?

I repeat, what I said when I first introduced the resolution, that I impute nothing wrong to the Administration. If such meaning be attached to what I have said or done, it is in the minds of those who oppose, and not of those who advocate the resolution. Honi soit qui mal y pense. I think it not unlikely, that when I come to know the objects of this expedition, and means and mode of their attainment, if such knowledge should ever be vouchsafed to me, that I may approve them. It is quite certain that I shall, if those objects be the commercial advantage of my country, and those means be such as a brave and honorable people may make use of. But, sir, no matter what the information I have asked for may develop, I none the less desire it. I want it to govern my own course as a legislator here. I desire it, also, for the information of those who sent me here. I deem it my duty to keep my constituents, who are the people of my own State, informed of all I do as their representative here; and as all matters of public interest concern them, in proportion to their number, as directly as if their number was greater, and they had power to make themselves heard and felt more strongly than they can at present, it is also my duty to inform them of what is undertaken here by all branches of the Government; and this duty I will perform as far as I may be able. Such information as I ask for, is my right and theirs, and therefore I ask it. I am not afraid they, or any other portion of the people of the United States, will misuse it. If the objects of this expedition be honest and lawful, it cannot, in the nature of things, be wrong or hurtful to any lawful interest for them to be made known. If they be dishonest or unlawful, the sooner and the more certain should they be exposed and arrested. At any rate, be they right or be they wrong, it is our right and our duty to know them.

Mr. GWIN. I move to lay the resolution on the table temporarily, for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the subject which was before the Senate yesterday.

Mr. MANGUM. I hope the Senator from California will withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. GWIN. I will for a moment.

Mr. MANGUM. I stand here under a charge specifically made, which seems to be well considered, that I have been inconsistent in my opinions. Well, sir, without attempting to vindicate my consistency, which is a matter of no consequence to discuss now, I will say, that my opinions on the subject of intervention have been fixed long since; and all the arguments I have heard on the other side amount to nothing in the way of shaking them. As to intervention as a general proposition, no man can lay down the proposition that we are never to interfere. It has been from the beginning, and will be to the end, that whenever our interest or our safety shall combine with our convenience and our power, we shall intervene, so far as our safety or our interest are concerned. With regard to the expedition which is going to the Indian seas, I regard it as purely commercial; and if it have any other aspect it is not an intervention—it is a work for ourselves. It is not working for a people with whom we have very little connection or interest, and with whom we have very little to do. True, we shall intervene if the enemy comes to endanger our safety or our interest. The nations of the world have done the same thing in all time, and will do it to the end of time. And when we do it we shall not, as I have said on a former occasion, like that redoubtable and very wise and most excellent Spaniard of the fiction, the redoubtable Don,—while we shall act upon principles that are practical touching our own interest—we shall not, like that ancient and redoubtable Don, go about the world finding out the errors of mankind, and endeavoring to right them according to our Democratic or Whig notions.

Sir, we have no Procrustean doctrines on this subject. The world will think and act for itself in its respective nationalities. They have a right to do it, and they are determined to do it. I regard the expedition to the Indian seas as designed to promote the extension of our commerce. I can readily conceive of a case where a nation is in such a condition that it obstructs the great interests of the civilized portion of mankind, and where they may be brought by coercion, if necessary, to act in a manner which will not injure the rest of the world. I can imagine many such cases, where, according to the law of nations and the law of right, such a course would be justifiable.

But as to Hungarian intervention, as to bearding the great Northern Bear, for a people who never enjoyed, and who probably never will in our time enjoy, liberty, where there is not the semblance of a probability now existing that she can secure liberty, I rather think that our redoubtable Don never contemplated anything quite so absurd, nor quite so impracticable.

Mr. GWIN. I now renew the motion to lay this resolution temporarily upon the table.

Mr. BORLAND. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken, and resulted—yeas 20, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Badger, Bell, Brooke, Cooper, Davis, Dawson, Fish, Geyer, Gwin, Hale, Mangum, Miller, Morton, Seward, Smith, Spruance, Underwood, Upham, and Weller—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Borland, Brodhead, Cass, Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Hunter, King, Mallory, Norris, Rusk, Sebastian, Shields, Sumner, Wade, and Walker—20.

So the motion to lay the resolution on the table did not prevail.

Mr. BORLAND. I would be glad now to have the question taken upon the resolution. I think it can be disposed of in a few moments. It should be borne in mind that it is quite discretionary with the President to answer the inquiry or not, as he pleases.

Mr. GWIN. I have an objection to the passage of this resolution of inquiry; and having a right to express my opinion in regard to its merits, it is with that view that I desire its postponement. I moved for its postponement, so that I may have an opportunity to express my views in regard to it, but more especially that we may proceed with the subject which was under consideration when the Senate adjourned yesterday.

Mr. BADGER. Let us get a vote, and dispose of this resolution in some way or other.

Mr. GWIN. I desire to give my reasons for voting against it. I did not expect the matter to come up to-day, or I would have been prepared to do so.

Mr. BADGER. I can have no objection personally to the postponement of the resolution, if the honorable Senator from California thinks it important to discuss it further; but I merely suggest that if it is not disposed of now, it will come up every morning until it is disposed of.

Mr. GWIN. I am willing that it should come up at any time after the disposition of the bill which was under consideration yesterday. It may come up to-morrow, if the Senator chooses.

Mr. BORLAND. I will cheerfully assent to its postponement until to-morrow, if the understanding is, that the Senator from California will then be prepared to present his objections.

Mr. GWIN. Very well, sir.

The question was then taken, and the further consideration of the resolution was postponed until to-morrow.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill supplementary to "An act providing for the taking of the seventh and subsequent censuses of the United States, and to fix the number of the members of the House of Representatives, and provide for their future apportionment among the several States," approved 23d May, 1850; the question pending being on the amendment offered by Mr. BRADBURY.

Mr. CHASE. With the leave of the Senator from Louisiana, who is entitled to the floor, [Mr. DOWNS,] I desire to make a few remarks in respect to this bill before he proceeds.

The question involved in the amendment of the Senator from Maine is novel and undoubtedly of great importance. If the number of Representatives shall be increased to two hundred and thirty-four, as that amendment proposes, it is proper that the Senate should look to the results which will inevitably follow. I have taken the pains to ascertain one of these results, and find that if the aggregate representative population of the United States shall be divided by the number two hundred and thirty-four, it will produce a ratio which, applied in the precise mode pointed out by the act of 1850, for the ratio produced by the division by the number two hundred and thirty-three, will bring the State of Louisiana into precisely the same relation to California that the State of South Carolina now occupies. The result, then, inevitably is this: If you increase the number to two hundred and thirty-four, as is proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Maine, the argument of the Senator from Louisiana becomes just as irresistible in law, and in equity, as the argument of the Senator from South Carolina. In other words, assume that the number is increased to two hundred and thirty-four; consider that as being the number fixed by the act of 1850; change the figures two hundred and thirty-three into the figures two hundred and thirty-four; place those figures in the law; and then the question is, what will be the result of dividing the aggregate population of the Union by those figures? What will be the ratio which will be produced by that division? And what will be the effects of that ratio? I say that the result will be to place Louisiana in precisely the same category that South Carolina now occupies; and that, if the Senate be prepared to vote for the increase of the number to two hundred and thirty-four, the Senator from Louisiana has an irrefragable argument in favor of his proposition to add a member for his State.

Now, suppose an additional member given to Louisiana, and the aggregate of the House of Representatives increased to two hundred and thirty-five, what will be the result? Divide the aggregate population by two hundred and thirty-five and you will have a new ratio. Divide the population of each State by that ratio, ascertain the number of Representatives to which a State is entitled by the entire ratio, and then distribute the fractions, and some other State will have an equitable and indeed a legal claim to be placed in the same category as the State of Louisiana, and the result will be that you may go on increasing the entire number of Representatives, and consequently the representation of particular States, indefinitely. That is certainly the necessary result of the amendment if pursued to its legitimate consequences. If we amend the act of 1850, by changing the aggregate number of the House of Representatives, these consequences must inevitably follow.

But Senators say that we are in a dilemma, and they ask us how we shall escape from it? We shall best escape from it, Mr. President, by taking a common-sense view of the matter, and applying the plain provisions of the Constitution to the case, and by following out its requirements. The difficulty in which Congress finds itself involved, and from which it seeks to be released, results from the attempt by the act of 1850 to fix in advance the number of Representatives in the House by an inflexible rule governing future apportionments. It results, sir, from an attempt to apportion representation in advance of enumeration—to do that before the enumeration which ought to be done afterwards, and which all precedents require to be done afterwards.

I will ask the attention of the Senate for a moment to some of the consequences which follow from the rule established by the act of 1850. The number of Representatives is fixed at two hundred and thirty-three. Divide the entire representative population by this number and you obtain the representative ratio. Divide the representative population of each State by this ratio, add the numbers thus obtained together, and you obtain the number of members of the House, disregarding fractions. But this number will be less than two hundred and thirty-three. To make up the deficiency the bill gives one Representative each to the States having the largest fraction until the fixed number, two hundred and thirty-three, is completed. The result is, that in the case of South Carolina (and in the case of Louisiana, also, if the number be increased to two hundred and thirty-four) you will have a Representative for a fraction less than a moiety of the ratio.

I am not aware that there was ever any representation for a fraction until 1842. The apportionment of that year provided that each State should have a Representative for every seventy thousand six hundred and eighty of its population, and an additional Representative for every fraction greater than a moiety. It is proposed, for the first time in the history of this Government, to give a Representative for a fraction less than a moiety. If you can give a Representative for less than a moiety, you can give one for any number, however inconsiderable.

The Constitution provides for an apportionment according to numbers. It requires an actual enumeration to be made, with a view to ascertain the numbers. This enumeration is not conclusive. It furnishes prima facie evidence, which, except in extreme cases, ought not to be disregarded, but not conclusive evidence. Senators seem to confound the distinction between apportionment according to numbers, and apportionment according to enumeration. The true construction of the Constitution requires the first, and does not require the second. If the enumeration of any State is neglected or, being attempted, is imperfectly executed, we are bound to ascertain the numbers from the best evidence we can command.

If the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Maine shall prevail, and numbers shall be disregarded in making the apportionment, I see no reason why, afterwards, the amendment of the honorable Senator from Louisiana should not also prevail; because I show, I think beyond controversy, that Louisiana will stand, after you have made the number of the House of Representatives two hundred and thirty-four, in precisely the same category in which South Carolina now stands, in relation to California.

Now, what is the way, the practical way, to get out of the difficulty? In my judgment, the true way was indicated by the honorable Senator from Kentucky yesterday, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] when he said: Ascertain the numbers, satisfy yourselves as to the real numbers in the State, and when they are ascertained, follow the rule prescribed by the Constitution. The enumeration is not conclusive; it does not bind us. We should, indeed, respect it so far as to give a representation accordingly, where an enumeration has been made in fact. Where we have returns of actual enumeration, we should follow them. Where we have not, we should take the next best evidence. But we are bound to give a representation according to numbers, and if the returns from any State do not represent its population; if, by the returns of the officers who attempt to take the enumeration, it appears they are incomplete, then it seems to me that Congress is bound to correct the returns by ascertaining, by the best evidence within its reach, what is the true number of the population. The returns from California are confessedly incomplete. Let, then, the population of the State be determined according to other evidence. If the number so ascertained gives her two members, she is entitled to them, and should have them. South Carolina must abide the consequence, as any other State must in the circumstances. On the other hand, if there is no satisfactory evidence that the numbers of California entitle her to two Representatives, California should submit to the result which the facts necessitate.

It is certainly not right to give to California two Representatives absolutely, without evidence that her population entitles her to two; and South Carolina six, because her population, if the claims of California be disregarded, entitles her to six, and still deny to Louisiana the Representative to which she becomes entitled, the very moment that the number of Representatives in the House of Representatives is increased to two hundred and thirty-four, the claims of California being disregarded, as in the case of South Carolina. The honorable Senator from South Carolina says that there is a contract between the Government and California. Not so. When California was admitted into the Union, she was allowed two Representatives. The evidence then before Congress satisfied us that she was entitled to two Representatives; but unless her actual numbers now entitle her to two, she has no better claim to be allowed two than New Hampshire has to be allowed her old number, or South Carolina her old number. The act for the admission of California apportioned to her a representation according to her numbers, and according to the existing ratio. According to that ratio, at that time, South Carolina was entitled to seven members, and now in no event can she have more than six. California was entitled to two, but now, if her numbers do not entitle her to two, she cannot have two; Congress is only bound to ascertain the numbers, and give her a representation accordingly.

As the Senator from South Carolina called the attention of the Senate to the language of the act admitting California into the Union, I beg to do the same thing, for the purpose of showing that there is nothing in that intended to extend beyond this time. She was entitled by that act to two Representatives—until when? “Until the representation in Congress shall be apportioned according to the actual enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States.” That actual enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States has been taken; the apportionment contemplated by the act is now to be made. That is the very thing that is attempted in this bill. It is very true, that this enumeration is not complete, but it is “actual.” The provision of the act of admission is couched in no unusual or unfamiliar language. It has been adopted when other States were admitted, and there is no precedent in our history which will warrant us in regarding this language as a contract fixing the representation of the new States beyond the period of the next apportionment. That period, in the case of California, has arrived. The rights of California, under that act, are at an end. If we are bound to give California two Representatives, it is not on any ground of contract. We must give them to her, if at all, because her numbers entitle her to them.

Now, I admit very cheerfully the claim set up on behalf of California by her Senators. I think it is clearly the duty of Congress to ascertain her actual numbers. It is not their duty to receive returns confessedly incorrect and incomplete, as conclusive. California occupies a very different position from that of Ohio;—for example, we think that our returns are incorrect, and that our population is much larger than is shown by the census; statisticians, well-informed and intelligent, assure us that the census returns, as to Ohio, are grossly deficient. But these returns purport to be complete. The returns from California do not purport to be complete.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] informs us that statisticians are of opinion, very generally, that if census returns come within ten per cent. of the actual population, they are very accurate. It is not a case, then, where the returns are simply incorrect, that would justify a revision; or where the returning officer professes to have done his duty, and has come to results that are, apparently, accurate. But, where the census agent for the State, having the general control of all matters appertaining to the enumeration, reports to Congress, or the proper department, that the census is defective and incomplete; where the sworn officer of the Government, advises us that the enumeration has not in fact been made, that there is indeed no actual enumeration of the population of a particular State, it surely becomes the duty of Congress to ascertain, from the best evidence in its power, the true number of inhabitants, and to give a representation according to the true numbers. We cannot inquire in such a case, whether justice to one State will operate to the disadvantage of another State. The rule is established by law, and all that we have to do is to apply it under the guidance of the Constitution, making the apportionment according to the numbers, and using the enumeration merely as a means of ascertaining what the numbers are.

Mr. BADGER. It seems to me that the presentation of the facts in this case in a few words would be sufficient to show that South Carolina has a right to the member that she now claims under the fraction, and that Louisiana can have no claim in consequence of the allowance of that member.

Now, sir, how comes the question here? The act of 1850 directs that so soon as the enumeration shall be completed, and the returns made, the Secretary of the Interior shall proceed to ascertain and apportion members to the different States, and shall announce the result. But the act of 1850 does not specify any time within which these returns shall be completed. If the returns had been completed, and if the returns from California had been returned into the office of the Secretary of the Interior with the same apparent accuracy and completeness as they have been received from other States, then this subject, if I understand it—and I think my friend from Missouri [Mr. GEYER] concurs with me entirely—could not have come before Congress at all; or if there had been a time fixed by the act of 1850, at which it should be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to proceed to announce the apportionment according to the act of 1850, then, notwithstanding this difficulty in regard to the enumeration of the population of California, this subject would not have come here at all. But the returns of California not being complete returns—and it should be understood that I am not now speaking of the accuracy, but of completeness—the Secretary sends us word, “I cannot execute this law. Under this law I am to wait until returns are made from all the States before I can proceed to make the apportionment.” Now, unless Congress should interfere, and afford some legislative enactment that will enable this apportionment to be declared, the act of 1850 cannot be executed. That is the state of the case; and that being the state of the case, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine is, that we should allow to California, upon what is a reasonable and fair and just estimate of her population, two members of Congress.

If we stop there, and make no further provision, the consequence would be that South Carolina would lose the member which her largest fraction, in the existing state of the returns, entitles her to under the act of 1850. The largest fraction entitles South Carolina to that member just as much, under the law, as under the law she is entitled to any of her other members; for the largest fraction is, under the law, precisely equivalent to a full member, so far as the right is concerned. We cannot, therefore, without great impropriety, deprive South Carolina of that member, by giving to California, upon an estimate of her population, two members. It is becoming, it is gracious, it is right, it is, in every respect, defensible and proper, upon an estimate reasonable and just as this is before us, to give California the two members. But it cannot be just or proper, upon an estimate by which we confer a member upon California, to take from South Carolina a member to which she has a right, under the law of 1850, according to an actual enumeration. Therefore, it seems to me that the proper method of adjusting this matter is that proposed by the Senator from Maine, to leave California her two members in the House of Representatives, and to say that South Carolina may have the member to which she is entitled on the ground of having the largest fraction.

As to the case of Louisiana, on what possible foundation does her claim rest? If you direct the Secretary of the Interior to proceed to make the apportionment, treating the present returns as being completed under the act of 1850, Louisiana has no right to that member.

Mr. DOWNS. And yet you propose to give California one, when her fraction is less than that of Louisiana.

Mr. BADGER. That of Louisiana is not the largest one. I have endeavored to explain why we propose to give California the member. In our past history, we have given members upon estimates, but we have never taken away one. I do not know that, when there has been an actual enumeration, complete upon its face, we have ever given one. So that, so far as the claim of Louisiana is concerned, Vermont might just as well come in upon the allowance of a Representative to Louisiana. Vermont has a fraction of forty-three thousand.

Mr. WELLER. New Hampshire has the next largest fraction to that of Louisiana.

Mr. BADGER. We see there would be no end to the propositions which would be made for enlarging the House of Representatives. I take the case to be this: If we direct the Secretary of the Interior to proceed now to declare the enumeration, what is the result? California has one member, and South Carolina undoubtedly has the member to which she is entitled. But we propose to give to California, on account of her very peculiar condition, an additional member. Why should we interfere with the rest of the census, because we give her an additional member? Why interfere to do what there is no justice in doing? The relative number of members to which Louisiana is entitled is ascertained by actual and complete enumeration. We give California a member because, though she has not such an enumeration, we have no time to wait to have one taken now; and if we had, it is impossible to ascertain the numbers in California under the act of 1850. We, therefore, give her the member. It is fair and reasonable; but it would be, in my opinion, unjust to take away from South Carolina the member to which she is entitled. As to giving one to Louisiana, we cannot do it without admitting the claims of New Hampshire; and if we admit the claims of New Hampshire, then we must admit those of Vermont. It seems to me the true rule and the right policy will be to give California two members, and leave the census to operate as it does upon other portions of the United States, after adding one to the number of members in the House of Representatives.

Mr. CHASE. In reply to the remarks of the honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] I may be permitted to observe that I am not aware of any case in the history of the Government in which a Representative has been allowed to any State on an estimate of numbers. If the Senator is aware of any such case, I should be glad to know it. I am not aware of any such precedent, unless the allowance of representation to a new State upon her admission, in advance of an actual enumeration of population under the laws of the United States, is one.

Mr. BADGER. I will answer the inquiry of the honorable Senator from Ohio, by asking if there has ever been an instance in which there has not been an actual enumeration?

Mr. WELLER. I believe that a case of this kind has never occurred before.

Mr. CHASE. It is quite true that a case of this kind has not occurred before; but the Senator from North Carolina says that if two members be given to California, and six to South Carolina, the rights of Louisiana remain unaffected. Now, is that so? Do we not amend the act of 1850, and increase the aggregate of Representatives to two hundred and thirty-four? Certainly we do. We make two hundred and thirty-four the basis of the whole apportionment; and when that is done, Louisiana comes next upon the list of fractions, and would be entitled to another Representative upon precisely the same argument which applies to the State of South Carolina at this time.

It is said, sir, that this is an exceptional case. But the fact that a like case has not occurred before, does not discharge us from our duties under the Constitution. The Constitution requires us to make the apportionment according to numbers and not according to estimate. It does not prescribe, absolutely, the rule upon which we shall ascertain the number; but when, by whatever rule, those numbers shall have been ascertained, the obligation devolves upon us to apportion accordingly. If the aggregate, two hundred and thirty-four members, is made the basis, and applied according to the act of 1850, Louisiana will have a fraction, which will entitle her to a Representative, if South Carolina is now entitled to one on the basis of two hundred and thirty-three members. That cannot be denied. I do not see that we get rid of the conclusion by changing the form of the facts. We arrive, after all, at one result, that there are to be two hundred and thirty-four Representatives. These Representatives the Constitution requires to be apportioned among the States according to their respective numbers. And if you take as your guide the act of 1850, then most unquestionably the State of Louisiana will be entitled to five Representatives, if South Carolina is now entitled to six. What the honorable Senator from Maine proposes by his amendment, and what the honorable Senator from North Carolina defends, is nothing more nor less than an arbitrary assignment of a member to South Carolina, unless you are prepared to go further, and revise the whole apportionment to the new basis. One or the other of these States is not entitled, and cannot be entitled, to the number of members proposed.

Mr. GEYER. I have very few remarks to make, and they consist principally in the statement of propositions.

But for the failure of the returns from California, the subject would not be before us. It is because the act of 1850 could not be executed, as it now stands, that we are called on to make some modification of that act, by which we can have the next, the Thirty-third, Congress elected.

Now, the first proposition I submit is this: that the returns—the official returns—under the act of 1850, so far as they go, ought to govern us. The official returns include all the States but one. We have, then, the actual returns of all the States, including South Carolina, to determine their representation under that law. Now, my proposition is, that we adhere to that law, so far as it goes. It includes South Carolina and excludes Louisiana. But there is one State that would be unprovided for. The act of 1850 does not extend to that State; and if we can act at all with reference to the subject—if we are not obliged to wait until all the returns are obtained, we must adopt some principle with respect to that State which is excluded by these returns under the act of 1850.

Some honorable Senators seem to suppose that California is necessarily entitled to two Representatives under the provisions of the act for her admission. I apprehend, however, that if it appears affirmatively by testimony—not equal, certainly, to the returns, but such as would be satisfactory—that her population is not such as would entitle her to two Representatives, Congress would not allow them; but in the present state of the case, the proof of the affirmative lies with those who propose to deny her the two Representatives. Prima facie, she is entitled to the representation allowed to her by the act providing for her admission, and to that we should adhere, unless it shall be shown, affirmatively, that she has not the population equal to entitle her to that representation. I state again, that, with respect to California, if we cannot act under the act of 1850, we must adopt a different rule. That act provides for the cases of the States of South Carolina and Louisiana; and if we put the testimony which is before us altogether out of the question, I am disposed to look on California as entitled, prima facie, to two Representatives. Then the whole question that remains is, whether the evidence that is furnished to us authorizes us to say that she has not the population. According to the examination that I have given to the matter, I have arrived at the conclusion that her population would leave her a fraction above the ratio of one Representative, greatly superior to that of South Carolina. But as that testimony is not as conclusive as returns would be, I do not feel authorized to take from South Carolina the Representative to whom, according to the official returns on which we are acting, she is entitled.

For these reasons I am in favor of the amendment. But if the amendment does not pass, then the bill ought to be rejected. If the act of 1850 is to be adhered to, we must wait until we obtain these returns. The bill, as proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary, proposes to include some returns from California, amounting, I think, to twenty-five thousand inhabitants, adding that number to the official returns made to us of the population. It occurs to me that we are taking great liberties with the census returns, when we undertake thus to pronounce upon them, without waiting for the official returns of the officers sent out to make them. We are not in the execution of the act of 1850; because the twenty-fifth section of that act contemplates that all returns shall be in before you make the apportionment; and when you pass the first section of this act, it is a plain departure from the twenty-fifth section of the act I have just alluded to; because after having enacted that no apportionment shall be made until the whole of the returns are in, we anticipate some of these returns, and make apportionments here by acts of Congress, leaving out of the State of California a large portion of her population. I think, therefore, that if we act at all, we are in a position in which we should include both of these States; executing the act of 1850, so far as it goes, and providing for other cases, not provided for by the act; the State of California, which is not included, and which stands precisely in the same position as if no returns had been made from that State.

Mr. BADGER. As to this question, she stands just as when she was first admitted.

Mr. GEYER. If I have made myself understood, I think I have shown clearly that we must either abandon the undertaking of making the apportionment at all, or if the act of 1850 is to be adopted as a rule, to carry it out only so far as those States are concerned from which we have full returns, and then adopt an equitable and just rule in relation to that State, which cannot have a representative apportionment under that act.

Mr. DOWNS. I shall endeavor to be very brief in the expression of the few arguments which I propose to submit. It seems to me—to commence where others left off—that there are insuperable objections to the suggestion of the Senator who has just taken his seat, that this apportionment should be postponed because we have not got complete returns from California. There is no time to postpone it. The presidential election comes on in a very short time; hence it becomes necessary and essential that this apportionment should be made known very speedily; because, if we do not; if we permit this matter to lie over, it will be doing, not an injustice to one State alone, but to half a dozen States or more, whose representation will be increased by the new apportionment. We cannot, therefore, postpone it or put it off. We cannot delay it, or avoid it at this time without doing still greater injustice to other States. I therefore take it for granted, that it is out of the question that this matter can be delayed. We have put it off already to the last moment, and it is now necessary to decide it, and to decide speedily.

I think one radical error has run through the whole of the arguments advanced on this subject by those who advocate this amendment. The foundation of all their arguments is based upon one position, which, I think, is an error: that is, that there are no returns from California. That, I think, is a very great mistake. The honorable Senator from South Carolina [Mr. RUETT] yesterday, when proposing his proviso, in the remarks which he made, concurred in the views of the majority of the committee, that we could not go into estimates in a matter of this kind—that the Constitution did not authorize it. But he placed the amendment on a different ground, which I think entirely untenable, namely, that although, according to the enumeration, California was not entitled to two members, yet, by a provision of the act admitting her into the Union, as she was entitled to two Representatives until the enumeration took place, therefore she is entitled to two now. I cannot so understand it. The language of the act of admission is very similar—I believe is in the identical words of the Constitution—that until the enumeration shall take place, this representation shall stand. It is exactly the language used in the admission of all the States, and in the Constitution—until the first enumeration should be made. What does it mean then? It means only that she shall be entitled to this representation until the usual time of taking the census—nothing more. I put it to Senators to say if a single Senator, who voted for that measure, supposed that it ever contemplated, or can be construed to mean, anything more than to give California that representation until the next enumeration should take place.

There is no implied pledge, then, no binding obligation on the part of the United States Government to continue to California her two members, more than there is to continue to Maine or to Massachusetts, or any other State, its old number. As was well observed, yesterday, it is no vested right. The Constitution provides that a new enumeration shall take place every ten years, and a new apportionment be made on the ground of such enumeration, to continue for ten years. The time fixed for the last apportionment, is about to expire; and at the end of that time, no State has any right to claim the same number of representation, unless entitled to it by the enumeration; on the contrary, if she should continue to hold on to it when other States are entitled to it, it would be doing great injustice to them.

But I wish to advert to some facts, to show that the position assumed that there are no returns here, is a great and fundamental error; and that all the arguments in favor of this amendment, being based on that, if it is found untenable, fall to the ground. Let us look at the official data, and see what returns have been made. I will state, that this matter is materially different now, according to the record, from what it was when the Secretary of the Interior made his report to the President. Then he could say, with great propriety, that the returns were defective, and that there was a number of counties from which he had no returns. He was perfectly correct; but in stating that, at that time, he had no secondary evidence by which he could arrive at the population of the counties which were wanting. That was very true at the time the report was sent in. Now, the state of the facts is very different. The very information of which the Secretary was in want, and the want of which precluded him from making the apportionment, we have on our tables; and the principal cause which led the Executive to call upon Congress to act on this subject is removed. This information was not in the hands of the Secretary at the time, and, therefore, was not taken in view. So clear is it, that I am strongly of the impression, that if the facts which I shall now state to the Senate had been present to the mind of the Secretary and of the President, that message would not have been sent in, but the apportionment would have been made.

Mr. GWIN. I would state to the Senator, that this very testimony which was before the Committee on the Judiciary was before the Secretary, but he did not consider himself authorized to receive these returns.

Mr. DOWNS. They were not before the Secretary, because the language of the report shows they were not. He said that no returns had been received for those which had been burnt up. I will read an extract from his report presently. He goes on the ground that, except for nineteen counties which he names, there are no official returns; and he says expressly, that for all the counties except those nineteen, there are no returns at all, because the tables were burnt up in San Francisco. Now, whether the Secretary did or did not know—and I presume he did not, because he did not mention it—it was known to the committee, and they have so reported, that previous to the fire, the returns of those counties which were missing had been made to the Secretary of State of California, and therefore the want could be supplied, and supplied, not by evidence secondary in its character, but by evidence provided for in the act of 1850; for it is there provided that the census officers shall make one return to the Secretary of the Interior, and another to the Secretary of State of the State. Now, it cannot be denied, that had the return which was made to the Secretary of State of California, been made to the Secretary of the Interior, it would have been regular and official. Well, the same act which authorized the one, authorized the other. The one is a duplicate of the other; and yet you are told that the return made to the Secretary of State of California was no return at all! Clearly that is an error, and the returns for the counties of San Francisco, Contra Costa, and Santa Clara, are shown by the return made to the Secretary of State of California, and are entitled to just as much weight as those which were made to the Secretary of the Interior. But as I wish to make this point very clear, I will refer to a portion of the report of the Secretary of the Interior. It is in the report of the committee:

"Full returns have been received from the agents engaged in taking the census in all the States except California. Complete returns have been received from nineteen counties of that State."

That is a pretty good fraction to begin with. It is a pretty hard thing to say, when the Secretary says that "complete returns have been received from nineteen counties," that there are no returns at all. But that is not all; he proceeds:

"Complete returns have been received from nineteen counties in that State, and partial returns from five others, viz: Butte, Sacramento, San Joaquin, Trinity, and Tuolumne. From the remaining four counties, viz: Klamath, Santa Clara, Contra Costa, and San Francisco, no returns whatever have been received. Information has been communicated to the Department to the effect that the census of these counties was duly taken, but that the schedules were destroyed by one of the conflagrations which laid a great part of the city of San Francisco in ashes. No copies of these schedules were preserved, and there is now no legal means of supplying the loss occasioned by the destruction."

Evidently, then, the Secretary was totally unaware that these returns were made to the Secretary of State of California; otherwise he would have known that there was a means at his command to supply the deficiency.

Mr. GWIN. Even with that, only twenty-three counties are accounted for, while there are twenty-seven in the State.

Mr. DOWNS. I shall account for them. If the gentleman will wait until I get through, he will probably find that I shall account for more than he thinks of; I have only commenced, and have not got through yet.

That is the statement made by the Secretary of the Interior in his report. Now, let us see how these defects have been cured since that time. He said then, "partial returns have been received from five others, viz: Butte, Sacramento, San Joaquin, Trinity, and Tuolumne." Now, returns from those counties are embraced in the list which the committee adopt. It is true, they are said to be partial; but I contend that we have every reason to believe that they are correct. They were taken a long time ago; there has been ample time to correct them if there was any error in them; the agent had instructions from the Government to make corrections, if necessary. An impression seems to have prevailed with the Legislature of California and others, more than a year ago, that these returns were erroneous. They must have been made a long time ago; yet on the records we have nothing official or clear to show any corrections or any alterations whatever. As to one of the counties, the returns of which are imperfect—the county of Tuolumne—the agent states, in one of his letters, that he had received returns from it, but did not send them because they were so imperfect. Now, I should like to have had them sent in whether perfect or not perfect, because there is one strange feature about these returns, and I should like to have seen if the same thing would apply to this county, when corrected, that did to some others, viz: whether the population would not have turned out less instead of greater than in the first returns. I should like the agent to have sent in those returns, as it was his duty to do, however imperfect he may have considered them, so that we might have seen how they stood.

But the honorable Senator from California suggests that there are only nineteen counties mentioned here. I will show him how the other counties are accounted for by a later report of the Census Bureau. Here is a statement, dated March 5, 1852, table No. 4, containing a recapitulation of the facts: "Aggregate of counties in the State, twenty-eight; counties returned in full, twenty-two." In the report of the Secretary we were told that the returns of nineteen counties were received complete; now we are told there are twenty-two, including, exactly, the three which I mentioned as having been obtained since. What are the others? "Counties returned in part only, two. Counties from which no returns have been received, four." That makes up the whole number. And here I wish to say—that all these facts may go to the public—that so far as the census is concerned, the counties ought to be considered as twenty-seven instead of twenty-eight; because there was some doubt in the committee, whether, in 1850, the county of Klamath did exist; but it has now been made clear by the statement of Mr. McCORKLE, that it was created afterwards; so that if it had been returned with the other counties before it was created a distinct county, of course you could not put it in as a separate county. The committee supposed that it was properly not accounted for, because it was created after June, 1850, when the census ought to have been taken. Mr. McCORKLE states that fact distinctly. Taking that statement in regard to that county, it leaves three counties from which no returns were received by the Secretary of the Interior; and those are the very ones mentioned in the report of the committee, whose population they took from the returns made to the Secretary of State of California. Are they correct or not? I have shown that they are official and entitled to as much weight as if they had been sent to the Secretary of the Interior. Is there any impeachment of those returns? I have not heard it. They were sent to the Secretary of State's office at the time, were brought here, and have been incorporated in the tables upon which the committee have acted. I think, then, the census may be considered as complete. According to the last report of the bureau, twenty-two counties are made out as perfect; the returns of the two which are set down as imperfect, I have shown have stood for a long time, and no correction has been made in them, and, therefore, we may consider them perfect; we account for the three which remain by giving the returns which were made to the Secretary of State of California. I ask gentlemen now, taking these facts into consideration, how they can say there is no return from California? There is not a county, that existed in 1850, for which there are not official returns. There is an official suggestion of only two, as it now stands, being imperfect, and one of them is the county of Tuolumne, from which it seems the agent did receive returns, but for some cause or other, held them back.

With this state of facts; with complete returns, as the Secretary says, from nineteen counties; with complete returns, as the census agent says in his last report, from twenty-two counties, when, as is stated by Mr. McCORKLE, Klamath county was not organized until after June 1st, 1850, and, therefore, its inhabitants must have been enumerated in some other county; and inasmuch as in the last report we have the returns from the counties of San Francisco, Contra Costa, and Santa Clara, I wish to know with what grace or propriety California can come here now and ask us to throw overboard the returns from that State, and go merely by guess-work. It cannot be done without the exercise of an arbitrary power, based on no proper, legal, or equitable foundation.

There is one circumstance connected with this subject to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate, or rather to extend the very proper argument made yesterday by the honorable Senator from Georgia. The argument on the other side is constantly based on the idea that these returns are erroneous, that they are too little, that they ought to be increased. And yet the record shows a very strange fact—that in a majority of cases where a correction of the returns of any of these counties has taken place, there has been a diminution in the returns. Gentlemen estimate large masses of population in the State of California. Let us look at it. Let us look at the returns made to the Legislature of California, and then at the returns we have lately received from the Census Office. In the return of the census agent to the secretary of State of California, he puts down Butte county at four thousand seven hundred and eighty-six. In the late returns which we have received from the Census Office, and which were made subsequent to the former, it is put down at three thousand five hundred and seventy-four. Does it look like injustice to give California only one Representative when there is this diminution in one county? Let us look at another county. Here is the county of Sacramento put down in the return of the census agent to the Secretary of State of California at eleven thousand. In the late returns from the Census Office it is put down at nine thousand and eighty-seven. Then there are the counties of San Joaquin, Mariposa, and Santa Clara—five counties in all, in which the corrections that have been made diminish and not increase the returns. The returns of some of the counties have been corrected since the report of the census agent to the Secretary of State of California; and in these five counties, instead of there being an increase, there has been a very material reduction. I present to the Senator now, whether, on this state of facts, we can assume that those great errors have been made which are assumed to have been made in California? There are two or three other counties which I have marked in which there has been a slight increase.

Mr. WELLER. When was that return made to the Census Office?

Mr. DOWNS. I do not think it is stated.

Mr. WELLER. Then by what authority does the Senator assume that that return was made to the Census Office after the return of the census agent was laid before the Legislature of California?

Mr. DOWNS. I assume that when we called for the returns, the Census Office sent us the latest and most correct ones.

Mr. WELLER. Before the Senator undertakes to complain of discrepancies between the return made to the Legislature of California and that made to us by the Census Office, he must show that the return was sent to the Census Office subsequent to the time when the return of the census agent was laid before the Legislature. Unless he can show that, there is no force in his argument. That is an important point.

Mr. DOWNS. I am not sure that the returns show that fact, but I have heard it, and I think it is the natural inference. The information sent here by the Census Bureau is to the latest date. I do not know, because I have not looked into the papers with that view, whether there is anything to show that this report was actually made after the other; but I certainly am impressed with the belief that it is so, and I still think that it must have been made subsequently to the report made to the Legislature of California. This information from the Census Bureau was sent here after that, under the date of the 5th of March; and hence I think that it is a reasonable inference that the report was made after the other; but I have not the documents before me to show that it was so. There are two statements here which correspond very much—one made by the Department on the 5th of March, and another made on the 25th of February to the Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN.] Both reports are substantially the same. I think, then, that there is a strong presumption that those who urge the amendment of the Senator from Maine, are mistaken in supposing that the population of California is so great as they would have us to believe. If it be allowed in any case to make estimates—to go into calculations of this kind, certainly it ought to be on the clearest and most undisputed facts; but when we have the fact that, instead of the population having increased in this time it has diminished, I think it would be a very forced construction, indeed, to assume that such large masses of population exist there.

I shall not enter into an analysis of the statements made by the honorable member from California, in the other House, [Mr. McCORKLE.] I do not desire to do so at all. I take his statements just as they are. They are the opinions of an individual—no doubt his honest opinions, but I object to using them for testimony, because they are not that kind of evidence upon which we can act. If you allow that sort of evidence, the members from other States may come in and make statements that, according to their opinion, there are inaccuracies in the returns from their States. But we should not rely upon evidence of that kind. Such evidence is not contemplated by the law. It is not such as can be received. But, if we look into this testimony, what does it amount to? What are the grounds on which Mr. McCORKLE undertakes to show that there is this large amount of population in California? If he had submitted facts well ascertained, then no doubt they would be entitled to weight. If he had shown that the legislative committee there had ascertained the population of particular counties, and compared it with the census returns, it would be entitled to great weight. If he had stated the number of votes in their different counties, a fair inference might be drawn as to the population of California. If, when he was speaking of the number of emigrants that had gone to California, he would also give us the returns of those who had left there, we might have made some calculation on that; but when he gives us no facts on which we can test his calculation, and only gives us the result of his own calculations, I do think it is not constitutional to base our legislation upon such estimates.

So of the census agent. It is true he stated—honestly, no doubt—that some of these returns were not complete. I have no doubt that every agent throughout the United States might make the same statement, though not, perhaps, to the same extent. We all know that perfect accuracy can never be obtained in a matter of this kind. All we can expect is, an approach to accuracy. I do not pretend to controvert the fact, that there were greater difficulties in California than elsewhere; but that is not any reason why the people of California should have a greater privilege than the people of the other States.

We have been told that it would be a hard case to exclude California, because this enumeration has not been made; that such things may occur again; and that other States may be deprived of their rights. I think the force of that argument will be diminished very much, when we take into consideration the fact that, although this Government has been in operation for more than sixty years, such a case has never occurred before, and is not likely to occur again. It is the Seventh Census which has just been taken. The States have increased to more than double the number they were sixty years ago. There have been new Territories added to the Union, and in some of them there have been as great, or nearly as great, difficulties in taking the census, as in California; still, there has been no such failure as the other side allege there has been here. I think such a difficulty will not occur again.

But is there not danger of falling into another error, still more alarming, still more grievous than this? States do not always gain by a new enumeration; but some of them lose. They might hereafter get into a squabble, or make a controversy in relation to the matter, and thus defeat an apportionment, so as to allow those States which lose, to keep their own numbers. If you establish the principle that when a State loses under a new census, she can hold on to her old number of Representatives, and has, as gentlemen say, a vested right to hold on to that representation, whenever we have a census taken, we shall get into a squabble; we shall always have a difficulty hereafter. States which lose under an apportionment, will claim their old representation, and thus we shall have a continual difficulty. It is necessary, then, in order to do justice to all, that this apportionment should take place; and that it should operate alike on all.

The honorable Senator from California who addressed the Senate with so much eloquence yesterday, seemed to think that it would be a great hardship and injustice to deprive California; and he says she is entitled to the same rights as other States. I admit that she is; I never have, and never will, deny her anything which she is entitled to ask. She is our far sister on the Pacific. She ought to be, and I have no doubt she ever will be, as she has heretofore been, cherished by this Government. But when I say that, I am not prepared to say that because she is on the Pacific and is filled with gold mines, she ought to stand beyond the pale of the Constitution, and not submit to it like other States. I will give her every privilege to which she is entitled; if there is any doubt, I will give it to her; but when she stands up and asks us to give her a representation on a mere estimate, which was never done before in the case of any State, I must object to it. I think when she asks this, she asks more than she is constitutionally entitled to, and I for one, am not prepared to give it to her. I would apply to her the same rule that I would apply to all the members of the Confederacy; and I would not go beyond it.

It has been said that the taking the census was the work of the United States, and that we are responsible for it. That is literally true; but still that argument is not entitled to the weight which gentlemen impress upon us. It is true that the census is nominally taken by the United States, but it is also true that the agents who take it are the citizens of the respective States. They have an interest in it. It is not a part of the official duty of the States, but it is a matter in which they have much interest. In a case like that of California, where there are the greatest reasons why the most perfect exactness should be observed in a matter of this kind, the State might have aided. When we consider the circumstances under which California was admitted to this Union before—when we consider the doubt and difficulty which existed on this subject—when it was ascertained, by the return to the Legislature of California, that there would be a great deal wanting to make up the necessary quantum for two members, the Legislature of that State might have taken some method of presenting to our view evidence to satisfy us that the State was entitled to two Representatives. They knew that under the act of 1850 the apportionment could not be made for other parts of the United States before we had the correct returns from California—hence, I think, it presents one of those extraordinary cases where it was proper and incumbent upon the State of California in some way, not to take a regular census, but to take such secondary evidence as would satisfy us that the number for which she contends is correct. Is there anything of the kind? I see nothing like it. It is not a very uncommon thing for the States to take a census of their inhabitants. They generally take it not only as often as the United States, but many of the States take their census twice as often. In some States the census is taken every five years, and in some every six or seven years. California ascertained more than twelve months ago that she could not get more than one Representative, unless the returns were made to show that she was entitled to two. The only reason which is urged why the census was not taken is the want of money. No doubt California could have advanced the money; and under the circumstances she might have done so. It was her own interest to prevent a loss in the number of her Representatives; and although she was not called upon to do it, she might have advanced the money necessary for the completion of the census. It was not her duty to do so, but in a matter so important to her, it might have been done; and no doubt if such secondary evidence had been produced in any form so as to satisfy us that California had the requisite population for two Representatives, we would give her that number. We do not require the actual returns in every case where it is impossible to have them; but we want estimates that can be relied upon. There are many ways in which estimates of the population might be made and presented to us here. One of the most ready ways of making a computation of the population, and a way very easy to do it in California, would be to take the number of votes cast at the general election there last summer. Although that would not be conclusive, it would certainly throw great light on the subject. If the gentlemen from that State had submitted to us the votes given in the different counties, it would have aided us very much. Let us see the votes of some of the counties, the population of which is put down at ten thousand or twenty thousand, and let us make a calculation, and see whether or not there is any mistake. No doubt there are a large number of voters there. This is on account of the great number of male emigrants who have gone there. I suppose the voters constitute a larger portion of the population there than anywhere else. But we can make allowance for that. If, for instance, a county gave a very small vote in a contested election for Governor and members of Congress, it would certainly weaken the impression that the population of that country was very great. Nothing of the kind is shown.

It was alleged the other day that a great many emigrants had gone to California who had contributed to swell her population. I said before, and the more I reflect upon it, the more I am impressed with the idea, that a very large portion of the population that went to California have returned. The steamers arriving from California every week or two bring back large numbers. We have had statements of the number who crossed the mountains to California, and of the number who arrived there in vessels. Why did not gentlemen also present to us some estimate, some calculation as to the number who have returned from California? None of the members interested in this matter have produced any estimates to show that one half or one third of the population who originally went to California are now there.

Under these circumstances, then, I cannot see how gentlemen so readily come to the conclusion—for they must come to the conclusion before they adopt this amendment—that the population of California is enough to entitle her to an additional Representative for her fraction. Besides, allowance should be made in regard to the statement of the gentleman from California, [Mr. McCORKLE,] who is a member of the other House, because it has, perhaps, reference to the present time, or to some period subsequent to that at which the census was taken. Even admitting that his calculations were correct, it must be remembered that changes are rapid and sudden in California. Because there is a large influx of population into one particular place, it does not follow that the population of the whole State has increased. People there rush to one mine yielding a great deal at some particular place, remain there until it is exhausted, and then go as rapidly somewhere else. There may have been great changes in that way. California is a peculiar country, and in estimating population there, you cannot apply the same rules and calculations as elsewhere. No doubt the places to which he refers may have largely increased in population; but people probably rush there from some other part of the State on account of a good mine or something of that sort.

Thinking, as I do, that when we go into estimates, they ought to be clear and unquestionable, and ought to raise such a presumption as to do away with the idea of anything existing in opposition to it, I cannot vote for an additional member for California. If the Senate, without going into any vague guesses, believe that from these facts California has not population enough to entitle her to two Representatives, they cannot give her an additional member. This is too important and delicate a question to be influenced by estimates, unless they are such as are conclusively established.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] seems to feel very much at a loss to know how it is that Louisiana can have any claim under any circumstances. It seems to me to be a very simple case. Louisiana asks nothing more than what is granted to her sister States, and that she has a right to ask. Whatever the Senator from North Carolina may say, she cannot, and will not, sit down tamely, and see herself excluded with a fraction of forty-six thousand, when California is admitted to a member with a fraction of twenty-five thousand. This does not apply to the other States, because they have comparatively small fractions. Louisiana does not claim another member, if you stop where the committee have stopped. The committee unanimously agreed to give the member to South Carolina. There could be no reasonable difficulty about that? What they divided about was, whether California should have an additional member. If you give South Carolina what she is entitled to, and deal with California according to the returns, Louisiana will have nothing to say. She never complains of injustice. She takes the Constitution and laws as they are. But when you step out of the pale of the Constitution to give California a member on a fraction of twenty-five thousand, then she does come in and insist (which I hope will not be refused) that she shall have a member for her fraction of forty-six thousand.

There is one portion of the remarks of the honorable Senator from California, [Mr. WELLER,] who addressed the Senate yesterday, to which it is hardly necessary to advert, because the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. DAWSON] pretty fully replied to it. The Senator from California, in some of his remarks, evidently committed a mistake in regard to the tables accompanying the report. He took the one hundred and seventeen thousand, and then, by adding some counties returned to the Legislature of California, made up a total of one hundred and thirty thousand, or one hundred and forty thousand, supposing that the same counties had not been included in the previous statement. According to a statement made by the Census Office to his colleague on February 25, and a statement made to the committee, March 5, the population of California amounted to ninety-two thousand five hundred and ninety-seven. By adding the three counties of San Francisco, Santa Clara, and Contra Costa, returned to the Legislature of California, the sum of one hundred and seventeen thousand is made up. But there is nothing more to add. There is no calculation by which you can make it up to one hundred and thirty thousand or one hundred and forty thousand. It must have been an inadvertence on the part of the honorable Senator.

Mr. WELLER. I am not aware yet that I have fallen into any error. What I said yesterday was that "Exhibit A," attached to this report, puts down the population of twenty-four counties at one hundred and seventeen thousand three hundred and eighteen. I said that, on an examination of that table, I found that the counties of Tuolumne, Santiago, and Los Angeles—all of which had been organized long before that time—were not included. I was compelled, therefore, to go back to page 8 of the report for the purpose of ascertaining what was the population of those three counties; and I found, upon adding that to the one hundred and seventeen thousand three hundred and eighteen, it gave a total of one hundred and thirty thousand. I am not yet aware that I committed any mistake in that calculation. "Exhibit A," certainly does not include these three counties.

Mr. DOWNS. But the other table does.

Mr. WELLER. In the other table these three counties are given, and, by adding them to the returns in "Exhibit A," you have a total of one hundred and thirty thousand.

Mr. DOWNS. Then you add the returns of these three counties twice.

Mr. WELLER. Oh, no. I have taken the trouble to run up the figures myself, and I find that the returns in "Exhibit A" are correct, as far as they go, and they foot up one hundred and seventeen thousand three hundred and eighteen. The twenty-four counties are correctly set down at that; but then the other three counties are not embraced in that estimate. Gentlemen will find it so by an inspection of the tables.

Mr. DOWNS. I think the matter is easily understood by a comparison of the tables. In "Exhibit A," it is true, there are some counties, as the gentleman says, left out; but they are embraced in the other calculations. In the committee we took, as the basis of our calculation, table No. 4, which omits the population of those counties from which no returns were received at the Department. We took the returns received at the Department as official, as far as they went; and then we took the population of the counties of San Francisco, Contra Costa, and Santa Clara from the returns laid before the Legislature of California. In order to complete the list, as sent from the Department, we had only to add the returns of these three counties, which we took from the report made to the Legislature of California. The returns received from the Department made the population only ninety-two thousand five hundred and ninety-seven. By adding the returns of these three counties, we obtained the sum of one hundred and seventeen thousand. This corresponds with the statement made on the 25th of February last to one of the Senators from California. It is clear, then, that the statement of the committee is correct. This is it:

"In this return the population of the three counties from which no returns were sent to Washington, was stated as follows:

San Francisco.....	21,000
Contra Costa.....	732
Santa Clara.....	3,502

Making, in all.....	25,234
Add to this the population of the other counties (doc. No. 4).....	92,597

Makes the total population of the State.....117,831

This is according to the last return made to us from the Census Office. There is no possible calculation, according to the figures, by which you can make out a larger population in California than one hundred and seventeen thousand. There are no other counties to be added to this. The county of Klamath has been created since the census was taken. In the statement of the census agent, I believe he grouped the returns of three counties together; but that does not make any material difference. I think, then, that it is clear that the ascertained population of California, from the returns, is one hundred and seventeen thousand.

From these considerations, it does seem to me that the only conclusion to which we can come rationally, is the one to which the committee came. We must take the actual returns, and act upon them. We have no discretionary power to go beyond them. The evils and dangers of going beyond them would be very great. It may operate hard on California this time; and though we regret that, still it must be remembered that if such extraordinary diligence as ought to have actuated the State, had been used, this defect of which they complain might perhaps, in some degree, have been supplied. Better that California now should suffer than that, on such a delicate question, we should be set loose without any principle of the Constitution to guide us. I hope the amendment will be amended in the way I propose, or if it is not, that it will be rejected.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DAWSON. I do not intend to make a speech. I only intend to state a few facts. Since yesterday, I have reviewed the positions which I then took, and I have become more convinced that they are true. I was gratified to hear the points presented this morning by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GEYER,] one of the minority of the committee. He holds that the affirmative is on the part of those who are against allowing California an additional member, on the ground that the returns are not complete. He says that, prima facie, they are not complete. I take him upon that principle, and I shall demonstrate from table No. 4, accompanying the report, that the returns are complete. There are twenty-seven counties in California—some say there are twenty-eight counties; but Klamath was not a county at the time the census was taken, and therefore is not to be included. That is admitted by everybody. The returns to the Census Office come here under the law, and are, prima facie, correct, until the contrary is made to appear. The Senator, I believe, admits that.

Mr. GEYER. I admit that they are reported as being complete—some of them.

Mr. DAWSON. They are returned to the Census Office, and are sent by the Census Office to the Senate of the United States as full returns. In table No. 4, I find the number of counties, and a number of full, and a number of partial returns, and a number of counties not returned at all. The population of those counties returned in full, amounts to eight thousand six hundred and seventy-two. The counties returned in full are twenty-two. They are certified and reported here. The returns of twenty-two counties have been fully reported, and are now in the Census Bureau.

Now, I call upon the Senators who signed the minority report, to say whether this is not, prima facie, in your favor, and conclusive, unless you can show an error? Where is the testimony on which to rest even the presumption of error? There is none. In this table there are two counties which are only partially returned.

Mr. WELLER. If the Senator will allow me, I will tell him where the evidence is on which you can rest the presumption that the returns are incorrect as to these twenty-two counties. It is in the letter of the census agent, in which he says, that in order to ascertain the population of California, you must add from thirty-three to fifty per cent. to the returns.

Mr. DAWSON. Then the census agent who has made these returns to the Census Bureau did act under oath, and his returns are to be presumed to be according to law. As I intended to show yesterday, his suggestion of the thirty-three or fifty per cent. to be added, is not intended to cover the returns which have been made in full to the Department; and even if he were to make this suggestion as to all the returns, it would not be a presumption that would shake testimony which is conclusive. Minor and secondary testimony cannot prevail against that which is final and conclusive. Besides, he did not make the actual enumeration. It was made by the sub-marshals, who did it also under oath, and we are bound, under the law, to consider the twenty-two counties returned here as conclusive; and we have the certificate of the Secretary of the Interior to that effect. There are but two counties, then, according to this table, from which partial returns have been received—Butte and Tuolumne. Now, as to Butte county, where have we got any evidence which is conclusive? Why, the census agent of the State of California in April, 1851, returned to the Legislature of California what he deems to be the full returns of that county; and he puts it down in part in this table, to which I have referred, as three thousand five hundred and seventy-four. When, according to law, he deposits the full returns with the Secretary of State of California, Butte county is set down at four thousand seven hundred and eighty-six. That was when his returns of the census were completed, and nearly one year after the time when the census was to have been taken. Thus there was over a thousand added to the county of Butte.

Then we come to the other county of Tuolumne. In the report of the census agent to the Legislature of California, he states that some of the counties are not put in detail, but that they are put in together, and the aggregate sent in. On the 5th of March, 1852, we received from the Census Office eight thousand eight hundred and fifty-one as the population of Tuolumne county, upon the partial returns which had been received. Have we not the highest testimony that can be obtained of the extent of the population of these counties, even if they have not been returned according to law? How are you going to undo the influence of this conclusion with your prima facie evidence? You take up the views of our friend in the House of Representatives, as to what he supposes to be the population of the State of California. Will any lawyer or statesman suffer a principle vital in itself, and found in the Constitution, to be controlled by testimony of that character? Why, the honorable gentleman from California in the House of Representatives never dreamed of such a suggestion.

Then there were twenty-two counties fully returned, and three to be heard from. Twenty-two and two make twenty-four, and three make twenty-seven. Since that time the other three counties—Contra Costa, Santa Clara, and San Francisco—have been returned, so that we have the complete returns. Let us throw no mystery about this transaction in order to violate a duty for the gratification even of our good friends from California. How are the returns of these three counties accounted for? The law of 1850 made it the duty of the marshal to put one set of his returns in the office of the Secretary of State of the State. Did he do it? Is there a gentleman on this floor who says that he did not? Is there any committee who deny it? Where, then, are you to look to get the population of these three counties accounted for? Why, you are to get them from the census agent of California, through the Secretary of State of the State of California. What does the population of these three counties amount to? Twenty-five thousand two hundred and twenty-four. Is there any gentleman on this floor who has even made the allegation that these three counties were taken dishonestly or unfairly? None. In the event that the returns should be destroyed, (as the returns of these counties were by the conflagration of San Francisco,) what was to be done? Why, we were to get the next best evidence, being the returns deposited in the office of the Secretary of State of the State of California. We have that information. We have those returns from that State; and thus we have full returns—complete returns from the twenty-seven counties of the State. And are not all the presumptions in our favor—in fact, is not the testimony conclusive? And yet gentlemen seek to open these conclusions, founded upon principles of law and sound sense. For what? To change the relative rights of one State toward the other States, giving California a political power inconsistent with the Constitution and the law. Upon what principle do you justify it? It is upon the assumption, not even the presumption, that the returns are wrong. And yet, not even the lucid mind of my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. GEYER] has been able to make this matter clear; still we are called upon to vote two members to California.

As I stated yesterday, it was my wish, when I commenced this investigation, to endeavor to give California two members; but I find it inconsistent with my duty, and in violation of every material fact connected with the controversy. Where is it that you say this enumeration is not full and fair? Where is the evidence before the Senate that we are about to do injustice to the rights of California? Nowhere. I have shown you the returns of twenty-two counties returned in full to the Census Bureau, and so certified by the Secretary of the Interior. Two counties were in part completed and returned by the census agent of California to that State.

Mr. WELLER. The gentleman is certainly mistaken about that. If he is not laboring under an error, I should be very much obliged to him to tell me, either from the report of the census agent to the Legislature or to the Census Bureau, what is the population of Tuolumne county?

Mr. DAWSON. Is that the only county about which the Senator has any questions to ask?

Mr. WELLER. I ask that question now; I may ask another hereafter.

Mr. DAWSON. In Exhibit A, as returned by the census agent to the Legislature of California, he had omitted Tuolumne county; but what does he say? That the aggregate population of the State is one hundred and seventeen thousand three hundred and eighteen.

Mr. WELLER. That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. DAWSON. In the conclusion of his report to the Secretary of State of California, he says:

"With the foregoing explanation, I hope the returns herewith submitted, in Exhibit A, will render satisfactory the duty imposed upon me."

What was the duty imposed upon him? To return the census taken in every county in the State according to the requisitions of the act of 1850.

Mr. WELLER. If the gentleman will look at that table, he will find that not only is Tuolumne county omitted, but that Los Angeles and Santiago are also omitted. It is not the simple omission of the word "Tuolumne," but the figures respecting the population of that county are not to be found in the table. Upon what ground, then, is it that the Senator says there has been a full return from that county? I undertake to say that upon no part of this report can he tell me now what is the population of the county of Tuolumne. He can find out by the returns of the census agent that, from the partial returns received, there was a fraction over eight thousand in that county; but in the returns which he sent to the Secretary of State of California, that county, with two others, is entirely omitted, and therefore it is utterly impossible for any Senator to tell me now what the population of Tuolumne county is.

Mr. DAWSON. In the table putting the population of California at ninety-two thousand five hundred and ninety-seven, Tuolumne county is put down, in part, at eight thousand five hundred and thirty-one.

Mr. WELLER. That is only a partial return. Mr. DAWSON. Eight thousand is said to be a partial return. That is the only point upon which any doubt can be raised; and the Senator, calls upon me now to show its population. How can we ascertain what the population of that county is? Part of the returns were burnt up in the conflagration at San Francisco.

Mr. WELLER. I do not say that the returns of Tuolumne county were burnt up.

Mr. DAWSON. But part of the returns were. The census agent, in his report to the Secretary of State, says that several counties are returned in the aggregate.

Mr. WELLER. But this is not one of them. Mr. DAWSON. I cannot tell that. He says this:

"A letter of recent date, from the deputy to whom was assigned the district embracing the first two named counties, informs me that he has completed his labors there; but furnishes no information as to the number of inhabitants there. I have made repeated efforts—thus far ineffectual—to have the census taken in the county of Tuolumne. I have as yet received no information from the deputy last appointed there. In some instances, as you will observe, the returns are given in round numbers. In such cases those figures are predicated upon the information furnished by the respective deputies, which will be found a near approximation to the 'returns.'"

At the conclusion of his report, he says:

"With the foregoing explanation, I hope the returns herewith submitted in the exhibit A, will render satisfactory the duty imposed upon me."

He then gives one hundred and seventeen thousand three hundred and eighteen as the aggregate population of the State of California. I have looked in vain to find anywhere, from any official account, an increase of that population. I have tried to ascertain if this officer at any time made any return, directly or indirectly, to any officer of an aggregate population greater than that. That county is returned in part as having a population of something over eight thousand. Will any Senator rise on this floor and say that eight thousand was not more than half the population of that county?

Mr. WELLER. I will answer the gentleman cheerfully. I do not know what the population of that county was in 1850, nor do I know what it was at the time the census agent was engaged in taking the census of it. I believe that California was admitted into the Union on the 9th of September, 1850, and so I take it for granted that it was in 1851 that the census agent was engaged in taking the census of California. I have not the least doubt in the world that eight thousand does not comprise more than one half of the population then in the county of Tuolumne. It is one of the largest counties in the State.

Mr. DAWSON. That is what I wanted to ascertain; and as it is the only county not fully accounted for, I am willing to allow even twenty thousand for it, and then it would not bring it up to the fraction of the State of Louisiana. That is the only point upon which there can be a doubt created. Act with the most unlimited liberality towards the State of California, and you cannot give to that State a larger fraction than that which the State of Louisiana has. I look upon this matter as a principle. I am voting upon it under an obligation, and I have looked to it with interest, to satisfy myself that I was right, and to do justice to the respective States. I can find nothing to satisfy me that California ought to have an additional member. I have listened to the debate, and I have reviewed, since yesterday, the positions which I then presented, and I have come again to the same conclusion.

Mr. CHASE. I do not rise to detain the Senate, but I wish to ask whether the amendment is divisible. If so, I should like the question to be first taken on the first branch of it, relating to the assignment of two members to California.

The PRESIDENT. The amendment is not divisible, but the Senator can move to amend the amendment, by striking out any portion of it.

Mr. BORLAND. Before the vote is taken, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a fact in regard to our legislation on this subject. I do not know to what extent it may go in its influence upon the decision of this question; but I desire to call the attention of Senators to the fact, that when the census act of 1850 passed, on the 23d of May of that year, making provision, as the Constitution required, for taking the census of the United States, and requiring that an enumeration should be taken of the population existing in the States, on the 1st day of June, there was no such State as California in existence. She was not admitted into the Union until the 9th of September of that year. I find the second section of the act admitting California into the Union, in these words:

"That until the Representatives in Congress shall be apportioned according to an actual enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, the State of California shall be entitled to two Representatives in Congress."

I think if the friends of the proposition to give California two Representatives, insist upon her retaining her present representation, they can do so under this act, which leaves out of view altogether the act of the 23d of May, 1850, which was passed without reference to California, as if she had no existence at all. On the 9th of September we passed an act creating a new State; and we assumed, as a fact beyond dispute—for we could not have legislated upon any other ground—that she had at that time a sufficient population to entitle her, in proportion to the population of the other States, to two Representatives in Congress. You cannot, in my opinion, go beyond it. There was the fact announced in the most solemn form in which it could be announced to the country, by all the forms and sanctions of legislation, that she did have at that time—not on the 1st day of June, when the enumeration was required to be taken for the other States, but on the 9th day of September, 1850—a sufficient population to entitle her, by special legislation, to two Representatives in the Congress of the United States. Under that act, she is entitled to retain that representation until an actual enumeration. I do not think you can fairly say that it meant the enumeration of 1850. That matter had all passed. The duty was performed, or might have been performed, at that time. Two months is usually sufficient to take the enumeration; and if the deputy marshals did their duty, they could take it in two or three months. From the 1st day of June until the 9th day of September was about three months and a third. The work of taking the census was then going on, and we might fairly suppose, and in law were bound to suppose, that it had been almost completed at that time. We admitted the State afterwards by express legislation, and gave her a Representative on what we assumed to be her actual population.

Mr. CHASE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the latter clause of it, which is in these words:

"And that for this purpose the act of May 23d, 1850, providing for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States, be so amended that the whole number shall be two hundred and thirty-four instead of two hundred and thirty-three, until an apportionment under a new census."

Upon this amendment I trust the Senate will indulge me with the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BORLAND. I wish to act understandingly in regard to this matter, and, therefore, I desire to inquire of the Senator from Ohio what is to be the effect of his amendment? It seems to me that if we assign to California, as I think we may properly do, the additional Representative, this portion which it is proposed to strike out might follow as a matter of course.

Mr. WALKER. It will deprive South Carolina of a member.

Mr. BRADBURY. The effect of the amendment will be to cut off South Carolina.

Mr. BORLAND. Then that alters the case materially.

Mr. CHASE. I will state, in a very few words, the effect of the amendment. The object of it is not, as has been suggested, to deprive South Carolina of a representative. It is simply to retain the number two hundred and thirty-three, fixed by the act of 1850. If the Senate shall decide to retain that number, undoubtedly the question will then arise, as between California and South Carolina, which must be determined upon the evidence. This amendment does not affect the question whether South Carolina or California is entitled. It is simply the question whether the number two hundred and thirty-three shall be retained. If two hundred and thirty-four shall be stricken out, and two hundred and thirty-three inserted, representation will remain to be apportioned according to numbers, as the Constitution requires.

Mr. WELLER. The adoption of this amendment will raise a controversy between South Carolina and California.

Mr. DOWNS. I do not consider that there is any such controversy at all. The question now involved is, whether the number of Representatives fixed by the act of 1850, shall be retained or not. The question between South Carolina and California it will be time enough to decide when it comes up. The object of this amendment is to simplify the question, and bring it down to the simple point whether or not we shall increase the number.

Mr. RUSK. If, by this enactment, you give two members to California, you do not leave one to South Carolina for her fraction, if you fix the number at two hundred and thirty-three.

Mr. DOWNS. The motion now is, not to give California two members, but to strike out two hundred and thirty-four and leave the number of the House of Representatives fixed at two hundred and thirty-three, leaving it to be decided afterwards whether California or South Carolina shall have a member. The question is not now as between these two States; but if the latter part of the amendment of the Senator from Maine is stricken out, as proposed by the Senator from Ohio, then the question will be, Shall California have two Representatives? That will not be decided upon this vote. That will come up on the next vote. The question now to be decided is only whether we shall have two hundred and thirty-three or two hundred and thirty-four as the number of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BADGER. The Senator from Louisiana certainly understands this matter. If you strike out this provision, you must necessarily reject what is left.

Mr. CHASE. Not at all.

Mr. BADGER. Then if you retain that part of the provision which gives California two members, without increasing the number of the House of Representatives, you necessarily strike off from South Carolina one member. Therefore, it will follow that we must reject what is left. I submit, therefore, to those who are in favor of giving California two members, to vote against the amendment.

Mr. DOWNS. This vote will not decide whether California shall have two members, but only whether we will keep the number of the Representatives as it is fixed by the act of 1850.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, it resulted—yeas 14, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Brodhead, Chase, Davis, Dawson, Downs, Hunter, Mason, Miller, Morton, Smith, Spruance, Underwood, and Upham—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Bell, Borland, Bradbury, Cass, Cooper, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Felch, Fish, Geyer, Gwin, Mallory, Mangum, Rhett, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Sumner, Wade, Walker, and Weller—24.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon Mr. BRADBURY'S amendment, upon which he called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Bell, Borland, Bradbury, Cass, Chase, Cooper, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Felch, Fish, Geyer, Gwin, Mallory, Rhett, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Sumner, Wade, Walker, and Weller—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Brodhead, Davis, Dawson, Downs, Hunter, King, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Morton, Smith, Spruance, Underwood, and Upham—15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GWIN. I think the adoption of this amendment makes it necessary to adopt another; and therefore I move to strike out of the first section the words:

"Including the population of the counties of San Francisco, Santa Clara, and Contra Costa, in the State of California, according to the returns made thereof by the census agent of California to the Secretary of the State of California, amounting to twenty-five thousand two hundred and twenty-four."

Mr. GEYER. This clause was inserted with the view of making up the returns, as the official basis upon which to make the apportionment. They are unofficial returns. They are nowhere found, except in the communication from the census agent to the Secretary of State of California. They have therefore, I think, no business in the estimate, and ought to be stricken out.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWSON. I would ask of Senators who have the control of this matter, whether this will not change the ratio, and will not make a difference to some of the States?

Mr. GEYER. It will make no difference to any of the States.

Mr. CHASE. The change in the whole number of Representatives will diminish the ratio, and will, as I have attempted to show to the Senate, give to Louisiana a member for her fraction. If you change the aggregate number, you change the ratio; and if you change the ratio, in my opinion you must give a member to Louisiana if one be given to South Carolina.

Mr. GEYER. It will have no such effect. It is true that, by diminishing the ratio, the fraction of each State will be increased, but the States will stand in the same relative position; Louisiana being the twelfth State in the order of the fractions.

The bill was then reported to the Senate as amended.

The amendment to the first section on the motion of Mr. GWIN, in Committee of the Whole, was concurred in.

The question was then stated to be on the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole on the motion of Mr. BRADBURY.

Mr. ATCHISON. Would it be in order now to move an amendment so as to reduce the number of Representatives to which South Carolina will be entitled to under the bill as it now stands? There is a conviction on my mind that if California is entitled to two members, South Carolina must lose one.

The PRESIDENT. Both the original bill and the amendment adopted in committee are open to amendment.

Mr. MASON. I think it is very clear that there is a difference of opinion between Senators as to the effect the change in the whole number of Representatives will have upon the ratio. I think we ought to understand that question before the bill is finally acted on, and, therefore, I move that the Senate now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. ATCHISON. Would not a motion to strike out "two hundred and thirty-four," and insert "two hundred and thirty-three" bring up the question directly, whether we shall retain the present number or not? The bill is now so amended as to give California two Representatives.

The PRESIDENT. It will be in order to make that motion.

Mr. ATCHISON. Then I move to strike out two hundred and thirty-four and insert two hundred and thirty-three.

Mr. MANGUM. I would inquire what will be the effect of that amendment to the amendment?

The PRESIDENT. The Chair can only give his opinion as to what will be its effect. In the opinion of the Chair, it will have the effect, if adopted, of preventing South Carolina having a member for her fraction.

Mr. MANGUM. Then I am opposed to it. I think South Carolina is entitled to a member for her fraction, as the returns now stand. I am willing to give California two members. I think that before the decennial period will be half over, she will have enough population to entitle her to much more than her present representation.

Mr. BORLAND. It seems to me that the amendment proposes to amend the act of 1850, so as to have the representation two hundred and thirty-four, instead of two hundred and thirty-three. The amendment to the amendment is now to amend that amendment to the act of 1850. The effect of it will be to leave the law as it now is.

Mr. BADGER. Let us take the sense of the Senate upon striking that out—let us strike out the whole of the provision.

Mr. DAWSON. I cannot vote for the proposition. My convictions are that South Carolina is entitled to a member. My course in regard to this bill has been actuated by that conviction. The Senator from North Carolina says that he has no doubt that South Carolina is entitled. If so, California would not be. But now we have decided to give California two Representatives, and therefore, I am not willing to refuse the member, which would have the effect of cutting off South Carolina. I must sustain her right, and those who believe that California is entitled, will sustain her right.

Mr. ATCHISON. I withdraw the proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to know whether it is intended by this bill to make a permanent change in the number of the House of Representatives from two hundred and thirty-three to two hundred and thirty-four?

Mr. BADGER. No, sir.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the intention is not to make that change, then the bill ought to be amended. As I understand it, the bill now expresses this, that the act of 1850 shall be so amended as to increase the number of the House of Representatives from two hundred and thirty-three to two hundred and thirty-four, and that California shall be entitled to two members until the next apportionment.

Mr. BADGER. The number is increased to two hundred and thirty-four until the next census.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senate will be kind enough to hear me read the section as it has been adopted, I shall not detain them long. I only desire to carry out what is said to be the intention of gentlemen. The amendment which we have adopted reads:

"And be it further enacted, That the State of California shall be entitled to the number of Representatives to Congress, prescribed by the act admitting said State into the Union; and that for this purpose the act of May 23, 1850, providing for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States be so amended, that the whole number shall be two hundred and thirty-four instead of two hundred and thirty-three, until the next apportionment under a new census."

Now, is it amended, in regard to the whole number until the apportionment under a new census, or is it amended until an apportionment under a new census, so that California shall have two members until that time? If you intend to carry out what gentlemen say is their object, it seems to me you ought to say that after an apportionment under a new census, the number shall return to two hundred and thirty-three.

Mr. BADGER. It returns of course under the act of 1850.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is no declaration of that kind.

Mr. BADGER. There is no need of it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not intend to offer any amendment. Gentlemen say it means that gentlemen mean to give California two Representatives until the next apportionment.

Mr. BADGER. The amendment does not say two Representatives.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It says the number which she had before, and she has two. It changes the law of 1850 so as to make the number two hundred and thirty-four. It does not, according to a fair construction, in my opinion, provide for a return to the number two hundred and thirty-three after that time. I may be wrong, however. I intended to throw out the suggestion for the consideration of gentlemen; but as they think it very clear, I shall make no proposition to amend.

Mr. COOPER. I am very well satisfied that we shall not get through this subject to-day, and, therefore, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The amendment made in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

Mr. DOWNS. I now renew the amendment which I offered in Committee of the Whole, to increase the number of Representatives from two hundred and thirty-four to two hundred and thirty-five, and to give Louisiana five members; and I ask the yeas and nays upon it.

The PRESIDENT. It is now too late to amend the amendment, as it has just been agreed to in the Senate.

Mr. DOWNS. I thought that when we got into the Senate the bill could be amended.

The PRESIDENT. The bill can be amended.

Mr. DOWNS. That is what I propose—to increase the number to two hundred and thirty-five.

The PRESIDENT. The fixing of the number is in the amendment which has been adopted; and the Senator must understand that that amendment cannot now be amended.

Mr. DOWNS. Is not the bill subject to amendment?

The PRESIDENT. It is; but the amendment which has been agreed to in the Senate is not.

Mr. DOWNS. That is certainly a part of the bill.

The PRESIDENT. Certainly it is; but it has been agreed to in committee and in the Senate.

Mr. DOWNS. Cannot that be amended, as it is now a part of the bill?

Mr. BADGER. You can amend any part of the bill that has not been voted upon.

Mr. DOWNS. We did vote upon it, it is true, but in another stage.

The PRESIDENT. The stage has been passed. It has been adopted both in committee and in the Senate, and cannot now be amended.

Mr. DOWNS. Then I move a reconsideration of the vote on agreeing to the amendment made in committee.

Mr. WELLER. The Senator did not vote with the majority, and therefore cannot make the motion.

Mr. DOWNS. Then I hope some other gentleman will be kind enough to make it.

Mr. MASON. I am perfectly aware, as are other gentlemen around me, that the Senator from Louisiana has been waiting until what he conceived to be the proper time to make the proposition to amend.

Mr. WELLER. Under those circumstances I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted in the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOWNS. I now move to strike out "two hundred and thirty-four," and insert "two hundred and thirty-five;" and if that prevails, I shall move that Louisiana have five Representatives instead of four. I ask the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken, resulted—yeas 5, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chase, Dawson, Douglas, Downs, and Mason—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Borland, Bradbury, Cooper, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Fish, Geyer, Gwin, Hunter, King, Mallory, Mangum, Miller, Rhett, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Smith, Spruance, Sumner, Underwood, Wade, Walker, and Weller—26.

The PRESIDENT. There is no quorum voting. On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 8, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. STRATTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill, of which previous notice has been given.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object; and shall object to every such request, until the committees are regularly called for reports.

Mr. ORR. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of the House bill No. 154, being, "An act to enforce discipline, and to promote good conduct in the naval service of the United States," upon which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOCKOCK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not know that I ever asked the unanimous consent of the House since I have been a member of it, to do anything; nor have I objected when others asked it; but being about to leave the city, I have this request to make, that the House will permit me to submit a bill, which I have had in charge for some time, that it may be referred to the Committee of the Whole, and printed.

Several Voices. "Agreed!" "Agreed!"

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object; and I shall object to every member's having the unanimous consent, until the committees are regularly called.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to permit me to make a report from the Committee on Military Affairs: I will make this statement: This bill was deemed a matter of such urgent necessity that it was taken from the table by the unanimous consent of the House, and referred to that committee, which has instructed me to make a report upon it. It is a bill to enable the officers of the Treasury to settle a fund for $1,500,000, collected in California, and for which there exists at this time no authority to make settlement by these officers.

I will further remark, Mr. Speaker, that a gallant officer of the Army has been here for five months, for the purpose of having effected this settlement. He has been waiting, day after day, for the grant of authority to the officers of the Treasury to do so. All I propose at present is, that the bill be allowed to be reported from the Military Committee, made the special order for Tuesday next, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I shall object to any special order. I call for the regular order of business. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOCKOCK] has the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER, by unanimous consent of the House, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania against the extension of the Woodworth patent; which were referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCORKLE, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the State of California in relation to the peons fund of California, and for the establishment of forts on the borders of that State; which were severally referred—the first to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the latter to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GOODENOW. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer a resolution from the Legislature of the State of Maine.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOCKOCK] is entitled to the floor, and seems to be claiming it. I do not see how it can be taken from him.

Mr. GOODENOW. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to yield only for a moment, to let these resolutions be referred.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I feel myself under the necessity of proceeding with my remarks. There are many gentlemen who wish me to yield the floor, and I cannot discriminate in favor of any one.

Mr. Speaker, I do not expect to occupy the attention of the House this morning for more than one half of the time to which I am entitled under the rules. When I took the floor the other day, it was my desire to reply somewhat at length to the arguments submitted by my friend before me from the State of Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] and by my colleague upon my right, [Mr. MILLSON;] but upon subsequent reflection, and the examination of their remarks in the Globe, I have come to the conclusion that, though there are many things in the remarks which these gentlemen have submitted, to which I do not yield my assent, yet they submitted many suggestions to the House worthy of our calm and attentive consideration. I do not come forward this morning, then, so much to take issue with these gentlemen upon the positions they have taken, as to raise my voice with others, in behalf of the naval establishment of this country, which has been so long neglected, and which all persons in all parts of the country agree, requires the attention of the Government of the United States. There is nothing more common than to hear from the men who speak upon the subject at all, the declaration that there is need of reform, thorough and searching reform, in the Navy, in every branch, and every department of it. Gentlemen tell us that there must be reform in the manner of building our ships. Others tell us that there must be reform in the manner of regulating the promotions. Others again tell us, and truly, that there is need of thorough reform in the code of discipline by which our Navy is to be governed. While this is so—while all agree in the necessity of a reform, look, I ask you, at the conduct of the Congress of the United States, and of the House of Representatives particularly, in relation to this question. For six years this has been the cry.

The Committee on Naval Affairs of this House have been reporting bill after bill, and pressing them upon the consideration of the House, but they have all received the go-by. This House has always looked with a hostile eye upon them. My own personal experience, as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, extends back to the last two years. I was a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs at the last Congress. That committee reported to this House two important bills providing for reform in the Navy, the most important one providing for a change of the mode of promotion. The chairman of the committee again and again attempted to prevail upon the House to take them up, and consider them; but it was impossible to get them up. During the last session of Congress, what do we see again? In the month of September, 1850, an amendment had been passed to the naval appropriation bill, striking out from the naval code the punishment of the lash, abolishing flogging, evidently making a very important vacuum in that code. During the last session of Congress the subject came before the Senate. The Senate passed a bill. That bill was never acted upon by this House at all. We were told at the last Congress, that this great subject of slavery was standing at the doors of our Congress, excluding everything else. But, at last the cry went through the land that the great question had been settled, that it had been adjusted, and that we would come up here at the next Congress to attend to the business of the country.

But what have we been doing at this Congress? We have been resetting the settlement, and re-adjusting the adjustment. In the early part of the session, the subject came again before the Senate of the United States, and the Senate passed a bill revising the code of punishment in the Navy, and that was sent to this House. When it was sent here, it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. That committee examined it, and instructed its chairman to report it back to the House of Representatives. Week after week passed, but the chairman had no opportunity to report it. At length there seemed to have arisen a contingency, when it was very desirable that something should be done, and that speedily. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs asked the consideration of the House to the bill. It was given; but when the bill came before the House the previous question was sustained by a large majority, cutting off all amendments, and the bill was put upon its passage, and there were gentlemen here who had voted for the previous question, cutting off amendments, who voted against the bill because they could not amend it. This is the action of this House of Representatives in relation to the naval establishment of this country, and this is a specimen of American legislation. Well may the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] talk about the necessity of reform in the Navy. Well may he tell us there ought to be a new mode of enlistment and a new mode of promotion. But let him tell me first when the committee to which he alluded has reported and brought their business before the House, by what magic charm this House can be brought to business. Tell me how we can get the House to consider these things. I say it not from any spirit of anger. It is not my province to lecture the House, and I do not desire to do it. There is much talent in this House, there never has been more talent here than at present, since I have had the honor of a seat upon this floor. But how do gentlemen exercise that talent? In presidential quarrels, in party manoeuvres, and in political projects and schemes. I would speak to the members of the House in a spirit of brotherly regard, and tell them that such subjects are unworthy of the talent of American statesmen. It is a field in which the monkey may be their equal, and the fox their superior. They ought to rise to a purer atmosphere and broader sphere, and they ought to look to such acts, as take hold upon the destinies of the country, and tend to advance the great interests of the nation. Having said these things, I shall come to an examination of the bills which have been presented to the House, which I shall make as brief as possible. First, the Senate bill, second, the substitute of my colleague, and third, the substitute since offered by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. STANTON,] whom I see before me. But, before I do so, I will refer briefly to one or two of the points which have been made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] who sits before me. The gentleman from Michigan seemed to make his objection to the bill which I proposed, as not being in accordance with the spirit of the age, and with the reforms in regard to the abolition of capital punishment, &c. I expected it was that spirit—a spirit which has been agitating the country in relation to such subjects as these: this false philanthropy, as I call it, that had risen up here to attack the report of the committee. The abolition of capital punishment! The gentleman says that since capital punishment has been abolished, crime has diminished. I should like to see some of that evidence. I hold in my hand an article which has been written upon the subject of discipline in the Navy, by a man who shows himself to be well-informed, in which he touches upon this subject. I quote from an article in the Southern Literary Messenger of April, 1852:

"Crimes are not less frequent or less shocking now than they were a century since, either in Christian societies or among the various communities of religious misbelievers. On the contrary, it is suggested that crime has increased in proportion as prisons have been made places of agreeable residence, and punishments of all kinds have been made seemingly more tolerable, and criminals more respectable. It is even suspected there is more generous sympathy exerted in behalf of the vicious, of those who are guilty of crime in any of its gradations, from murder and arson down to the smallest misdemeanor, than in favor of disease- and poverty-stricken but virtuous and industrious citizens. A brutal courage often evinced in the perpetration of crime, attracts respect and excites pity for a condemned criminal, while the virtuous humility of poverty passes unnoticed. A man would be spurned as an honest beggar, who, as a felon, forcibly detained in a palace of criminals, would provoke the respect and the activity of the benevolent to release him from the infliction of law. While this falsely-called benevolence exists—while pity sheds more tears over the murderer than over his victim, it is not reasonable to expect that any system of punishment will be effectual in preventing crime. Even the limited protection which law is calculated to afford honest citizens against the violence and misdoing of the vicious, is diminished by the too-frequently successful efforts of sympathizers of criminals to shield them from conviction on trial, and to procure pardon for them when condemned. Crime is thus indirectly encouraged by increasing the avenues and chances of escape from punishment."

"Any system of punishment to be valuable must be devised on a theory that it will be faithfully observed in practice; observation has led to the opinion that certainty of chastisement is more influential in securing obedience to law than its severity."

"There can be no punishment which does not involve suffering in body or in mind. Then the question to be solved is, what kind and degree of pain can be inflicted on individual offenders, consistent with humanity, for the common advantage of the community?"

Yes, sir, I have no doubt that this is a true picture of the case, and there never was a truer thing said than, that mercy to a criminal is cruelty to thousands; it is cruelty to the community. This sort of philanthropy which seeks to make prisons agreeable, and to strike out all sorts of punishment because they hurt, is a false philanthropy, and I deprecate its introduction here. I remember that this age of false philanthropy—this age of agitation for the abolition of capital punishment, is also the age of socialism, of Fourierism, of anti-rentism, of abolitionism, and of every other sort of ism that the malignant ingenuity of man can suggest, or that the demon from below can instigate. Away with all such theories. Come up like sensible men, and punish criminals and enforce the laws, and you will do well for the community, and well for the age in which you live. I would like to see the talent that I know exists here direct its energies and eloquence, that almost make respectable a bad cause, to the discouragement of crime and the enforcement of punishment. They would then be worthy of their positions here, and deserving of the gratitude of the nation. I expect that gentlemen will contend next, that the punishment of imprisonment must be abolished, and that the men who commit murder, theft, arson, or any crime of that sort, must be brought up and solemnly lectured. And indeed if the lecture be as dull as some speeches which we hear on this floor, it will be a severer punishment than lolling on soft beds in agreeable prisons.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not come forward here at this time, for the purpose of advocating the restoration of punishment by flogging. I know that that is not to be done. But I will say, in relation to that sort of punishment, that there were some beneficial features in it, that cannot be found in any other sort of punishment that has yet been suggested. In relation to that subject, I beg leave to read a brief passage from the same article from which I read a little while ago.

"Flogging as a means of punishment, either ashore or aboard, has one advantage over any kind of imprisonment. Its pains are limited to the culprit; those who may be dependent upon his labor are not made to participate in the castigation, for the moment after its infliction, he may return to his avocation. For a similar reason, it is preferable to any system of penitential fines as a mode of punishing those offenders against the law who rely upon their labor to procure daily food for themselves and families."

The great object to be accomplished in punishment, in the Navy particularly, is to secure for these smaller offenses, a summary punishment, and one that will operate on the offender alone, and enable him to be restored to his duty in as short a time as possible.

Upon this basis and with this view, I go now to the consideration of these bills which have been presented, and to which I referred a little while ago. And, in the first place, I want to say to my colleague, [Mr. MILLSON,] who came forward here the other day, the advocate of humanity and reform in punishments, to adapt them to the spirit of the age, that I cannot go for his bill because it is too severe. He said that the bill reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, conferred upon a single man more power, and more authority than any individual in any country in the world exercised. I tell him, that in my judgment, his bill is even worse than that, and I cannot go for it because it is so.

Sir, the Navy has been governed thus far under the act of 1800. We design, by this bill, to strike out many of the antiquated and isolated punishments provided for in that act, which are contrary to the spirit of the age; and to adopt, in their stead, more certain, and at the same time more humane punishments. My colleague has come forward with a bill which readopts that old act, with all its faults, and with all its antiquated punishments. My colleague objects to that feature in the bill, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, which provides for diminishing the rations. He objected to it as almost monstrous. But he brought before the House the regulations for the naval asylum, to which he gives approbation, so far as to prefer its provision for disabled sailors, over that of the committee. Well, I presume if there was such a monstrous thing in those regulations as punishment by diminishing rations, my colleague would spurn them from him. Let us see how that is. I read from the regulations:

"For misconduct, of which drunkenness, fighting, abusive and profane language may be enumerated as foremost, or for any conduct subversive of good order and discipline, pensioners shall be subject to punishment by stoppage of pocket-money and tobacco, confinement in the cells, restriction of the luxuries, and curtailment of the rations, at the discretion of the governor or commanding officer, and to ejection from the asylum, upon the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, obtained or directed in writing."

Mr. MILLSON, (interrupting.) I suppose the interruption may be almost unnecessary; certainly, with those who remember what I said upon this subject. But my colleague [Mr. BOCK] has said that because I introduced the regulations of the Navy Department, simply for the purpose of showing to the House upon what terms the decrepid sailor was now admitted into the asylum—making no other use of the regulations whatever, intending to make no other use of them, and not having read any of the other regulations—he most illogically assumes that I adopt the whole for the purpose of sanctioning the regulations which have been adopted by the Navy Department. Now, I assure my colleague that I not only never read any of the other articles, from which he has just quoted, but I did not intend to read them, and had no occasion to read them.

Mr. BOCK. I do not pretend to vie with my colleague in logic. If I did, I trust that my logic would lead me to rather better conclusions than his logic leads him to. The gentleman is very logical. He is one of the most logical gentlemen I know; but he spins his logic so fine that it is very apt to miss the mark. Does not the House remember that the gentleman said that the provision we had made in the bill for the sailor who had served with good conduct for twenty years, was unnecessary, because these provisions here were better for him than the bill reported by the committee? And does my colleague mean to say, that when he said that these provisions were better for the old sailor than those contained in the Senate bill, he had not read them, and did not know what they were?

But I pass over that. The bill of the committee proposes that, for various offenses, the diet of the offender shall be restricted to bread and water; and the gentleman complains of that very greatly. Now, sir, I did not know that it was a very serious or severe infliction on a man, when he was in close confinement and could not take exercise, to give him plain diet. It may punish him a little. It may be a momentary annoyance to him, but it does him no permanent harm; on the contrary, in my opinion, it does him good. When a man is in solitary confinement, and not able to take his daily exercise, I am in favor of giving him bread and water, as a mercy to him.

"By discharging from the service, with bad-conduct discharge."

"By solitary confinement in irons, single or double, on bread and water: Provided, no such confinement shall exceed thirty days."

Now, my interpretation of these and the other provisions about confinement, was that solitary confinement, whether in irons or out of irons, should not exceed thirty days. But even if there be no such limitation, still, I maintain that the bill of the committee is better than the gentleman's bill, which reenacts the law of 1800. Let us look at the power the captain has. Under that:

"The commanders of all ships and vessels-of-war belonging to the Navy, are strictly enjoined and required to show in themselves a good example of virtue, honor, patriotism, and subordination, and be vigilant in inspecting the conduct of all such as are placed under their command; and to guard against and suppress all dissolute and immoral practices, and to correct all such as are guilty of them, according to the usage of the sea service."

Now, what is the usage of the sea? I will show presently. For other named offenses it is provided:

"That a private shall be put in irons, or flogged, at the discretion of the captain, not exceeding twelve lashes; but if the offense require severer punishment, he shall be tried by a court-martial, and suffer such punishments as said court shall inflict."

"Any theft, not exceeding $50, may be punished at the discretion of the captain; and above that sum, as a court-martial shall direct."

For theft under twenty dollars, at the discretion of the captain. Think of that. Again:

"All crimes committed by persons belonging to the Navy, which are not specified by the foregoing articles, shall be punished according to the laws and customs in such cases at sea."

These are provisions of the law of 1800, reenacted by my colleague's substitute.

Now, sir, it seems to me that here is pretty broad ground for discretionary punishment by the commanding officer. He has power to put in irons for an indefinite time—which carries with it the power of solitary confinement—without restriction. Then, for immoral conduct, and other things specified, and for all offenses not specified, he has the right to punish according to the usage at sea. Now, in order to show to this House what are the usages at sea, I will read from the same article from which I have already read, written by a gentleman familiar with the naval service. I have shown it to a friend upon this floor who has been long in the naval service, and he says it is correct:

"Among the punishments not alluded to in the law, which have been resorted to in the Navy, are the 'coil,' or rope's end; the ratten."

These have been abolished, but there remains in full force—

"Carrying a heavy shot during watch: standing upon the captain; riding the sparker boom; gagging, bucking."

To which my friend authorizes me to add, crucifying, keelhauling, &c.

Now, sir, let these sympathetic gentlemen—these benevolent and humane gentlemen—these gentlemen who want to have punishment in the Navy conform with the spirit of the age, listen to a description of the punishments which are still authorized in the Navy, and which they retain. The same writer to whom I alluded a moment ago, says:

"Gagging is effected by securing a rod of iron across the wide open mouth. It is employed as the only effective mode to stop a stream of the vilest, vituperative profligacy which angry, drunken seamen alone are capable of imagining."

Mr. MILLSON. How long do they keep it there?

Mr. BOCOCK. My colleague asks how long they keep it there. Why, as long as the captain pleases. It is left to his discretion. There is no limit to it in the world, according to his bill. Then there is "bucking." And what is bucking? The same writer says:

"It is a means originally invented for securing such prisoners as possess a natural facility of escaping from fetters; it consists in placing a bar or rod of sufficient length, crosswise beneath the hands and in front of the elbow joints, after the wrists and ankles have been put in irons. This arrangement, of course, confines the prisoner to a sitting posture, and restrains his motions to very narrow limits. It must be a most irksome position to endure for any considerable period."

Now, what is crucifying? It is tying the culprit up to a beam with his hands stretched. I believe they do not drive nails through them; but he is tied in this manner and left for an indefinite time, at the discretion of the captain.

Then, as to the other kind of punishment called "keel-hauling," as I understand it, it is to drop a fellow down on one side of the keel of the ship and draw him up on the other. I will not say how this mode of punishment may impress other gentlemen, but to me it seems a very cruel one.

Mr. MILLSON. I desire to make one inquiry of my colleague.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] will allow me first to ask his colleague a question? I was listening to the gentleman with attention. I understood him to describe some kind of punishment made use of on board the ship, called keel-hauling. I ask the gentleman what it was?

Mr. BOCOCK. I am informed that it is dropping a fellow down on one side of the keel of the ship and dragging him up on the other.

Mr. CHANDLER. Well, I think that is making him undergo a great hard-ship. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOCOCK. Certainly it does. I object to it. The gentleman and I are agreed upon that point.

Mr. MILLSON. It was stated a few days ago, in the original discussion upon this bill, that there was great lassitude of discipline in the Navy. That the officers were threatened and abused by their sailors. Now, I desire to ask whether that was owing to the fact that the existing punishment authorized to be inflicted by the commanding officer, were so cruel as my colleague has described them to be?

Mr. BOCOCK. I am not responsible for speeches made by other gentlemen; but I presume if the gentleman to whom my colleague refers were called on to answer, he would say that the punishment, which, under the law of 1800, the commanding officer of a vessel was authorized to inflict, were so cruel that they would not inflict them. We wish to substitute other punishments in their places. But my colleague puts in a special provision in his bill which retains these modes of punishment. But we, by substituting other punishments, exclude these.

Mr. AVERETT asked several questions in good humor, to which Mr. Boccock replied.

Mr. BOCOCK. As you said to another gentleman in your speech yesterday, You are too latitudinous in your questions, and too hard to satisfy with my explanations.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to give one or two reasons why I shall vote for the proposition submitted by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. STANTON] as a substitute for the bill. I am free to admit that the bill which passed the Senate and reported back by the Committee on Naval Affairs, gave a larger discretionary power to the commanding officer than was at all necessary or desirable; yet, at the same time, I say that I do not believe them as arbitrary as the powers heretofore exercised by that officer, and I do not believe they would be abused as gentlemen here who are so sensitive upon this subject seem to suppose. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. STANTON] has reported a bill as a substitute both for the original bill and that proposed by my colleague, in which he has restricted the power of the captain in many respects, indeed, in almost every respect, to which my colleague has objected. Instead of saying, "The commander of any vessel, &c., shall have authority to punish offenses committed by petty officers and persons of inferior rating, by any one or more of the following punishments," he says, "by any one of the following punishments." Instead of saying, "by solitary confinement in irons, on bread and water, provided no such confinement shall exceed thirty days," he says, "not to exceed ten days." He requires that the captain shall enter upon books an account of all the punishments he inflicts, so that he may be held accountable for them. But it retains one provision which my colleague objected to. It retains the provision, that after a sailor has served for twenty years with continuous good-conduct discharges, he shall be put upon half-pay in the Naval Asylum for life.

Now, if there be struck from my colleague's substitute the provision reenacting the law of 1800, the question which would arise for discussion, between that substitute and the bill last reported by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, would be whether it is proper to have such punishments as I have enumerated intrusted only to a summary court-martial, or whether it is better to leave them in the hands of the captain. I believe myself, though I am not prepared to claim for my opinion on naval matters an authority paramount to those of other gentlemen, that the power of the captain ought to meet that of the general court-martial. The general court-martial ought to have cognizance alone of such offenses as are punishable with death and other severe punishments. All below that should be in the hands of the captain. There are some things in a special court-martial which I object to. I believe they would have a bad effect in many cases.

Suppose a sailor has committed any trifling offense which the captain deems worthy of punishment: he must summon his officers and hold a court-martial. A disputation between the captain and the sailor would ensue, and thus the authority of the captain would be greatly lessened. It is conceded, I suppose, to every gentleman here, my colleague and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMART] concurring, that there must be a certain power lodged with the captain. Give him not too much discretionary power, but let that power meet that of the general court-martial. Look for a moment at the inconvenience of these special courts-martial. Take, for instance, a brig. You have a captain, two lieutenants, a purser and surgeon—four commissioned officers in all, besides the commander. When an offense has been committed, the captain must summon at least three out of the four officers upon the trial. So that you would have very nearly all the officers of the vessel taken from duty, and very nearly the same court for every trial; and how often would that court have to sit? How much would those men be detained from their business? If the officers were friends of the captain, they would, after all, inflict the same punishment which he would inflict himself, or whatever punishments he asked, and would divide the responsibility amongst them. While, if you leave it to the captain alone, the same punishments would be imposed and the whole of the responsibility would rest upon him. As chastity is the essential point in the character of a woman, and as honor is the glory of a man, so do authority and subordination constitute the very essence and spirit of a naval force. You must make the men respect their commanding officer, and you must not bring him down to squabble at every little petty affair before his inferior officers on board. The same spirit which would do that would deprive the judges of the country of the power to inflict summary punishment for contempt. Why, the same power that would take this power from the hands of the captain, would take all authority from the hands of the school teacher, and force him to summon a jury of the boys of his school to try every little petty offense committed by his pupils. It is absolutely necessary that there should be some authority vested in the hands of the captain.

I come now to the last point upon which I shall trouble the committee. After I shall have examined it briefly, I will yield the floor. My colleague and the gentleman from Michigan object to this clause of the bill:

"And after twenty years' service in the Navy, with good-conduct discharges at the termination of each enlistment, every such petty officer, or person of inferior rating, shall be entitled to admission to and provision in the Naval Asylum for life, with half the monthly wages of his last enlistment."

The provision now is, that a man shall go into these naval asylums when he becomes infirm and decrepid, no matter what his conduct has been in the Navy, and when he goes there he shall be supported, shall be allowed three dollars to clothe himself with, and shall then be allowed other considerations, sometimes amounting to five, and sometimes to six dollars. And in addition to this, if you leave out of the bill this provision, and permit the regulations to stand as they now do, how will the matter be in another respect? You have your hospitals, where any man can go in the early part of his enlistment, and remain on full pay the whole remainder of that enlistment. If you make no provision for the old men, they having become unfit for any other business, will continue to enlist, for the purpose of receiving such benefits, if for nothing else. When you come to consider the amount which they receive in the asylum, and the amount which these men get in the hospitals, together they will make more than the provision made in the substitute of the gentleman from Tennessee. Even if you take into consideration the amount given of three months' additional pay, in certain specified cases under these premises, the support of these sailors will be cheaper to the Government than under the present regulations.

But it will do more. The provision here made will be an incentive to the sailors to exert themselves during the whole period of their service, to endeavor to gain good-conduct discharges for twenty years, in order to entitle themselves to the benefits of the provisions herein contained, from which they cut themselves off if they are useless, trifling, and get bad-conduct discharges. It will constitute one of the incentives to good conduct which ought to be held up to make sailors exert themselves.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] told us that there ought to be a new mode of enrolling men in the Navy—that we ought to get American citizens. How will you accomplish it? Will you instruct the men whom you send out to enlist sailors, to receive none but American citizens? Have you any such authority as that? Oh, no! It is notorious that there are many foreigners in the naval service. But adopt this bill, and what do you have? You enable the commander to give his men good or bad-conduct discharges at the end of every term of enlistment. If the sailor gets a bad-conduct discharge he will not be accepted into the service again; but let him discharge his duty fully and get good-conduct discharges, and you will not only receive him back to the service, but give him a premium.

These are some of the reasons why I think that the main principles of this bill are correct, and why I am willing to support the substitute offered by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. STANTON.] I submit, then, to the House, and ask the members that, whether they approve of this bill or not, they will come up to the consideration of this subject. Give it your minds, give it your feelings, give it your heart, take hold of the interests of the American Navy, and do something for it. Sir, the spirit of your officers is flagging; and your ships, which once rode so proudly upon the ocean, feel the blighting influence of your carelessness.

New elements have recently been introduced into naval affairs—new principles of warfare have been adopted for the sea, and whenever again we are so unlucky as to engage in war with a strong naval power, unless we struggle mightily to adapt ourselves to the new condition of things in which we find ourselves placed, and to keep up with the times, we will not come out as our fathers did, with colors flying. Our commanders will not triumph gloriously as did the Perrys, the Decatur, the McDonoughs, and the Joneses, in early days. But we will be beaten in every sea, and under every star. Better far that our ships should rot, and our sailors perish, for I would greatly prefer to have no Navy at all, rather than a dishonored and disgraced one.

Mr. POLK. I move that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I hope that this bill will be disposed of to-day. I desire to make a few remarks, but I will not detain the House a quarter of an hour.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has not expired.

Mr. POLK. How much of the morning hour remains?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes.

Mr. POLK. No speech can be made in five minutes. I insist upon my motion to go into the Committee of the Whole.

The question was then taken on the motion, and it was agreed to.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HIBBARD in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated, as the business before the committee, House bill No. 7, being a bill to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting every man who is at the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same, for the period herein specified; upon which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. AVERETT] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. AVERETT rose and said:

Mr. Chairman, the state of my health and my sense of propriety forbid my indulging in the discussion of matters extraneous to the question which is now before us. I do not rise here to engage in a warfare to make a President. I did not come here for any such purpose. I do not rise here for the purpose of engaging in the discussion of matters and things in general, as seems to be the custom of the House, when in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union,—a custom "more honored in the breach than in the observance." I do not rise here for the purpose of defining my position in regard to the compromise measures of the last Congress. Conceiving, as I honestly do, that my section of the Union was outraged and wronged by those measures, I feel that I have a right to demand the humble privilege of a sullen silence. The friends of those measures ought surely to be content under a knowledge that they are laws beyond the reach of Southern "extremists." I rise here with no purpose of engaging in a warfare to put up "old fogies," as the phrase now goes, or to put down "young filibusters." I repeat that I was not sent here for any such purpose. I rise to speak to the question before us—the land question. I rise, sir, as one of the Representatives of the rural districts of these United States, claiming an equality of right in the public domain, as the property of all; to enter my solemn protest against any measure, no matter under what pretence it comes before us, that tends to give to any class in this community, rich or poor, an exclusive right in that public domain.

I rise for the especial purpose of entering my protest against the homestead bill. It has astonished me that so few have risen to expose the enormities of that bill. I thank my honorable friend from Maine [Mr. FULLER] for his orthodox, and able speech upon the question. It was a constitutional speech, worthy of the "star of the East." I hope the members of this House will read it, and read it attentively. To whom do the public lands belong? Do they belong to Congress? There is scarcely a member upon this floor who will be bold enough to say so. Sir, I maintain, and can prove by the record, that all the arguments which have been adduced in support of this homestead bill, and of kindred measures for the disposition of the public lands, are predicated upon the assumption of an absolute and unqualified power in Congress over them; to dispose of them in any way, and for any purpose whatsoever, at the will of the majority. Sir, this is a startling assumption, and I denounce this and all other measures founded upon it, as daring usurpations, "tending to evil and that continually." Are the friends of this bill willing to be chained down to a constitutional view of the subject? No; I defy them to show the right under the Constitution, to take the public lands and give them to any one class of our people, except in consideration of public services. The effect of this measure would be to take that which belongs to the whole United States, and to all the people of the United States, and to give it to a small class of the people of the United States, to the exclusion of the rest.

Mr. HALL, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. AVERETT. Oh! certainly.

Mr. HALL. I will ask the gentleman from Virginia if, during the administration of General Washington, a bill was not passed granting lands to actual settlers in the Northwest Territory?

Mr. AVERETT. I do not quit my constitutional views, to inquire what General Washington did, or what anybody else may have done. [Laughter.] I call the attention of the gentleman to the Constitution itself, and I defy him to show that it authorizes a measure like this. Sir, it has become fashionable to lose sight of the Constitution, as it is, and seek justification for usurpations by some word or deed of Washington, Jefferson, or Madison.

Mr. HALL. I understood the gentleman to speak of this proposition as a novel one.

Mr. AVERETT. Do you believe that General Washington, with all his jealousy of foreign influence, would have sanctioned such a policy as this?

Mr. HALL. I do.

Mr. AVERETT. Well, we differ about that; but it is immaterial. This measure seeks to take that which belongs to all, and appropriate it to the exclusive benefit of a few.

A MEMBER. Do not let them interrupt you.

Mr. AVERETT. I would not care for their interruptions if I was well, and could be allowed the time to answer them. I would invite them. I would be willing to be interrupted, because I feel able to meet all the objections that could be brought forward to the views which I am trying to present.

Mr. SWEETSER. I understand the gentleman to make the point against the homestead bill, that it is unconstitutional to give lands to some, and not to all. Upon that ground rests his constitutional objection.

Mr. AVERETT. No, sir, no; I did not say that. I must beg not to be interrupted, if the gentleman is as latitudinarian as that. [Laughter.] I did not say that. I said that the practical operation of this bill would be, to take that which is the property of all, and give it to a part. I said that would be the practical effect of it; not that it was my only constitutional objection.

Mr. SWEETSER. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for one moment?

Mr. AVERETT. No, sir. You have proven yourself so much of a latitudinarian in your construction of my constitutional views, that I fear if I indulge you, you will take up the whole of my hour. I repeat the question, to whom do these lands belong? If I had time, I should like to read to the committee the terms of the cession of these lands by the old States, under the Confederation. I refer gentlemen to the terms of that cession of the vast territory in the West, now inhabited by our children, who are endeavoring to eat us up, and to kill us off by the strength which our munificence has given them. By the terms of the cession, if I understand them, those States ceded these lands, with certain reservations, to the Confederation; for what? To give away to a part? No, sir. To give away to all? No such thing. It was to meet the charges upon the States in support of this Confederation or alliance of States. I do not pretend to be verbally correct, but I know I am substantially so. It was to meet the charges made upon the people of the several States, in proportion to their numbers, and for nothing else. Not only was that the case, but it was done at the instance and instigation of the Federal Government.

Mr. McMULLIN. I understand my colleague at this point to be arguing the constitutional question in relation to the lands ceded by the old States. Will he inform the House and the country what amount of these ceded lands is yet on hand, or what proportion of them?

Mr. AVERETT. I am not arguing the constitutional question in regard to the ceded lands alone.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire also to know if my colleague includes the grants of bounty land to soldiers as also unconstitutional?

Mr. AVERETT. No, sir. Those grants were made for services rendered in the camp and battlefield. But I proclaim that, in this homestead bill, you offer an insult to every old soldier who holds a land warrant, and to every poor widow, the bones of whose husband now lie buried in the low lands near Norfolk, or beneath the snows of Canada, or on the heights or in the plains of Mexico. You offer an insult to every soldier who holds a forty, or eighty, or one hundred and sixty acre land warrant, given him as a reward for serving his country, in the camp or battlefield, when, by this bill, you give one hundred and sixty acres of land to the foreign pauper for nothing but simply because he has none. That is the fact, and there is no way to get over it. I warn you that every one of the two hundred thousand land warrant holders, for services rendered in the Mexican war, and in the war of 1812, will repel the insult you thus offer them, at the polls.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat that the public lands belong to the people of the United States. Our functions in regard to them are fiduciary. We act as trustees for the people of the United States, to whom the lands belong—as trustees bound to conform to our power of attorney—the Constitution. We must look back to that power of attorney. We must regard the limitations upon the powers of this Government contained in the Constitution. Sir, it is a fact, that Patrick Henry, and many of Virginia's ablest sons, were so distrustful of the powers expressly granted in the Constitution, that Virginia, in the convention which ratified that Constitution, reserved to herself the right to resume her original sovereignty, not only in case of usurpation, but whenever the powers actually granted in that Constitution should be perverted to her injury or oppression. Am I wrong in that? It is no part of my purpose to assert the doctrines of secession here. I deny the right of secession by act of Congress, or at the volition of Congressmen. I deny the right of members of Congress to dissolve this Union. I am that far a Union man, certainly. I therefore consider all debate here upon that doctrine as out of place and out of order. But I beg leave to state to the gentlemen who stand upon the Georgia platform, that after having denounced their own Southern brethren as traitors for debating the right of secession, for the surrender of their equal rights in a golden empire, it ill becomes them to declare for a "disruption of the Union," for the sake of a runaway negro. I would humbly ask, whether those in Virginia, who were so distrustful of the powers granted in the Constitution, that even the magic influence of Washington could not induce them to ratify it unless it was expressly stipulated, that if they were to be perverted to our injury, we should have power to resume our original sovereignty, are now to be publicly denounced as traitors?

This measure now before us professes to have for its object to give lands to the landless. Now, sir, from the bottom of my heart, I do deprecate all class legislation, especially by this Government, whether under the control of Whigs or Democrats. What right have we to classify our people? Is it not one of our fundamental doctrines that no exclusive privileges, or emoluments, or immunities, shall be granted except in consideration of public service? I will say to my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] who I do not now see, but who is an advocate of this homestead system, that if he will look into the constitution of his own State, he will find it there provided, that exclusive privileges and emoluments shall not be granted except in consideration of public service. Now, what public service is it that entitles the beneficiaries, under this bill, to one hundred and sixty acres of land? None whatsoever. Its benefits are denied to me and my children—to you, sir, and your children—to all who will not quit their homes, and swear they have sold no lands to obtain its benefits.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I wish to set the gentleman right. He says that this bill is for the benefit of the poorer class of citizens only, and that it denies the same benefits to him and to his children. If the gentleman will turn his attention to the first section of the bill, and then read the section offered in lieu of it by myself, he will find that no such principle is embraced in it.

Mr. AVERETT. It is not worth while to try to dodge the questions and principles really at issue. The gentleman's own bill, as originally presented, expressly provided, if I recollect right, that in order to obtain its benefits, you must swear that you have no lands, and that you have sold no lands for that purpose. They may dodge until doomsday, but the practical result will be the same; to wit: to take that belonging to the whole, and give to a favored class of the community—

Mr. JOHNSON, (interrupting.) The bill was introduced, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture, without any such provision in it. The committee reported it back, with an amendment of that sort, and there is an amendment pending, in lieu of the whole section, embracing no such provision. And if the gentleman will permit me to ask him a question, to which I wish an answer, it seems to me that it will set this whole constitutional point right. I ask the gentleman how it is, that under the solemn sanction of an oath, he can vote to grant twenty millions of acres of land to separate States, excluding others, worth $25,000,000, and at the same time cannot vote one hundred and sixty acres of land to an individual?

Mr. AVERETT. I will answer it. I do not know whether the friends of this bill are going to convict me of usurpation or not, in voting for the swamp land bill of the last Congress. Be that as it may, I have my friend [Mr. JOHNSON] upon the stool of repentance. He has backed out from his original bill, in favor of which he spoke so earnestly. He now backs out from the swearing clause. Well, so far so good. I sincerely hope that further reflection will bring him, as "the poor man's friend," to the conclusion that it is best for all to back out from the whole scheme.

Mr. JOHNSON, (interrupting.) I understand—

Mr. AVERETT. Hear my argument before you put a construction upon it. I find you are taking the same latitude as my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SWEETSER.] [Laughter.] It is much easier to repeat terms than to understand unpalatable truths. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON made some remarks in reference to swamp lands, which were not understood by the Reporter, his back being turned towards the Reporter.

Mr. AVERETT. I answer with the utmost frankness in regard to the giving of the swamp lands to the States on the Mississippi. The gentleman says that I, having voted for, or approved of that, have no right to come out here and raise objections to this bill. Suppose I did commit an usurpation there, does that make this thing right, when you cannot show a title of power in the Constitution to do it?

Mr. JOHNSON, (interrupting.) I wanted to show who are the latitudinarians in practice.

Mr. AVERETT. The public lands are vested in Congress, as trustees for the United States. We hold them for the States. It was represented to us—and if I voted wrong I was cheated by the functionaries of the Government here, whose province it was to survey those lands—it was represented to us by gentlemen upon this floor, who pledged their words to me personally, before I voted for the bill, that those lands were not only valueless, but were nuisances to the surrounding country, and that the good lands around them were worth nothing while those swamp lands remained unreclaimed.

Mr. HALL, (interrupting.) I only want to say, that so far as Missouri is concerned, that is exactly true in regard to the swamp lands in that State.

Mr. AVERETT. I am much obliged to my friend from Missouri, [Mr. HALL.] My friends from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] and from Louisiana, [Mr. MOORE,] and others, gave me the same assurance. And so far as I can learn, those swamp lands are covered with water, and are the hotbeds of pestilence. I deny the right of the General Government to improve the rivers and harbors for the States, or anything of that sort; but when the States come here and ask me to allow them to reclaim those lands that are now valueless, and are rendering good lands valueless, I say I will not do it myself, but I give my assent that they may do it, and I am not ashamed of that. I cheerfully said to them, You may ditch those lands, drain them, dyke them, or do anything else you choose with them. I think, in doing that, I was acting the part of a faithful fiduciary, looking to the right and interest of the United States, in the public domain. If I was not, however, it does not affect the argument at all. I do not believe in that sort of political morality which will make a right out of a wrong, and make you less and less a sinner, in proportion to the number of sins you commit. That is the fashionable political morality of the day. Drive a schemer to the wall; pin him down to the Constitution, and convict him of usurpation, and he seeks absolution in some imputed act or opinion of General Washington, or Mr. Adams, Mr. Monroe, or somebody else. That is not my political creed. Convict me of usurpation, and I will ask pardon of my God and of my country, and I will do so no more. But because I have given a vote which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JOHNSON] doubts—a vote allowing Missouri and Arkansas and Louisiana to take and reclaim swamp lands which nobody can live upon—

Mr. JOHNSON, (interrupting,) made a remark inaudible to the Reporter.

Mr. AVERETT. If you will bring in all the beneficiaries of your homestead bill, and give them a fee-simple in these swamp lands, I presume my friend from Missouri, and the State which he, in part, represents, would cheerfully acquiesce.

Mr. HALL. Certainly I would.

Mr. AVERETT. He answers that he would. And Arkansas and Louisiana would doubtless do the same.

Mr. JOHNSON, (interrupting.) Altogether, I think $25,000,000 is worth getting.

Mr. AVERETT. The public lands belong to the United States. The Constitution gives Congress power to "dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property of the United States." But they do not stop now at needful; who ever dreams, now of needful? I remember a Quakeress—a benevolent Quakeress—who came here with a petition, before Congress, to make a donation of public lands to the States. For what? Why, to cure insanity. Well, if a donation of the public domain has been ascertained to be a specific for mental alienation, I think the first dose ought to be administered to Congress.

But, seriously, where is the power given, in the Constitution, to take jurisdiction over the insane? Where do you find the power in the Constitution to cure insanity?

To show how this latitudinous doctrine is extended, I will allude to the arguments used in support of Miss Dix's bill to cure insanity with land. When my friend [Mr. BISSELL] came to make his argument at the instigation of the benevolent Quakeress, what was it? Why he defied us to show that there was anything in the Constitution to forbid the passage of her bill! Yes, with an air of triumph, he said, I defy any man to show in the Constitution of the United States any power that forbids us to do thus and so with the public domain. Well, we might have met the gentleman upon his own doctrine. But really I had thought as a Democrat, that before the constitutionality of a measure could be established, that it was incumbent upon the friends of that measure to show the grant of the power in the Constitution. Now, I ask, is the contrary the doctrine of the Democracy in this the day of "progress"? If so, Mr. Chairman, I am no Democrat. You of the Granite State, and I of Old Virginia, never learned any such Democracy as that. No, it is incumbent upon the friends of a measure to show that the power to carry out that measure is given in the Constitution.

But, as I said before, I might have met the gentleman [Mr. BISSELL] upon his own ground. The Constitution forbids the exercise of any power that is not granted, and that is not necessary to the carrying out of a granted power. And I repeat, that the power to cure insanity is not expressed in the Constitution. No man can say that such a power is necessary in the performance of any legitimate function of this Government. It is, therefore, not only unauthorized, but prohibited. Sir, you might as well give the public lands to the overseers of the poor of Halifax, in my district, as to Miss Dix. The power is not vested in you to do either. It is an outrage upon the genius of our institutions, to make this Government a board of overseers of the poor. Think of it! Do we sit here to dispense charities? If so, you pamper Government pets who haunt your Halls, and, either in person or by proxy, seek special favors at your hands. Sir, I represent a rural district—a tax-paying, not a tax-consuming constituency, who have never been beggars at the footstool of this Government. In pampering your pets, you rob the people whom I serve; and as their Representative, I solemnly protest against your homestead bill, and every other measure of a like character. The pets of the Government, and those in their service, who lounge about the capital, and metropolitan hotels, are exerting an efficient and deleterious influence, through the public press and otherwise, upon the legislation of the country—State and national. These are the men who will be benefited by your sitting here to perform the functions of overseers of the poor. In the name of God, where do you get the constitutional power or the means to administer charity? This Government "neither toils nor spins;" it earns nothing, but squanders millions! Whence come those millions? That is the question. That question, if my humble voice shall be heard, shall go forth to the tax-paying, toiling multitude. They shall see to whom, how, and at whose expense, your charities are administered. When you go to one of the pretended beneficiaries of your homestead bill—a homeless widow—no sir, no such word—no honest person in this wide country is homeless. When you go to the sons of a poor widow, living in the old pine lands of Virginia or Maryland, or any other part of the United States, and ask them to vote upon a measure administering charity by this Government, I hope they will learn enough about the matter to tell you indignantly that you are "robbing Peter" under the pretense of giving to Paul, when in truth you are robbing both. To enable you to riot in governmental extravagance, and dispense your charities, you tax the poor widow and laborer at the rate of thirty cents in every dollar of their dealings in sugar, salt, working tools, cooking utensils, and almost everything else for food, raiment, or luxury, that comes from abroad. Yes, sir, thirty cents in the dollar of our dealings in goods, wares, and merchandise, is the rate at which we pay for Federal charity and munificence!

Sir, under the pretense of being the "poor man's friend," you tax him upon almost everything that he eats, drinks, and wears, at the rate of thirty cents in the dollar. Yes, sir, you tax his ploughshare, his food and raiment, while he lives, the winding sheet which shrouds him when he dies, and the spade that digs his grave, thirty cents in the dollar—and thus you get the means of pauperizing your pets, and dispensing your charities. Sir, the poor laborer who lives by the sweat of his brow, will spurn your charities.

Mr. Chairman, I have no confidence in those who set up here, as "friends of the poor." I was born poor, I was raised poor, and I am not rich now. My vocation through an arduous life has thrown me into close association with the poor. I have been a country physician, and every one who knows anything of that profession, is aware of the close connection which exists between the physician and his patient. I have had intimate association with the poor, and I take this occasion to say, that I have found in their midst some of the very best men and women I ever knew. I tell you, Mr. Chairman, that there is a deep-rooted feeling growing out amongst the toiling multitude founded upon an undeniable, startling fact, which nothing but your underhanded, vitiating legislation can hide from the eyes of the intelligent community—and that fact is this—that those who contribute most to the wealth of the country live the hardest, and enjoy the least of that wealth. I tell you that feeling is a growing one. I call upon my Democratic friends, instead of going off half-cocked upon the idea of being the especial friends of the poor, to demonstrate by what practical operation this feeling existing amongst them has arisen. It is owing to the fact that your $50,000,000 and odd expended by you yearly, are abstracted from the labor and property of the country. It is abstracted by your indirect system of taxation in the form of a high tariff, and by pampering, and sustaining your legislative pets, in the form of banks, manufacturing and other corporations. Those millions are from the earnings of the labor of the toiling multitude. They are from the property and the labor of the country. Do not let us be mistaken about this matter. I do not wish to charge bad motives to any one. I have no doubt that some of those who profess feeling for the poor are actuated by good motives. They are, however, going the wrong course to benefit the poor. If you would befriend the poor, leave them free to enjoy their powers and faculties of mind and body—and keep the hands of your tax-gatherers out of their pockets. Let them alone.*

Mr. Chairman, I have been so frequently interrupted, that I fear my speech will appear very incongruous. I complain not of those interruptions, because I submitted to them at the time, and "I acquiesce now," but I hope I may be allowed the few minutes remaining to me, uninterruptedly, to say what I intended to say. I hope—interrupted as I have been; confused, and, perhaps, incongruous as my remarks may appear—that I have made myself sufficiently understood, and have made the committee understand, and the reporters understand—the reporters, whose general accuracy has astonished me, amid the confusion of this Hall—the grounds upon which I oppose this homestead bill, and all kindred propositions. I have taken the ground that the right of property in the public domain was a right in which no exclusion could be adopted by Congress without a violation of the Constitution, and a warfare against the principles of our institutions. I have taken the ground that the public domain is the property of all; and the further ground that the grant in the Constitution of the United States, of the power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States, could not confer upon this Government any power or function not expressed in the Constitution, or necessary to carry out the powers expressly granted in that instrument. I hope that I am understood. I hope that my friends who have gone off half-cocked—with all due deference to them—will consider the question again. Can the fact, that Virginia ceded her northwest territory, and that other States ceded lands which they had acquired by their blood and their treasure, give to this Congress—which is vested only with the power to make needful rules and regulations in regard to lands and other property of the United States—any functions not to be found in the Constitution?

Mr. HALL. No.

Mr. AVERETT. You say no. Stand to that; but I am afraid you will back out when you come up with some of your Missouri bills. Now, I utterly deny—and I proclaim that it is a growing heresy—that the power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States, gives us the power to engage in matters which were not only not granted, but expressly repudiated and refused by the Convention which framed the Constitution. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CHURCHWELL] comes in here with a bill, not a homestead bill, but a common-school bill—a bill to make use of these public lands for the purpose of prosecuting a system of common-school education. Well, I think it will be found as difficult to show a power in the Constitution to teach our children their A B C's, as it will be to show a power to support our poor, or a power to cure the insane, with our public lands. Where is such a power to be found in the Constitution? Would Patrick Henry, would General Washington, or would even Alexander Hamilton, have sanctioned the power to make this Government a board of overseers of the poor, or the board of common-school education? The absurdity of conferring the power upon this Government of curing insanity with the public lands, or teaching our children their A B C's, through the instrumentality of the public lands, is superlatively ridiculous. I beg you gentlemen who have taken your position upon this question—I have no interest in this matter individually—I beg you reconsider the principles which lie at the bottom of this bill, and you will find the principles subversive of our institutions, if they are carried out. As I have before said, and I wish to impress it upon you, this Government "neither toils nor spins;" it earns nothing, but it squanders millions; it disburses and consumes taxes at the expense of the toiling multitudes. The interests of the property holders and honest laborers are identical. And here I beg my friends who look to the interests of their children, who really value our institutions as our fathers handed them down to us, to consider this one thing. There is an effort to array the poor laborer against the capitalist and the property holder. It is an unrighteous warfare. I stand upon the position, as I stated before, that the interest of the honest laborer is identical with that of the property holder, so far as the functions of this Government are concerned.

The property holder wants security in the enjoyment of that which belongs to him, and in the assurance that that which he has accumulated and husbanded by his frugality and industry, will be enjoyed by those nearest and dearest to him. The poor man, on his death-bed, finds consolation in the reflection that he leaves his penniless children in a land of equal rights and equal laws; and that, penniless though they be, they may, with industry, economy, and the blessing of God, rise to the highest point of prosperity—yea, to the highest pinnacle of fame! Sir, you have seen little children fighting for their playthings: you have seen the little boy fighting for his toy, which has been mischievously wrested from him. "It is mine!" cries the little fellow, when seeking his own. I would say to mothers, fathers, voters, cherish the spirit of that little fellow. Don't allow it to be bribed or corrupted by governmental fraud; don't allow it to be down-trodden by governmental power!

Mr. Chairman, there are certain indications of pending mischief, which every patriot ought to nerve himself to the courage of resisting at the hazard of his popularity or anything else. I appeal, sir, to the Whigs and Democrats upon this floor, and more especially to my Democratic friends, to put their hands upon their hearts and say whether they are prepared to perform understandingly, all the functions that are actually required of us, to keep the wheels of this Government in motion. I hope the question is understandable, and I hope it will be duly considered. It is matter of notoriety that the functions of this Government have become so complicated, and those who are seeking especial benefits at its hands are so numerous, that the time of members of Congress, of the President and his subordinates is so monopolized by those seeking such benefits of this Government, that they can scarcely perform the duties with which they are intrusted. Is not that a matter of notoriety?—and what should it teach us? Why, sir, it should teach us, instead of coming in here with the homestead bill; instead of coming in here with a proposition founded upon the idea of making this Government a board of charity, that you should simplify the functions of Government, and besting, stringent—cautious in exercising even the powers expressly conferred upon you.

I appeal to honest men of all parties, who believe in our institutions, and desire to perpetuate them in their purity, to stand up manfully against those who, by schemes like these, are seeking the high places in Government. It has become absolutely necessary to simplify the functions of government, else its functionaries will become absolutely irresponsible. We may have an exalted government—exalted in corruption—but we shall become a degraded and oppressed people.

I have been charged with being a disunionist, but I do not care about it in the least, I assure you. My constituents understand me; they sent me here, and I am not in any way responsible for my opinions to this House. But I tell you that every element of destruction lies in the assumption of power by this Government, which is not granted in the Constitution by the complication of its functions, and the consequent irresponsibility of its functionaries. Can you make your President responsible for moneys expended, however unnecessarily? It seems not—but he ought to be held responsible; and it seems to me that such a system of irresponsibility is insufficient for the public good. Can you hold your functionaries responsible? You cannot understand their functions. You cannot examine, and ascertain, and satisfy yourself, as to the manner in which these duties are performed by them. One thing, however, is certain, that the toiling multitude, the tax-paying community, will understand the tax consumption, which is about $50,000,000 or $60,000,000. I wish to impress upon this House and the people, the strong, imperative necessity which exists for curtailing the taxing power, and handing no taxes out of their pockets except for the authorized purposes of the Government, as ascertained by the written Constitution. Make this Government a board of overseers of the poor! Great God! Did not my friend from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY] when he was asked the question, state that the cost of collecting these taxes was upwards of seven and a half per cent.? You lay a duty and tax upon everything that men, women, or children eat, drink, and enjoy—upon everything that comes from abroad—at the rate of thirty cents in the dollar, and you charge seven and a half for collecting that tax. Let it go home to the people. It will tell upon those who have been broken by their dealings with merchants in goods. They will understand your taxing system, although your taxes are concealed under the hieroglyphic cost-marks of merchants. Although you make use of the soft fingers of your merchants in getting taxes, let it go home to the people, that your taxes are exacted from the rich and the poor; and I boldly say that your taxes are especially oppressive upon the poor, because under your system of taxation a man is not taxed always according to what he owns, nor according to his ability to pay, but very often on quite a contrary rule, for your tax-payer pays in proportion to the number of children he has to feed and clothe. Every man who drives a plowshare, who wields a hammer and broad-axe, any man who has a wife and children to support, will feel this. I see my friend from Indiana [Mr. DEXHAM] is not in his seat; but he argued that if our people be settled upon our western lands, they would become better tax-payers, and that, therefore, the Government would be gainer. Well, Mr. Chairman, I have no wish to increase the gains of the Government. But, sir, I humbly conceive that the gentleman is wrong in fact, as well as in principle. A man or woman in Virginia—in New York—or anywhere else, in the old States—yea, sir, even the inmates of our almshouses consume as much of the goods, wares, and merchandise which you tax, as your Western men and women consume. Yes, sir, the pauper in any Eastern poor-house is taxed as heavily as would be the beneficiaries of this vaunted homestead bill. The argument of the gentleman from Indiana, then, falls to the ground.

Mr. HALL, of Missouri. Where do the exports come from?

Mr. AVERETT. They come very largely from the slave-holding States; and you, my friend, and others who are warring against us upon this and other measures, are indebted to us for giving you the benefit of slave labor, in providing your articles of export.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. POLK addressed the House an hour, during which he expressed some views in favor of the bill. He commented, at some length, upon the position of the Whig and Democratic parties towards the compromise measures, maintaining that whilst the former had evaded a direct and full expression in favor of them, as a finality on the slave question, that the latter had, in Congress and elsewhere, boldly indorsed those measures, and expressed a determination to adhere to them, as a full adjustment of the questions involved. He declared his determination to support "Young America" for the Presidency; but, at the same time, commended General Cass for his patriotic devotion to the cause of his country.

[Mr. P.'s speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. CHANDLER. While I feel gratified at obtaining the floor, I feel also at what great disadvantage I stand before the committee at the present moment. There has been a spice of politics infused into the debate upon this question, something of the kind which resembles "all-spice," for however much we may feel disturbed by such talk upon our party failings, there is no man here who would not rather smile than cry over that which was well said, however severely meant.

I have nothing to say upon the subject of the Presidency, or anything that has a particular relation to it. Nothing to "young America," or "old fogyism;" although, if I understand the speech of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] he proclaimed himself to be of the "young America," and opposed to "old fogyism." I have no time to follow that up; but if I had, I am sure he would consider that the difference of our ages would excuse me for a monitory remark to him. It is this: in all ages, in all times, and in all countries, "old fogyism" has been that which has saved the nation from the rashness and imprudence of young—whatever it may be. All history proves it.

Mr. POLK. Will the gentleman allow me to explain what I meant by "old fogy?"

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. POLK. I only meant the spirit of the age; not the trembling limb and wrinkled brow.

Mr. CHANDLER. Exactly. I was going to say what history informs us about this matter; and I suppose, of course, the gentleman is more familiar with sacred than profane history. But I recollect one instance which I beg to refer to, and if I give it wrong, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FOWLER] will correct me. [Laughter.]

It is this: I remember that Rehoboam, the successor of Solomon, took it into his head that he would have a rouse with some of the young Israelites of that time. And there was a case even before him. Master Absalom set himself up as young Israel against that old fogy, his father. What was the result? Rehoboam followed the advice of young Israel, and that led to a dissolution of the union of Israel. They forget the wisdom of the old men, and the effect, the unhappy result was—you recollect it. And if Master Absalom had taken notice of that, if he had waited to get old enough to have his head as bald as my friend from Vermont, [Mr. MEACHAM;] or still wiser and older, if he had waited until he had got the covering which an honorable and distinguished citizen wears upon his head, he never would have got hung upon that oak-tree while pursued by the officers of the old fogy, his father. [Great laughter.]

I have, however, obtained the floor with a view to address myself directly to the question before the committee—that of the homestead bill. But I am not disposed, Mr. Chairman, to occupy the attention of the committee very long. I know how frequently I have been indebted to the courtesy of gentlemen around me, and I have too much gratitude for that—allow me to say—to draw upon their patience long; and that I may not be induced, as I have already been, to depart from the record before me, I have written down and amplified my notes, so that I would rather read than speak to the committee on the subject upon which I am about to address them. I purpose speaking directly to the principles involved in the bill. If anything is wrong in the details of that paper, anything wrong in the parts which are presented here, they can be very easily corrected by the committee when we come to examine it more in detail. If the principle is right, we have nothing to fear from the details, which will be so carefully scanned, not only by the friends of the bill, but more carefully, perhaps, and more satisfactorily scanned by the opponents of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, my business is with the one grand feature of the proposed enactment. If the principle be right, the details may easily be accommodated to the intentions of the framer and the views of Congress. If the principle is wrong, then all labor upon the bill will be only making more or less acceptable that which ought not to be received.

It was my impression, until the honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. FULLER] addressed the committee on this bill, that there was no question of the constitutional power of the Government to dispose of these lands as the bill provides. But that gentleman startled me with the assertion that these attempts were unjust, and without law or equity. And, of course, all that has been done, instead of becoming a precedent for action, must be regarded by us as the errors (I will not say the crimes) of our predecessors. But I could not discover that the honorable gentleman sustained himself upon the legal side of his argument, sufficiently to require a response. I shall cast a glance at what he advances with regard to the equity of the measure—whether it is just or equal to bestow lands upon one portion and not upon another. "The favors of the Government," says the honorable gentleman, "like the dews of heaven, should fall on all alike."

The figure is beautiful, but not apposite—not illustrative. "The dew of heaven" falls on all who place themselves within its extent. But that dew which would come down with a blessing of beauty and richness on one, would chill and destroy another. The evening plant will open its petals to the rich descent of dew that shall give it beauty and luster, while the morning flower will shrink from the chilling freshness, and ask the warmth and the light of the ascending sun.

Sir, the favors of Government, like the dews of heaven, should, when falling, be for all that need their influence. But the grass on a parched field, or the herbage of an arid waste, should not be denied the dews of heaven, because certain plants are not improved by that falling moisture, or because the irrigated and luxurious meadow has no need of such gentle waterings. In all places where rain abounds dews are light; but in Chili and in Egypt, where rains are rare, these dews supply the place of showers. Thus, Heaven tempers its providence to the wants of man, and teaches Governments to make their favors useful, by varying them in kind to suit the various wants of the people.

The remarks which I am making upon the argument of the gentleman from Maine apply, or are intended to apply, to the speech of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. AVERETT,] whose earnestness and sincerity always commend his views to my respectful consideration. The whole history of our country is marked with precedents for the disposal of our public lands to institutions, to corporations, and to individuals; and foreigners—men and women—who have sought a refuge from the revolutionary whirlwinds of Europe, have received grants of our rich publiclands. And these precedents are so identified with our legislation that no declaration of want of power will disturb the possession of the holders, or change the practice of Congress. The right is not denied by the Constitution or the law, and it is established and sustained by continual custom. If we have a constitutional right to give away the public lands to foreigners—and it is apparent that practice, in the absence of all conflicting legislation or constitutional prohibition, establishes that right—then, a fortiori, we have the right to divide them as we choose among our own citizens.

The question of rightful power being thus indisputable, it becomes necessary to institute an examination of the question of expediency and equity, as connected with public and private good.

Mr. Chairman, it is lawful, but is it expedient? "All things," says a high authority, "all things are lawful to me, but all things are not expedient."

First. Why should the land which has been acquired by conquest or purchase be given to particular citizens, when it is the property of all?

Second. Why should the man living in the far West, or willing to go to the far West, be favored with a quantity of land sufficient for a farm, when he who lives in the old States, which achieved our independence, must be content with what he inherits, or what he can purchase, or what is still worse, must be content without either inheritance or purchase.

Third. Are there reasons for such a departure from the customs of the country—reasons connected with private right and public profit, or will they be promotive of general morals and pure patriotism; and if so, can we make the gifts available to the class of citizens whose benefit we would promote; and that being so, can we make the gifts available to that class without an injury to others? Nay more: will these donations be promotive of the good of the whole? Unless these questions can be affirmatively answered, we, as the Representatives of the people, have only to withhold our votes from the project. If they can be affirmatively answered to the satisfaction of the House, I need not say what should be the vote of the members. I need not say what would be the vote. I never allow myself to doubt the purity and patriotism of the motives of the members of the House; and when any question is proposed here, Mr. Chairman, in which party attachment and public good may appear in antagonism, I always know how the vote will go. The country will have the majority. It is true that party discipline will leave a guard over party interests, but the main body will march over to the side of the country.

With this view of the character of this House, I will proceed to examine the queries.

It must be evident that we have reached a point where these public lands must cease to be the means of direct revenue to the nation. Claims of various kinds multiply, liberality towards those who have served the country, enlarged encouragements to public enterprises, and charity to afflicted emigrants, are placing these possessions of the nation in a position that forbids a hope for the Treasury from them; and that, Mr. Chairman, is not all: The liberality of the Government that bestows so much public domain, or rewards therewith so many entitled to public consideration, is not inducing settlement, but generally it is placing millions of acres in the hands of speculators, who have never seen, and will never see, their vast and cheaply-acquired estates.

What we need as a compensation for our land (for at any rate the price when sold is nominal) is settlement, and the plan proposed in this bill is, that no man shall come into possession of a single acre of the soil until he enters upon its occupation and improvement. This I consider one of the strong points of the case. If, without public claims, without military service, these lands were to be given in undivided masses, no benefit to the public could result, because the right of settlement and the benefit of pre-emption already exist. I therefore am led to regard this disposition of a portion of the lands as presenting a means of assisting public policy, promoting public good, and gratifying a most natural and laudable longing of the human heart.

And the growing advocacy of this bill here, and the strong expressions in its favor abroad, show that the wish is national.

Mr. BEALE, (interrupting.) Especially in Europe.

Mr. CHANDLER. I thank the gentleman for the hint. Where the down-trodden millions are looking across the Atlantic for a home—

Mr. BEALE, (interrupting.) Which you give to the jail-birds and scum of Europe, and deny it to our own people.

Mr. CHANDLER. Looking across the Atlantic for a home, where they seek a place to plant their feet and erect their altars. And come they will, however we may legislate. Shall we not, then, in self-defense, as well as for motives of humanity, invite them away from over-crowded cities, and enable them to devote themselves to truth and God, and become missionaries for morals, for truth, for politics, and religion, and plant themselves along our western frontiers, men sworn to preserve our country, its laws, its morals, its institutions, and all that man holds good and great in a Republic? And if we deny it to them, we deny what God has given to us. If we deny that to them, we deny what our fathers fought and bled for. We deny what your ancestors achieved, and sought to distribute amongst them all. The very bounty of lands to them will send school-masters to instruct them.

Mr. Chairman, it is not merely an Anglo-Saxon infirmity, as some honorable gentleman (my friend from New Hampshire, Mr. Tuck) once asserted. It is the common feeling of mankind. The whole history of the people of the Bible is one of land claims and land distribution, managed, it will be recollected, with more courtesy on the part of Abraham towards Lot than is exhibited by some of the patriarchs of this Hall.

But the possession of land has, from time immemorial, been the great thirst of the human heart, for different purposes, but always with the same craving. Why, sir, the possession of land is and ever has been a patent of nobility. No hereditary title was disconnected from a hereditary possession. And whatever else we may have changed in the institutions of our country, we have not altered this much. We may forbid the entailment of estates, but we do not and cannot separate the title from the possession of the real property. It is so with no other possession. The man who has much money, or owns a large amount of public security, is a capitalist. He who deals in securities is a speculator. The office-holder has only a temporary appellation of "honorable" or "excellency" by courtesy; but the owner of the soil, nay, even the proprietor of a house and its necessary lot, is a lord—a land lord—a title above all others, and one which it is the interest of the Government to multiply, where the sovereignty lies in the people.

Mr. Chairman, we must, in the passage of laws, learn to consult the varying circumstances of the people, the change which is continually going on in the affairs of life.

Principles, I suppose, never change; but the administration of those principles must be accommodated to the progress of affairs.

Ten years ago, when some one proposed a measure like this, the public press poured ridicule upon a scheme which was denominated "the vote-yourself-a-farm project," a sort of Hellenic verbal composition, which was at once expressive of the supposed object of the author, and the contempt of the opposer; but tempora mutantur, et nos mutamur cum illis. That is, "the tenure of our public lands has changed, and opinions, it is evident, are changing with them." The land seems pledged for the public debt, yet we vote them to foreigners; let any one come with claims upon our sympathy, and we offer that which we feel is most agreeable to our common appetite, we grant them townships of land; some accept, and some ask for even more substantial aid.

Well, sir, if we are so free with these public domains with foreigners, why not gratify the appetite, and promote the views of our own citizens? Why not be generous to those who have at any time exposed their lives or health for the public good? Why not grant to them what they ask for? Are the defenders of European States of more consequence than the defenders of the United States? Our own people fought and bled for these lands; let them have an individual right in some of them.

But the bill before us grants portions to actual settlers and permanent residents on these lands. If the donation of alternate sections to railroads gives additional value to the contiguous sections, (and I think it does, and is therefore profitable and proper,) then the actual settlement of the quarter section of one hundred and sixty acres must give value to the contiguous portion—and while we have more than fourteen hundred millions of acres, and while we have a few thousand citizens who need attention, and are able and willing to toil, who seek the independence of real property, and sigh after the patent of republican nobility, ought we not to serve them, serve the country by granting the request? For, Mr. Chairman, the country will be served by any legislation that takes the squalid and suffering from the crowded, unhealthy alleys in our cities—out of the dependence and want of a precarious living, placing them where every drop of sweat that falls upon the soil, and every muscular effort expended gives additional value to the possession. I say nothing about the political or national dependence upon those who have no stake in the hedge, and no hope for themselves. But what a treasure of virtue, of trust, of sure defense, does that nation lay up for itself, when every man owns the ground on which he stands and identifies himself with his possession by the sweat of his brow.

Mr. Chairman, the virtue and independence of a Republic are only the aggregate of the virtue and independence of the people who compose that Republic; and, if a plan can be devised and executed for drawing from the common haunts of our cities, those whom misfortune are tempting to vice, and give them the blessing of possession, the leave and means to toil and to live, that plan should command our support. If we can remove men, women, and children from the horrible communications of densely-packed garrets and cellars, where want of family privacy is destroying all delicacy of thought, and place them in the wide space of one vacant quarter section, do we not regenerate their minds, and baptize them into the hope and practices of decency and good citizenship?

Where, Mr. Chairman, since the establishment of our nation, have riotous disorders been generated but in the mixed and compact populations, where lack of employment gives potency to the suggestions of the vicious, and involuntary idleness becomes the parent of vice? Allure these people away from those seminaries of crime that abound in cities, and plant man free and independent upon his own soil, the outspread domain of hill and valley and stream all his own, and the thought of vice dies with the sense of accountability, and the invitation to labor is answered with a willing smile.

I shall be told, perhaps, that few of the loafers of the city will go to the far West to toil upon the unbroken land. Probably the far West would not mourn at such a refusal. But I do think that thousands would go, who, tarrying in the city, would become loafers in their own generation, and leave a nest of vagrants to perpetuate their crimes. It is to prevent, rather than to reform, that the "homestead" plan is proposed.

But I have said that the scattered population which these grants would induce, would tend to public morals and public peace. Many of the settlers would come, if not from the scenes of disorder and vice, at least from those contingencies, where the fanatic or artful disturber of the public peace finds tools for his mischief, and sedition, in some guise of philanthropy or patriotism, presents the worst form of treason.

But, sir, in the center of our Republic, tilling the earth and making the wilderness blossom like the rose, these men would be safe from the excitement of popular delusion, unexposed to the temptation of violating the laws. Instead of being under the surveillance of a police, they would be the hope and defenders of the nation; missionaries of morals and prosperity in peace, defenders of the soil in war.

Railroads, canals, and other modes of public improvement, have ever been considered powerful means of assisting public quiet, and promoting the strength of our Union; but these silent means of trade are not so potent in the work of goodness as men themselves, scattered across the boundary of discontent, whose interests are for peace, and whose happiness is evidently dependent upon the Union. If the measure, then, could be regarded as a new cement of national union, another and more powerful argument is derived in its favor. And I confess, sir, that, as a Pennsylvanian, and as a Representative of Philadelphia, where the Union, though long existing, was first announced, I grow warm upon any subject that concerns the Union, seeing only misery to us all from its destruction. I advocate whatever will promote its continuance; and, while I condemn to immitigable censure those who by word or deed would disturb the compact, I bless every man whose occupation and will are in its favor.

A few days since, Mr. Chairman, an honorable member from Mississippi, [Mr. Wilcox,] in referring to the objections of certain heated partisans, declared that they sought to tear in two the glorious flag of our nation. The figure was beautiful and happy, and I share in the gentleman's warmth of denunciation of those who, with fratricidal hand, would attempt the desecration. It cannot happen, Mr. Chairman; it will not be, I think. But, should evil counsel prevail, should the idle, the dissolute, the thoughtless dare to commit that last and worst, that unpardonable crime, tearing in twain the flag of this Union, the flag that streams in beauty and grandeur over this Hall, above the legislators of the people, met to promote the benefit and strength of the Union—should they rend this flag, then, Mr. Chairman, I ask for Pennsylvania and those States that stand for the Union, side by side with her, in all forms of contests and under all party names, I ask for our true portion of the spoils; I ask that the stars, on one portion of the field of that flag, shall decorate the brow of my own iron State and her sisters in patriotism; and, Mr. Chairman, I devote the stripes, on the other portion of the field of that flag, to the back of those traitors who may have rent it in twain.

We must not suppose, Mr. Chairman, that every poor man, in city or country, is poor from want of enterprise. Or that every vicious person is criminal from any extraordinary proclivity of his mind towards vice. Thousands around us are toiling and waiting with no hope of ascent. They see the point far above them, which, if allowed, would be sure to open up the prospect of comfort and respectability. But how are they to reach that first round? Borne down as they may be with heavy dependencies, by what means are they to achieve that first step by which labor shall be ensured its reward, and enterprise its desired conquest? "Give me but where I may stand," said the ancient geometrician, "give me but where I may stand, and I will raise the world." So say these men, Give us but where we may plant our feet, and we will raise a name, and conquer a world of difficulty.

In the Old World, Mr. Chairman, hereditary distinction is ingrained with the feelings of the people, and the only change contemplated is that of relative position among the upper and the middle classes; but the lowest must remain low, and poverty and wretchedness be the parents and the exponents of vice.

But in this country, amid our republican institutions, no such fixedness of condition should be contemplated. It is hostile to all our plans of republican equality. Sir, true republicanism is like the ladder which the Patriarch saw in his vision at Bethel. Though its top may lean on heaven, yet its foot rests upon the earth, that its lowest round may be accessible to the effort of the humblest man that aspires, so that every rank and condition of the people may mingle with all from above or below, who ascend or descend the scale of republican condition.

I reckon as nothing, Mr. Chairman, the objection to the bill, that "few will be able to reach the public lands from the Atlantic cities." Certainly, if any wish to go, the knowledge that land can be obtained for nothing but settlement must be an inducement, because the money which is now required to purchase the land, might, under the bill, be used to take the family to the new acquisition, and assist in the purchase of the most essential articles of husbandry and housekeeping. But philanthropy that assists the poor laborer to leave the city, that he may find employment in the rural districts, would have a double motive for liberality, if a homestead, rather than a hireling employment, were to be obtained. But at most, Mr. Chairman, if the poor of the cities and crowded portions of the Atlantic States could not reach these lands, then the argument that the passage of the bill would deprive the country of its lands, falls to the ground.

But then it is objected, that these lands will go to the Western people, and not inure to the benefit of those of the East. Well, so it will, Mr. Chairman, if the East will not, or cannot profit by it. The land will certainly not come down to us; we must go up to that. But what then? Suppose, at the worst, that the Western men should alone seize upon the privilege of these grants, and alone directly profit by them: what then?

But suppose, sir—for this is the argument—suppose nobody should be helped but the Western people? It is something to help them, especially as we shall not injure others thereby. It is something to help them; for I reckon them among the American people. And to know that we have given a sturdy Western man one hundred and sixty acres, which he accepts on the condition that he shall cultivate them, is to be certain that we have established at least one family. Besides, sir, the Eastern States vote land to the Western railroads, that custom may come to them from the far West. May we not, then, vote land to the Western men, that we may have permanent Western customers? It is an argument in favor of the grant of alternate sections to railroad companies, that the greater chance of settlement increases the value of the sections retained. If that is so, then is it more true that the settlement, the real occupancy and cultivation, of one quarter section will give additional value to the others? The argument, sir, is cumulative.

One mode of argument used to defeat a bill of this character, is to drive the sensitive from its advocacy by assertions that it is a means of courting popularity among a certain class of citizens, and that none but the Gracchi will buy the people with their own lands.

What the motives of others may be, I know not; but for myself I can say, that if any portion of our fellow-citizens could, upon ordinary grounds, be hostile to this bill, it would be likely to be the commercial and moneyed citizens of an old capital of an old State. Sir, men at my age—I mean, of course, those who have not the presidential chair in view—however sensible to the approval of the public, have usually passed the hopes of much preferment; and a Philadelphia Whig, of all men, would be the least likely to court favor by ad captandum advocacy.

Sir, promotion is not a part of the rewards, or even the hopes, of the people of my patriotic State. Good old Pennsylvania has so often gone for the Democrats, that the Democratic party deem her their appanage, without reward. And she has so seldom gone for the Whigs, that chance, and not party exertion, has been, by the unreflecting, considered the cause; and the ordinary rewards of party success have been lavished where they have more directly to pay for labor, or more surely invite supplies. For myself, sir, and those with whom I have had consultation on this question, I can safely say, that when opinions have been changed, interest has been opposed, and the change has been submitted to on the grounds of the change of circumstances, in national and State legislation, and in the condition of the people.

Hitherto, Mr. Chairman, our country has sought to reward the soldier and the sailor (poorly, I am compelled to confess) with lands, or she has bestowed them on institutions for the public good, or she has granted them to the stranger seeking an asylum in this nation. That is, the people of this country have given away these lands to other people. Well, sir, now the people themselves ask for a share. The people were in the nominative—now they are in the vocative. I am willing to place them in the dative case. And if I am charged with vacillation, I can only plead the old adage, and refer to my honored and classical friend from Vermont [Mr. MEACHAM] for its truth, that "circumstances alter cases."

And, Mr. Chairman, who can be injured by the operation of this bill, if passed into a law? There are here in this country more than fourteen hundred millions of acres of public, unoccupied, unappropriated lands—fourteen hundred millions of acres! Mr. Chairman. This is more than an acre and a half to every man, woman, and child on God's earth. (I beg pardon for the seeming irreverence, but "the earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof.") More than an acre and a half to every man, woman, and child—black, white, or red! And we are told by a good poet, who was an equally good historian, that in the most flourishing condition of his native country, in its most high and palmy state, every rood of ground maintained its man!

The honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. FULLER] spoke of the provisions of this bill as unequal and unjust. Unequal as not being for the "good of all," because the land is given only to the poor. Not for the good of all! Do men erect prisons for the benefit of some or the good of all? Do we establish philanthropic institutions for the good alone of their inmates, or for the credit and good of all? Do our States erect hospitals, assist asylums for the deaf and dumb, for the benefit only of the patients, or is it for the good of all?

Mr. Chairman, is it not for the good of all that certain persons are relieved from distress? Is it not for the good of all that certain persons are redeemed from the degradation of vice and led away from the daily temptation to commit crimes? Is it not for the good of all that the example of degraded character be abated, in order that the baleful influences of its pestiferous atmosphere be diminished? Is the wealth of the rich man safer with poverty around him, goaded by envy and want, into rapine?

Mr. FULLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question? What would you do with the Indians?

Mr. CHANDLER. Sir, we must either feed or fight the Indians.

Sir, every Christian patriot must say, (and none more emphatically or heartily, I am sure, than the honorable gentleman from Maine, Mr. FULLER,) "It may augment my relative consequence to have those around me poor and degraded, and it may serve as a foil to my virtues that they are becoming vicious in their poverty; but my feeling as a man, my possession as a capitalist, and my patriotism as a citizen, are all concerned to have these men honest, comfortable, respectable."

Mr. Chairman, I have already exceeded the length of time which it was my intention to consume when I rose; and I have so far departed from my plan of procedure that I would better close than attempt to recover the argument from which the warmth of my feelings has hurried me away, and from which I have been called by the occasional interruption of friends, whom I have found it necessary to answer. Nor is that all, Mr. Chairman; the "public lands," though seemingly a rough, unattractive subject for consideration, have been suggestive of other thoughts than those of arid waste or solitary wilderness. The prairie land of our common country has supplied flowers, beautiful to the sight, and redolent of sweets. If I have been unable to collect and combine them, I at least have assisted to prove their existence and point to their locality.

I shall vote for this bill, not because something may not be said against it with good argument, but because, on the whole, all circumstances considered, the balance of argument is in its favor. My friend and colleague [Mr. MOORE] proposed to the last Congress a similar measure, upon which I doubted; and the honorable gentleman [Mr. JOHNSON] who presents the bill was also the parent of a similar bill in the same Congress; both gentlemen were entitled to respect and credit for their boldness in meeting what was then so unpopular.

This bill, however, will pass, and I think this session; but, at any rate, it will pass. It is founded on the progressive character of the institutions of our country, and is therefore a part of the destiny of our legislation.

Sir, other men may wear the civic wreath which the nation weaves for those who serve their country in lofty position, or they may be graced with the laurels prepared for those who defend her in the hour of peril, and their names may be inscribed upon the imperishable record of national glory; while no crown shall be woven, nor column be reared to the humble working legislator, who prepared or presented the homestead bill. A consciousness of duty performed must be his present remuneration, and his reward in the future must be the lowly inscription of his name with those who loved the people.

If the views which I have taken of the main provisions of the bill now under consideration are not incorrect, then I think we may conclude that the plan of granting quarter sections of land to actual settlers, comes to us with the following, among many other negative and positive claims, upon our favorable consideration:

First. It is not in violation of any provision of the Constitution of the country.

Second. No power of Congress is exceeded by such grants.

Third. It grants no favor to one which is not free to all. And if the granted lands are less accessible to the Eastern than to the Western resident of these States, that is only the result of accidental location, and is fully balanced by other general legislation, which, from similar causes, operates to the advantage of the East.

Fourth. It assists the unfortunate, and multiplies private comfort, domestic happiness, and social propriety.

Fifth. It tends to free the cities from a too-crowded population, always unfavorable to order.

Sixth. It wastes no domain, but rather, if fairly carried out, gives additional value to the contiguous unoccupied portion; and while it confers on the citizen the real title of "lord of the soil," which the Constitution allows in theory, it secures his attachment to his own, and becomes a pledge of his love and devotion to the country of which he now forms a part.

With sentinels thus placed along our outer and our central frontiers; with men thus bound to the soil and the Government, the constant expansion of this nation suggests no apprehensions for its peace, or for the perpetuity of its institutions. The furthest outpost on the frontier is occupied by those who own the soil, and are a part of the nation. With them peace and order are the truest private interests, as well as public blessing; and instead of being hunters of men and beasts, assimilating to savage life and savage feelings, they are the messengers of order, peace, and prosperity.

Thus peopled, let our limits extend to the extremity of the Pacific Isles. Let them be stretched out North and South, from the outer verge of the torrid to the border of the frigid zone. Let them expand. It will be but an extension of popular virtue, republican simplicity, and world-teaching example.

"From Darien to Davis, one garden shall bloom,
Where war's wearied banners are furled;
And the far-scented zephyr that wafts its perfume,
Shall silence the storm of the world."

Mr. JENKINS next obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. NEWTON, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was put and carried in the affirmative.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 7, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution. I ask that it may be read for information.

It was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Joint Resolution in regard to the Public Printing.

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the second section of the joint resolution of 1846, "directing the manner of procuring the printing for the two Houses of Congress" shall not be so construed as to allow the joint committee of the two Houses to discharge one contractor and employ another; but in all cases where the committee shall deem that there has been unnecessary delay or neglect, the facts shall be reported to Congress, and the committee shall be governed by its direction.

Mr. GOODENOW. I object.

Mr. BROWN. I think gentlemen cannot understand the resolution, if they object to it.

[Cries of "Read it again!"]

The resolution was again read.

Mr. GOODENOW. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HALL. I object.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have been endeavoring, for a long time, to get the bills upon the Speaker's table taken up and referred. I now ask the House to allow me to have one bill taken from that table, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. It is an important bill, and needs early action.

Mr. ORR. I object to its being taken up out of its order.

On motion by Mr. MOLONY, by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw the papers in the case of Silas Clatfield, for the purpose of having them referred to one of the Departments.

On motion by Mr. ALLISON, by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of James Gordon be taken from the files of the House, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. HOUSTON. I consider it very essential that the bill to which I have referred should be acted upon; but as the House have refused to take it up out of its order, I now appeal to the House to proceed to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table. I do not wish that this bill shall take precedence of others, but it is very necessary that these bills should be taken up and referred.

Mr. COBB. I object.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the House adjourned to twelve o'clock to-morrow.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 9, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

Mr. HUNTER. This is private bill day, and I move to suspend, for one hour, the execution of the order assigning to-day for the consideration of private bills. If the Senate shall indulge me in that request, I design to ask them to take up the joint resolution for the continuance of the work on the two wings of the Capitol.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF THE CAPITOL.

Mr. HUNTER. I now ask that we may be allowed, during this hour, to take up and dispose of the joint resolution to authorize the continuance of the work upon the two wings of the Capitol. If we do not take it up now, I do not know when we shall be able to act upon it; and we ought to have some action immediately. The subject should be disposed of either by rejecting or adopting the amendment of the House of Representatives. I move to take it up.

Mr. BORLAND. I am opposed to taking up this subject at this time; but I think that if we can take it up properly, on any day, according to the view which I take of it, and the purposes which this joint resolution is to serve, it can very properly be taken up on private-bill day, and on no other day, for I do think that it is, for all practical purposes, a private bill, for the benefit of private individuals. I do not, therefore, think that it was necessary to make a motion to suspend the rules in order to take it up to-day, as it would come up very properly on private-bill day.

But one reason why I do not desire it to be now taken up, is this: The chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings [Mr. WHITCOMB] is not here, on account of indisposition, and probably will not be here for some time. Another member of the committee, the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. CLARKE], was here the other day, but is not here now. It is true, he did agree that the report should be made, but I think the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER], who reported the joint resolution, admitted, or at least the Senator from Rhode Island, I am very sure, did say that he concurred in the making of the report. He did not concur in the report itself, but allowed it to be made. Thus the committee were divided, and the report did not receive their full concurrence. I am not authorized to say that the Senator from Rhode Island would make any strenuous opposition to the resolution if he were here; but it is well known that he is decidedly opposed to it; and if he were here, he would, in my opinion, offer such reasons in opposition to it as would probably satisfy a majority of the Senate. His reasons are such as to satisfy me. He did not, however, ask that this matter should be laid over until he came back. He did not desire me to ask it; but, at the same time, he expressed his opposition to the measure; and I am perfectly satisfied, that if he were here, he would offer reasons in opposition to it, such as would satisfy my mind, at least.

Mr. HUNTER. I can only say, that if the Senator from Rhode Island had asked for the postponement of this subject until he should return, I would never have pressed it. I asked him to allow me to report the joint resolution. It is true, he was opposed to it; but he allowed me to report it. I knew that he was to be absent, and that unless the joint resolution was reported before he went home, there would be no quorum of the committee left. I hope it will be the pleasure of the Senate to consider the subject now.

Mr. RUSK. I would inquire of the Senator whether he proposes to go on with this subject after the hour arrives for the consideration of private bills? If he will consent that it shall not interfere with the private bills on the Calendar, I shall not object to his motion. But if we may judge of the future by the past, we may expect a debate all day on this measure if it shall be taken up. I know there are cases of the utmost hardship where bills for the relief of parties are upon the Private Calendar. There is one case to which I wished to call the attention of the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. I will consent to give way in one hour if the joint resolution shall not be disposed of by that time.

Mr. RUSK. Then I do not object to it.

The motion to take up the joint resolution was agreed to.

The question was on concurring in an amendment made in the joint resolution by the House of Representatives. The resolution as passed by the Senate, proposed to appropriate $10,000 for continuing the work temporarily. The House amendment increases the amount to $500,000. It is in these words:

Strike out all after the resolving clause, and insert:

"That there be and hereby is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the period between the passing of this resolution and the end of the fiscal year terminating June 30, 1853, the sum of $500,000, for the continuance of the work on the two wings of the Capitol."

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, I place myself in a position before the Senate which is, I well know, not acceptable to a majority here—a position, sir, which is peculiarly unpleasant to myself. I am very sure that no member of the Senate has been more strongly appealed to than I have—none whose feelings have been more wrought upon than myself, in respect to this measure. I know that a large number of individuals, poor men, laboring men, have been brought here to work upon the extension of the Capitol. I know their destitution—I know their suffering. Every day, and almost every hour of the day, appeals of the very strongest kind are made to my feelings in their behalf. I am not insensible to those appeals. I am prepared to-day, at this very moment, to vote an appropriation of money to pay these men every dollar that is due them, to pay them liberal wages for every day they have been here. I am willing to go to the extent of paying their expenses to their homes, in order that they may be placed in the situation from which they were brought here; so that they shall not suffer by any act of any department of the Government, however unauthorized that act may have been, and as I believe they have been in this instance. I will not leave the laborer, who is poor and innocent, to suffer, if I can help it.

But I cannot give votes here upon a public measure—a measure which is to involve not the mere amount of $500,000, now proposed, but the expenditure of millions besides, the extent of which no one can tell, upon considerations of this kind. I cannot take counsel of my heart, whose sympathies are with the poor, to violate my sense of duty, however strong the appeals may be. I do not believe I have a right to vote for this appropriation, because I do, in my conscience, believe it is for a purpose that is not only unnecessary, but improper. For such a purpose I cannot vote away millions of the public money—and, as we all must see, this, though but half a million, is but the beginning of millions upon millions which are to follow it, and be swallowed up in the same vortex of extravagant expenditure. I do not propose, now, to give my views at length upon this subject. I must express my regret, however, at the absence of a member of the Committee on Public Buildings, who, if here, would, in my opinion, be able to give, and would give, such reasons against this bill as would satisfy the Senate of the impropriety of continuing the work, at least in the way and upon the plan in which it has so far gone. He has given the subject a thorough examination. I think he understands it. I know he condemns it.

A resolution has been adopted by the Senate, directed to the Committee on Public Buildings, which has not yet been answered; but which, in my opinion, is very material to an understanding of this question. It was an inquiry as to the extension of the grounds, which will be rendered necessary in accordance with the present plan for the extension of the Capitol, so far as that plan has been shadowed forth. This plan will involve the expenditure of a large amount of money for the purchase of additional grounds. It is the opinion of some, that additional grounds will have to be purchased at a cost of at least $1,000,000, perhaps more. But, inasmuch as the Senate have agreed to consider the resolution to-day, of course this consideration will not weigh with them, and I shall not press it.

In justice to myself, I must say a word about another inquiry which was directed to the Committee on Public Buildings, in respect to the strength and safety of the foundations of the two wings of the extension of the Capitol. I did believe these foundations were insecure; that they were composed of improper materials, and were improperly constructed; and my resolution of inquiry was intended to ascertain the facts, in those respects, from competent persons. The Committee on Public Buildings applied to the Bureau of Engineers for officers to make personal examination, and report upon the points in question. Four officers were sent for the purpose, two engineers and two topographical engineers, and they have reported. They sustain, by their report, the good character of the work, saying it is good in materials, good in construction, good in workmanship, and altogether sufficient in structure and strength to sustain all the weight that may be placed upon it. The resolution, to that extent, is answered; and, of course, the answer will be received as satisfactory to a majority of the Senate. Whatever, therefore, may be my opinion of that report, or of the judgment of those officers, I am unwilling to place myself before the country in the attitude of a critic of a matter involving science, engineering, and architecture, when I pretend to neither science, nor practical knowledge enough of either of these subjects to give effective weight to my opinion in opposition to such authority. But, sir, for myself, I should be uncandid if I did not say that my opinion is not changed, and my judgment is not satisfied.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

NEW SERIES.... No. 65.

It may be of no great moment, yet I will state it as a fact, as part of the reason of my opinion, that I went in person, together with a gentleman, who, I believe, is better qualified by practical experience than any man in Washington city, or any who has been here for years, whether engineer, architect, or not, to judge of such work—and he is a member of this Senate—and examined this work. Among other things, we gave particular attention to the mortar used in constructing the walls. With some care we selected what seemed to us, and as I believe, an average specimen of mortar. I have it here, for the purpose of exhibiting it to the Senate. This mortar had been in the walls for months; and yet, in one hour from the time it was taken out, it was in the condition you here see! Sand, sir; sand, and nothing else; save here and there a few detached and uncombined particles of a dirty lime! Whether that be cement or mortar, such as competent architects would use in the foundation of a building which is to be of such immense size and weight, I of course do not pretend, in science, to determine. But this I do say, that so long as my own eyes can see, and my own fingers can feel, or my own memory serves me, as to what I have seen and felt in other mason work, I never will believe that it is such mortar as any man of common sense would permit to be used in building a house for himself, or any competent builder would use in doing the work. These scientific gentlemen, however, have pronounced it all good—very good; and that, I presume, will be oracular and conclusive with the majority here, who mean to pass the bill, any how. But, sir, I should do injustice to my estimate of the professional qualifications of these engineers, if I did not say, as I verily believe, that were they all, or either of them, employed upon a public work of this character, there is not one of them who would not feel dishonored, if such a piece of work as this should pass from under his hands.

But, sir, these two boards of engineers went further, and passed judgment not only upon the work, but upon the architect also. One set indorses his accomplishments, and the other his honesty. Personally, Mr. President, I know nothing of this architect; but this I do know, as does all the Senate, that when his name was sent here by the President, for an inferior appointment in the same line of business—that of assistant architect upon one of our public buildings in one of the States—he was rejected; and thereby pronounced incompetent. Yet, sir, these gentlemen say he is both accomplished and honest, and I shall not now controvert their opinion. But let it be noticed, and borne in mind, that in the very teeth of our rejection of him for an inferior appointment, the President has deemed it proper to give him the very highest appointment of the kind in the Union, wherein he is to have the disbursement of millions of dollars, under circumstances which publicly preclude the Senate from any control over the appointment. So much I do know, and the President knew it, and took such occasion, it would seem, to manifest his respect for the judgment and wishes of the Senate. While, therefore, Mr. President, I have not denied, and mean not to deny, that this architect is both accomplished and honest, as this scientific board of engineers, without being questioned, have certified him to be; and while the President has made him chief architect of the most important public edifice we have ever undertaken to erect, with almost unlimited control over the public money, I cannot forget, and wish others to remember, that it is all in despite of the judgment of the Senate, who, upon the only occasion he was ever before them, and that for an inferior appointment, rejected him.

I am opposed to the extension of this Capitol, because I believe it is unnecessary. I do believe (and there are others who agree with me) that the room within the external walls of the present building is all-sufficient, if properly appropriated, for all our purposes, and will be for fifty years to come. There is, in my opinion, no necessity for any extension; and it is no argument in favor of it, to tell me that we have already expended upon it $100,000. Why, if the extension is not necessary, (and surely it is improper to expend money for it, if it be not necessary,) is it not better to sacrifice the $100,000 already expended, however unwisely, than to sacrifice the millions which must be consumed in the completion of an unnecessary work? I think so. And yet Senators use this as an argument. Sir, if it be an argument at all, it is, to my mind, conclusive against the proposed appropriation. If, because we have already expended $100,000, we are bound to continue the work to the extent of $500,000 more, lest we lose the first $100,000, then the expenditure of the additional $500,000 binds us to a completion of the work, whether we want it or not, no matter if it bankrupt the Government to furnish the means. Such an argument, sir, is like a wedge in a log of wood. If the point but once effect an entrance, the maul of Executive patronage and management will not fail to drive it home to the very head, until the Treasury is riven to the center.

But even if the extension were necessary, I am opposed to it on the plan proposed. It may be deemed presumption in one of my poor judgment, yet I do say, that, in my opinion, the proposed extension of the Capitol, with such wings as are spread out before us, and the proportion they sustain towards the rest of the building, will make a structure which I can call by no other name than architectural monstrosity, the like of which has never been seen in any civilized country on the face of the earth. If it may not be deemed profane to make such an allusion, I would say that we should violate no command of Scripture, if we fell down and worshipped it; for it will, indeed, be unlike anything upon the face of the earth, above the earth, or under the earth. It will resemble, more nearly than anything which suggests a comparison, a mammoth brick-kiln, or some Mexican hacienda, which, as every one knows, is the very burlesque of all architectural proportion. Viewed now from a level from the grounds on the east front, the present building has too little elevation. It is altogether too low for good or imposing effect. It is too squat upon the ground. It is extended too much for its height already. The only good view we can get of it is from the west—from below the hill, whence it derives the advantage of the hill's elevation. From that point of view, it is, indeed, a noble structure, fine and accurate in its architectural proportions, and of imposing appearance. But, I repeat, from a level, on the other side, it is already too low. Then extend it further, in the same elevation, spread out to double the length, with the same height, and what will it be? It will be of a new order of architecture truly; and, unless some one will suggest a title more characteristic, I propose to call it the Low order.

Consider also the inconvenience that will result from the proposed arrangement. The two Chambers of Congress will be about six hundred feet apart; and in conducting the intercourse of the two Houses, the distance to be traveled backwards and forwards will be something like a quarter of a mile!

Then, again, when these two wings are erected, and the two Chambers are established, one in each, what is to be done with the present building? It will be a series of great lumber rooms, making up an immense covered way from one Chamber to the other! Nothing more.

I have now very briefly stated some of the grounds of my opposition to this bill. I did not expect, and have not attempted, to state them in full. I have felt from the first that all I, or any one else, could say in opposition, could not weigh a feather against the predetermined and fixed purpose of a majority to pass it. What I have said, therefore, has been for my own satisfaction, in order to place upon the record, and for the information of my constituents, some of the reasons which govern my vote. I have no more to say at present.

Mr. WALKER. I should like to have the reports of the engineers read.

The Secretary accordingly read them. They are appended to the report of the Committee on Public Buildings, which was made in response to a resolution of the Senate directing the committee to make a thorough examination of the work thus far executed on the extension of the Capitol, as to the uniformity of the strata upon which the walls rest—as to the quality and dimensions of the stone, and quality of the mortar used—as to the character of the work, the mode of its construction, and its power of resistance—and as to every other matter and thing connected therewith as might, in their opinion, affect the stability and permanency of the whole structure. By that resolution the committee was empowered to bring to their aid such of the United States topographical engineers, and other competent persons, as they might think proper; and hence they addressed letters to General Totten, of the Engineer Corps, and to Colonel Albert, of the Topographical Engineers, requesting them, each, to detail two competent officers for the purpose of making such an examination as was contemplated by the Senate. General Totten detailed Captain Frederick A. Smith and Brevet Lieutenant Colonel Mason, both of the Engineers; and Colonel Albert detailed Lieutenant Colonel James Kearney and Captain Thomas J. Lee, of the Topographical Engineers. The results were reported separately by the engineers of the two corps, whose reports were read at the request of Mr. WALKER, thus:

WASHINGTON, March 25, 1852:

Sir: On the subject of the resolution of the Senate of the 16th instant, relating to the foundations of the extension of the Capitol, referred by you to us on the 23d, with a request for an opinion, we have the honor to state that, after an examination sufficiently minute to satisfy our minds, we have come to the following conclusions on the different points presented:

"1. As to the uniformity of the strata upon which the walls rest."

Excavations were made under our direction at the four corners of the new work; that is, at the northeast and northwest corner of the north wing, and the southeast and southwest corners of the south wing. These excavations extended from six to ten feet below the bottom of the foundations, except at the latter point, where it went only to the actual level of the bottom of the foundation. The ground on which the foundations were laid was thus examined, as well as the underlying stratum, at three points, and we are enabled to express a confident opinion that the stratum of gravel, several feet thick, (overlying a stratum of hard sand,) on which the foundations rest throughout, is of a uniform incompressibility, and that there is no reason to apprehend a settlement of the walls from its giving way.

"2. As to the quality and the dimensions of the stone, and quality of the mortar used."

The quality of the stone (gneiss—commonly called blue-rock) is excellent—probably no better could be obtained for foundations. As a general rule, the stones are of decidedly large dimensions. In some few places, the small stones generally used, in construction, to fill up, occur in larger quantities than we would consider desirable, but nowhere to excite our apprehension as to the stability of the structure.

The mortar used for the bedding or lower part of the foundation, resting directly on the ground, is throughout of hydraulic cement and sand—as it should be. In some other parts a mixture of cement and lime with the sand was used, in good proportions. In other portions, say about one half of the whole above the bedding, no hydraulic cement was used in the mortar. This we consider an error, as pure lime-mortar of the common fat limes, without cement, will never set in the interior of thick walls.

The best illustration of the truth of this will be found on inspection of the specimens of mortar submitted herewith to the committee. Specimen A was taken from the foundations of the northwest corner of the main building of the present Capitol; taken from about a foot inside the face of the wall. It was laid nearly fifty years ago, and is now soft and without cohesive power. Specimen B was taken from the foundations of the southern wall of the main building of the Capitol. It was laid some seven or eight years ago, in making repairs. This mortar is similar in character to the first. Specimen C was found on certain stones, cut out, some years ago, of the cellar walls under the Rotunda, where the furnaces were put in. This specimen is much drier than the others, owing to its exposure to the dry and hot air of the furnace-rooms; but it will be perceived that it is nearly as destitute of cohesive power as the other.

It is by no means to be understood, however, that the stability of a wall is to be considered as dependent upon the use of cement. The introduction of cement into general use, has been of quite recent date in this country; and in many large and substantial structures not a particle has been employed.

"3. As to the character of the work, the mode of its construction, and its power of resistance."

The character of the work and the mode of construction we consider excellent, with the exceptions alluded to; and in no part do we perceive deficiencies to warrant, in us, an apprehension as to the power of these foundations to resist the pressure of the superstructure.

It may be proper, under this head, to notice a feature of the construction, proposed by the accomplished architect in charge. Immediately upon the foundation walls, as now existing, he proposes to lay two courses of masonry making a depth of four feet—composed of the largest sized blocks, carefully laid in cement mortar, without lime; this to equalize the pressure of the superstructure over the whole thickness of the wall; an excellent arrangement, which seems to us to promise full security against any anticipated danger.

4. Under this general head we have perceived nothing calling for further remark.

We respectfully, therefore, submit it as our opinion, that the existing foundations are sufficient for their purpose.

Respectfully submitted.

FRED. A. SMITH,
Captain Engineers.
J. L. MASON,

Captain Engineers, Brevet Lieutenant Colonel.
Hon. R. M. T. HUNTER,
Chairman of Committee on Public Buildings,
United States Senate.

BUREAU OF TOPOGRAPHICAL ENGINEERS,
WASHINGTON, March 30, 1852.

SIR: At the request of the Committee on Public Buildings of the Senate, we have made a careful examination of the foundations for the extension of the Capitol, and we have the honor to report: That we find the masonry rests uniformly upon the original gravel and clay of the hill; the foundations being sunk to various depths below the present surface in order to attain this. The foundation descends by steps slightly inclining towards the hill, and the breadth of the walls increases as they descend below the surface. The depth of this gravel and clay we did not deem it necessary to ascertain with precision, as it is known to be considerable.

The stone employed in the foundations is granitic, and of an excellent and durable quality. The lower courses, for some four feet of height, are laid in a cement of hydraulic lime and sand, which, at the points examined by us, has already attained a sufficient degree of hardness.

The masonry of the rest of the walls is of the same kind of stone, laid generally in mortar composed of fat lime, hydraulic lime, and sand. The body of the walls is of rubble work; the buttresses are coursed with a rubble backing. Proper attention seems to have been observed in selecting, for the points requiring the greatest resistance, stones of the largest manageable size, as, for example, at the angles, and wherever the masonry has been carried to the greatest depth; whilst upon the east fronts, and especially for walls intended to support colonnades only, stones of smaller dimensions have been used; showing a sufficient care in the selection and distribution of the materials.

A greater proportion of hydraulic lime might have been advantageously used in the upper portions of the masonry, especially in the parts last built; but we think it probable that as the season advances, this mortar will set favorably, except such parts of it as may have been injured by the frost. This is shown by the difference in hardness of that having a favorable exposure, and that laid in the early part of the winter.

Before the materials for the superstructure can be brought upon the ground and prepared for the work, sufficient time will have elapsed to show and to arrest the effects of the frost upon the mortar near the exterior part of the foundation. It would also be advisable that the walls be left exposed as long as practicable, before embanking against them.

The stone and mortar used in the masonry of the foundations of the Capitol are inferior to that of the extension, according to the comparison we were enabled to make during our late inspection, and also according to the recollection of one of the undersigned, who had numerous opportunities of examining the present building during its progress. At one point of the old wall examined, the mortar was found still soft. The sample taken, however, hardened in twenty-four hours after it had been exposed to the air.

In thus expressing our belief in the sufficiency of these foundations, we have reference, of course, only to their ability to support the structure which it is proposed to erect upon them.

In conclusion, we have to add, that we received from the architect every assistance, and all the information we desired, respecting the work. The condition in which the work was left at the close of the last season's operations, and that in which it still remains, is the best evidence of the honest intentions of all concerned in it.

Respectfully submitted:

JAMES KEARNEY,
Lieut. Col. Topographical Engineers.
THOS. J. LEE,
Captain Topographical Engineers.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I desire to submit an amendment that will test the question as to whether we will proceed to prosecute this work—whether we will proceed to the expenditure of $5,000,000 more, or whether we will abandon it, after having expended $100,000, and pay the men.

Mr. HUNTER. I desire to ask a question of the Senator; I do not propose to speak on this. Why does he say five millions? The estimate is two and a half millions.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I understand it will take about five millions. Two and a half millions is the estimate; I think that sum can be much better expended in some other parts of the country. If we get through with four or five millions for the work, including the extension and improvement of the grounds, I shall be very glad. I do not propose to discuss this question. I desire to act, and act decisively. I offer an amendment, to strike out all after the word "that," in the resolving clause, and insert the following:

"To enable the architect, appointed by the President of the United States, in pursuance of the act of Congress, approved February 13, 1850, to remove the walls designed for the extension of the Capitol, restore the grounds, and pay the laborers up to the present time who have been out of employment, in consequence of the suspension of the work, the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be and the same hereby is appropriated, and directed to be paid to said architect, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; the accounts of said architect to be settled by the accounting officers of the Treasury, as accounts are now by law audited and settled: Provided, That said architect shall pay all the laborers who have been out of employment, in consequence of the suspension of the work, the same amount which they would have earned had the work not been suspended or the appropriation exhausted."

Mr. BRADBURY. Mr. President, I have felt constrained, after careful consideration of the subject, to doubt the propriety of passing this bill. It will at once be perceived, that the true question is, whether we will go on with the contemplated enlargement of the Capitol, or abandon it altogether.

This enlargement contemplates the erection of two vast structures, one on each side of the present Capitol, at a cost of several millions of dollars, for the accommodation of the Senate and House of Representatives. It contemplates the abandonment of the present Capitol as the place for the meeting of Congress. Both the Senate Chamber and the Hall of the House are to be abandoned. We, in effect, shall declare, that after millions expended in the erection of this magnificent structure, it is a failure—that Congress cannot be accommodated in it—and two other buildings are necessary to furnish the accommodation which was designed to be provided by this. I cannot see this Chamber or the Hall of this House abandoned by Congress without regret. It appears to me to be both inexpedient and unnecessary. This Chamber is large enough for the accommodation of the Senate for the present, and for a long period to come. There is room for additional seats for the Senators from all the new States that are likely to be soon admitted. It is not very probable that the high privilege of admission as a State into the Union will be cheapened by admitting them too hastily. As to the Hall of the House of Representatives, it is said there is difficulty of hearing in it. But are we sure that this difficulty will be avoided in the construction of the new Hall?

The embarrassment in the transaction of business seems, however, to arise quite as much from the use of desks, and the consequent occupation upon other matters, as from any defect in the Hall itself. Remove those desks, and bring the members more compactly together, so that instead of being distracted by other subjects, their attention may be given to the questions immediately before them, and much of the inconvenience now complained of would be avoided. The room is sufficiently spacious, unless the number of Representatives is very considerably increased—and there appears to be a disposition averse to enlarging the number to any considerable extent. If new Halls are constructed as large as are contemplated, and with galleries as spacious as is proposed, I greatly fear, that difficulties and inconveniences will be experienced, quite as great as those we are now seeking to avoid. I do not believe it will be likely to work any improvement in the legislation of Congress, or the character of the discussions, to provide immense galleries, and all the arrangements for a public exhibition, in order to secure the attendance of great crowds of spectators. The debates now partake full enough of the character of declamation, rather than a discussion of the questions under consideration. The facilities now enjoyed afford tolerably ample opportunity for ascertaining what is going forward.

Regarding the present Capitol as too commodious to be abandoned, I cannot feel justified in going on with an experiment, without necessity, and at great expense, to erect buildings, for the purpose of obtaining halls, which, when completed, may not prove any more convenient than those we now have. I would much prefer to see a portion of the money these buildings would cost employed in improving and embellishing the public grounds, from the Capitol to the Monument. I will only add, by way of precaution, that while I would discontinue the proposed work, I utterly repudiate all idea of abandoning this place as the capital of the Union.

Mr. HALE. I simply rise to express a wish that we may have a vote.

I concur fully in the sentiment of regret expressed by the Senator from Maine, that we should have to abandon this Hall. But, Mr. President, we have got to do it; and I want to do something for those who remain after I leave. It never occurred to me that one of the objects of the extension was an improvement in the character of the debates; but if there is a possibility of such being the effect, by all means let the work go on. I rose to express a hope that we will have a vote, and that no Senator will make a speech unless he thinks that he will influence some one. I do not think that I can do so, and therefore I pray for a vote.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I concur in the idea of taking the vote now. I had intended to make some remarks in favor of the amendment, but I comply with what I consider to be the general desire in the Senate, to have the vote taken at once. I ask the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I merely wish to ask one question before I vote on the amendment.

I am very clearly of opinion that the present Capitol is large enough to accommodate the House of Representatives and the Senate, either in regard to the Halls or the other conveniences. If the object, in abandoning the work, is with a view to the removal of the Capitol to the center of the Republic, it may be, in the opinion of some, a proposition worthy of consideration. If, on the other hand, the object is to abandon it, to leave it merely as it is, I cannot consent to that. If it contemplates, as an ulterior object, the building of a Capitol in a more central situation in the Republic, perhaps Western members should understand that object before we take a vote on the question.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I think I can answer the inquiry of the Senator from Illinois. I do not think that the building of this extension of the Capitol will at all influence the decision as to whether this will be the permanent site of the seat of Government, or not. I do not think that the expenditure of four or five millions of dollars to build this extension, will influence the action of our Western friends on this question. If we expended twenty millions, I do not suppose that fact would induce them to vote one way or the other. If it is desirable to have the Capitol removed to some more convenient place, I presume that this trifling expenditure of four or five millions will not affect the question.

Mr. WALKER. I shall vote for this amendment, and I desire to state why I shall do so; for whether Senators may feel an interest in my views or otherwise, there are those who may; and, as the motives of Senators in many of the votes which they may give are liable to be inquired into at home, I will give my reasons for my vote on this occasion, in order that my motives may not be misunderstood. However, Mr. President, I shall do so very briefly. This amendment proposes to stop the work where it is, so far as the erection of the wings of the Capitol is concerned. It proposes also to restore the grounds to the condition in which they were before this work was commenced. It further proposes to pay the laborers what they would have earned, if they had been continued in employment. The last proposition, I think, is fair and just to them, and the first, and perhaps the best and most expedient thing that the Government can do in regard to the work itself. I believe that the plan adopted is one which will never answer the purpose designed, or, at least, that it will not answer that purpose half so well as many other plans which might be adopted. I believe that it will destroy the architectural beauty of the Capitol altogether—that it will make it what has been very justly termed by the Senator from Arkansas, "an architectural monstrosity." It will render it inconvenient to such a degree as to render it almost impossible to transact the business of legislation, especially at the close of a session. I am of opinion also that the proposed enlargement is altogether greater than is necessary—perhaps as large again as the dimensions contemplated by the committee which had that matter under charge at the last session of Congress. It is detached from the rest of the building; it will run beyond the limits of the public grounds; and it will incur an enormous expenditure, which, as has been well observed, is chiefly to be incurred for the benefit of private individuals.

But, sir, taking another view of the matter, I must say that I shall be opposed to the stopping of this work, if it is to operate to the injury of those who have in some measure been made helpless by its delay, and on whom the action of Congress has imposed a burden which is hard to be borne. I allude to the laborers employed on the work. I have listened with great attention to the report of the engineers who have examined this work. I do not profess to be an architect myself, nor a mechanic experienced in this kind of work. I do not know how many Senators have inspected the work, but I know that some of them have; and, so far as I have heard them speak in regard to it, not one of them has spoken otherwise than in terms of dissatisfaction; and when we come to reflect upon the reasons of that dissatisfaction, it seems to me perfectly astounding that such a report should have been made. Everybody knows the difference between the tenacity of India rubber and common sand. It requires but little experience to detect the difference. Every one knows what would be the effect of exposure of a wall to the weather, and what would be the result at the distance of four feet within. Any one can tell the difference in the capability of a cobble-stone and a shell-stone, or a solid block of stone used in the foundation to sustain the superstructure; and so far as I have heard Senators speak of this matter, who have personally inspected it, their opinion is, that the work thus far has been improperly constructed.

My investigations in respect to the material of which these foundations have been constructed, have led me to several discoveries. I passed to the side of the wall, and took my cane—which is a slender one, and not pointed with iron—and I put it in one of the cracks, and actually run it to the full length of the cane into the wall. I noticed that a part of the filling of the wall was of brickbats, and I spoke of it to several persons. They said it could not be possible. I assured them it was so; and, that I might be doubly certain myself, I went to the place where I had seen the brickbats before, and, lo and behold! they were not there. It was during a little rainstorm, and I looked in vain for them where I had seen them, for the brick and mortar had all fallen out. I then looked further, to see if I could find similar places; and I can go with Senators and show them where I found five hundred brickbats. I can go further, notwithstanding the report. I will say that I can find places where, with a common teaspoon, I can scoop, from the outside of the wall, the mortar, as easily as a man can scoop up mush—or hasty-pudding, as it would be called at the North. [Laughter.]

Will you tell me, then, that this is the proper kind of material with which to construct a wall like that? Have I never seen a log-cabin put up? Have I never seen a common chimney, or brick building pulled down? And have I not seen the great difficulty with which the mortar is removed from the stones and brick? It is one of the most difficult things to be done; and, instead of using a mason's trowel, they most commonly make use of a hatchet. Yes, sir, with my little finger-nail I can remove the mortar from the outside of that wall. I can show a distance of four feet up and down that wall where there is not a stone as large as my head, and I defy all the engineers between this city and Kamschatka to point out one as large as my head. And then, to help out this wretched material, they have inserted brickbats, which fall out with every rainstorm.

These are the facts; and it seems to me that Senators cannot have inspected that wall, or they would not have their brains so turned round as to look with favor upon such a report as we have had on this subject. I know not the men who make the report; but God Almighty only knows how they can give such a report as that. To me it is utterly inexplicable, and probably will be to the day of my death.

I repeat, again, that I can go, and with one finger pick out brickbats from the outside of this wall, which has been exposed for six months. I have done so. Some of the Senators have examined the walls with me; and so far as we have done it, it has been done, not as builders or architects—not as men of science, but as Senators; and those with whom I have made this examination have expressed themselves dissatisfied with regard to the quality of the work. Then, while I would not do anything to injure a single person who has been kept here during a long and severe winter, waiting for employment—while I would not deprive them of a single dollar, but would pay them—as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BORLAND] has said he would do—a month's wages, and, if justice requires it, would pay them after they get home, I am not for going on to continue the building; in the first place, because the character of the structure, as commenced, is not such as is suited for the purpose for which it is to be used; and, secondly, because it is to be erected on a foundation of such a character that I do not believe those who have made a favorable report upon it will live to three score years and ten, or even to half that period, before they will regret the opinion they have given. I cannot believe that such a structure can be built up upon brickbats and cobble-stones and not crack and fall to pieces.

The yeas and nays were then ordered.

Mr. CASS. I want to say one word, and only one word. I voted against this appropriation originally. I did it on the ground that the subject had not been at all considered. It was brought up, put in one of the general appropriation bills, and pushed hastily through without due consideration. I appreciate as much as any one the necessity of other rooms for the House of Representatives, and, in some measure, for the Senate. I have no doubt that the room now occupied by the House of Representatives is the worst room in the world for hearing—the worst room in the world; and I think that every just consideration in regard to correct legislation, as well as what is due to the public, requires that they should have a better room. What I was afraid of was, that the architect would sacrifice everything to the beauty of architecture. I was afraid that, instead of looking to the just principles of acoustics, he would look to the ornaments of the structure, and that we should have the same number of breaks in the room as we have now. But I am told that he has avoided that, and that it is to be a plain room, where the sound will be reverberated perpetually till it is all expended.

We have gone on so long that I think we should continue the work, for I don't like this eternal vacillation in legislation on any subject. Although I voted against the proposition in the first place, I think we should now go on till the work is completed. If it were a simple vote for the commencement of the work, I should vote now as I did before.

The question was then taken and resulted—yeas 11, nays 30, as follows.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Borland, Bradbury, Brodhead, Chase, Dodge of Iowa, Morton, Norris, Wade, Walker, and Weller—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Berrien, Brooke, Cass, Clemens, Cooper, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Felch, Fish, Geyer, Hale, Hamlin, Hunter, King, Mallory, Mangum, Miller, Pratt, Rusk, Seward, Sebastian, Shields, Smith, Spruance, Stockton, Sumner, Underwood, and Upham—30.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the adoption of the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I desire to offer an amendment. It is to strike out the words "five hundred thousand," and insert "two hundred and fifty thousand."

Mr. BORLAND. Before the vote is taken on that amendment, I would inquire of the Senator from Virginia, what amount has been asked for by the Executive for the continuation of this work?

Mr. HUNTER. I am not able to answer the question of the Senator with certainty; but my opinion is that the Secretary of the Interior recommended $350,000. The House of Representatives substituted $500,000. I suppose that if a work of this kind is to go on, this sum would not be too much; as it will not probably be completed within five years. I believe, although I only speak from imperfect recollection, that the estimate of the Secretary of the Interior was $350,000.

Mr. MANGUM. I would inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings—for so I understood him to say—if the $500,000 voted by the House of Representatives for this work is designed to cover not only this fiscal year, but to go to the end of the fiscal year 1853?

Mr. HUNTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANGUM. And I would further inquire, whether, for that time, that sum is not much less than the Secretary of the Interior requested—whether it is not diminished one half? Is that so, sir?

Mr. HUNTER. Yes, sir. That is so.

Mr. BORLAND. I have examined with some care the report made by the architect, and it appears that the whole of the materials, so far as I can judge, for the whole building have been contracted for. Everything seems to be under contract, even to the term of some five years.

In view of this, let the Senate notice, and let the country know, that this Administration, upon a simple appropriation of $100,000—and that, as remarked by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] without much time allowed for consideration—put into a general appropriation bill at the hurried close of the session, and put there in very peculiar phraseology, has placed at the discretion of an individual who is not an officer of the Government, and with whose appointment the Senate had nothing whatever to do, the expenditure of millions of dollars of the public money. Sir, if we recognize and sanction such acts as these—and surely we are doing so by this appropriation—we recognize the authority of the Executive, upon any appropriation, whether large or small, to involve this Government in debt to any amount, extending through any number of years. It may suit the views which some gentlemen entertain of Executive omnipotence and infallibility to allow this, and to sanction it. It is not in accordance with my sense of duty and responsibility. I shall vote against it. This is not the mere appropriation of $250,000, or of $500,000. It is, in effect, whether the Executive has unlimited power and control over the public Treasury—whether, upon a little appropriation of $100,000, the President can, without consulting Congress, incur obligations for the Government, and involve us in a debt to the amount of millions, and throughout an indefinite period of time. These are the questions, and this is the issue. It seems to me if we sanction the President's unauthorized acts in this instance, we abandon the only ground upon which we can resist any of his unauthorized acts hereafter. I, for one, will not abandon that ground.

Regard this matter in any aspect we may, and it seems to me that the course of the President, as well as the proposed action of the Senate, is among the most extraordinary that I have ever been called upon to consider. Here, sir, under the very limited authority derived from three little lines in a general appropriation bill, passed hurriedly at the very heel of a session, to expend the specific sum of $100,000, we find the Government involved to the amount of millions of dollars, and for at least five years in the future! And through what sort of instrumentality? Why, sir, through an individual who is no officer of the Government, and who, whatever may be his relations to the President, certainly owes no official responsibility to Congress, the only source in which the people have deposited the money power of this Government! And that individual one whom the Senate refused to concur with the President in appointing to an inferior and far less responsible position! Sir, this is, indeed, an anomaly in the transactions of this Government. The like of it—or even an approximation to it—I have never witnessed, I have never heard of before—God forbid I should ever witness or hear its like again. And yet, if we sanction it, as we shall do by the passage of this bill, is it not an invitation and encouragement to the Executive to repeat it? If he has gone so far upon one hundred thousand dollars, what may he not do upon five times that amount! Look, sir, at the checks and guards we throw around the disbursements of the public money, and every other responsible function, in every other branch of the public service! Why, there is not a purser in the Navy, a paymaster, quartermaster, or commissary of subsistence, in the Army; not a postmaster throughout the country, whose salary is $1,000 a year—nay, sir, not a justice of the peace in the District of Columbia, in whose appointment does not require the concurrence of the Senate. And yet, in this instance, where far more important duties are to be performed, where far heavier responsibilities should be borne, and where millions of the public money are to be expended at discretion, an individual is intrusted with all these important and delicate duties, and put in the place of this high responsibility, whose appointment not only has not our concurrence, but has, long since, for a far inferior and less responsible position, been rejected by us! Surely, sir, further comment upon this is unnecessary. It may have no influence here. I have put it upon the record, that it may go to the country.

Mr. HUNTER. I have received the estimates in regard to which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MANGUM] made an inquiry a few moments ago. The Secretary of the Interior estimates $350,000 for the balance of this year, and $650,000 for the next year, making a million in all. The House of Representatives, however, cut it down to $500,000, meaning this appropriation to extend to the end of the fiscal year 1853.

Mr. RUSK. I really must claim the fulfillment of the pledge of the honorable Senator from Virginia, that this bill should be postponed when the hour for taking up private bills should arrive. That hour has long since passed.

Several SENATORS. Let us have a vote.

Mr. DAWSON. The declaration having been made by the Senator from Arkansas that the present architect had been rejected by the Senate, when nominated for a situation similar to that which he now holds, the presumption is, that the rejection was in consequence of his want of capacity. That impression will do injustice to the Senate, as well as to the individual, if it goes to the country in that form. It was known—if I may reveal what takes place in Executive session—that that was not the cause of his rejection. The nomination was for the post of assistant architect in building the custom-house at New Orleans.

Mr. MANGUM. You cannot speak on that subject.

Mr. DAWSON. I will state my own views.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator cannot reveal Executive proceedings in the Senate. They cannot be spoken of during legislative sittings, nor in any case, unless the injunction of secrecy is removed.

Mr. DAWSON. I will not refer to anything, only to say that his rejection had no reference to his competency.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. President, I must claim the fulfillment of the pledge of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HUNTER. I will give way to the wish of the Senator from Texas, if such is the pleasure of the Senate.

Several SENATORS. Let us have the question.

Mr. SEWARD. We can dispose of the bill to which the Senator from Texas refers, after this is disposed of.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. Mr. President, I know that this bill will pass by an overwhelming majority, just as the French spoliation bill will pass whenever it comes up. And it will no doubt pass the sooner on account of the very great amount appropriated. We send a bill to the House of Representatives appropriating $10,000, and it comes back with an amendment making it appropriate half a million.

Just look at the galleries on this occasion, and witness the appeals that are made to the better sympathies of our nature. I should be glad if an amendment could be inserted that $500,000 shall be given for this object, when all the other objects of utility in the West which have been so long waiting for aid shall be completed. But I know we are destined to have another battle for our Western waters, before this Congress adjourns. And about that time, after all these public buildings have been made to tower up to the clouds, and all the dry-docks on all our coasts shall have been provided for, and all the paymasters and quartermasters in the country, then there will be all sorts of efforts made to cripple our appropriations. But I will not detain the Senate. I know the bill will pass by an overwhelming majority, but not by my vote.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President—

Mr. RUSK. I hope the Senator will allow me to say a word. It is evident we cannot get a vote on this question to-day.

Mr. MANGUM. Yes we can.

Mr. RUSK. I think it is evident we cannot. I came here this morning to ask the attention of the Senate to a private bill, that would not occupy five minutes to pass or reject it. It is in favor of a widow lady upwards of eighty years of age, an heir of a revolutionary soldier, whose pension was suspended for several years, because he went out of the United States to Canada. The daughter of that lady is here without any means of support, and subjected to incur considerable expense, and unable to employ any one as an agent in her behalf. If this debate goes on, the result will be that at the close of the day, there will not be a quorum left here to act upon any private bill, and we shall not be able to pass the bill for the relief of this lady to-day.

Mr. BORLAND. I know that Senators who desire to pass this bill are impatient of delay; and I have no desire to make factious opposition to it—I make none. But I have objections to the bill, and though I feel very sure that I cannot defeat its passage, yet it is my privilege, and I believe it to be my duty, to make known the motives which actuate me, and place upon record the reasons which control my course.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. Dodge] has very properly called the attention of the Senate to the circumstances connected with our legislation for improvements on our Western waters. We know very well the difficulties we had to encounter here, the kind of opposition we met last year, and the means by which appropriations for those objects were defeated. We found Senators then influenced by constitutional scruples, and all other kinds of scruples that could raise up or suggest opposition to an appropriation of about $2,000,000, because a portion of it—a small portion, too—was destined to the great valley of the West. We found all sorts of opposition made, all sorts of expedients resorted to, which legislative tactics could suggest or tolerate, to defeat what we not only believed, but felt, to be proper and necessary appropriations. Appeals on behalf of the multitudes of our people, who are annually destroyed for want of those facilities and that protection to Western navigation, which have never been refused to the Eastern section of our country,—appeals were made, but made in vain, to the sensibilities, and to the sense of justice, of Senators. A few hundred thousand dollars—less, sir, than the amount of this bill—could not be appropriated, because of Senators' scruples! Where are their scruples now? The Treasury is to be opened to its core, and millions are to be taken out, for what we regard as an unnecessary and an improper object—a mere useless, nay, a worse than useless, expenditure of money; and, to attain that object, this wedge of $500,000 is to be driven in, until all the fastenings of our national coffers shall be rent asunder, and the treasures they contain, coined out of the sweat of our people, laid open to the grasp of irresponsible agents, whose only care seems to be the expenditure of the largest sums in the shortest time!

Let not Senators complain, therefore, at a few obstacles thrown in the way—at a little time taken for examination of this pet scheme of theirs, by those who regard the expenditure of millions to which it will lead, as so much taken from our urgent and legitimate wants for mere fancy works here at this seat of Federal power, and in violation, too, as we think, of all propriety, of all those principles which should govern, and all those rules which should be observed in dispensing the public treasures.

No, sir; it is no factious opposition we make. We only wish to be heard. Our claims have been postponed long enough—alas, too long already, for no year rolls by us without leaving thousands of our people dead upon the waters, and millions of our property swallowed up, because of your refusal to extend that amount of relief and that measure of protection which we think and feel you owe us. We cannot stand idle, and silent, and unmoved, when we see you squandering millions upon unnecessary works, and know that we are to suffer in consequence of a postponement of our reasonable and just demands by being coolly told that the Treasury is exhausted.

Mr. President, it is enough to raise in our hearts the strongest feelings of indignation, when, remembering the injustice we have been made to bear, we see millions, at the mere Executive bidding, freely poured out, not with the avowed, or even acknowledged purpose, but certainly with the effect, as all must see, to fill the pockets of certain speculators who hover about this city, as vultures about a carcass, to feed and fatten upon the Government; filling the cities' purlieus and the Congressional galleries, and sometimes its lobbies, and making up that outside pressure which is annually filling the Treasury to repletion from the people's hard-earned money, but that it may be squandered in the hopeless task of filling the remorseless daughters of the horse-leech, whose cry, still and unceasing, is "Give! give!!"

When I speak of this outside influence, and of people in the galleries, I do not allude to the laborers who have been employed in this work upon the Capitol. No, sir; they, however humble they may be, however unfortunate they may seem to be, have my respect, and my heart's strongest sympathies. But, sir, I allude to that heartless set—or whose hearts, if they have any, are as hard and as cold as the blue stone, and as worthless as the mortar in those walls of which we have spoken—of that set who, wrapped in the hypocritical garb of sympathy for the laborer, but to cover their own selfishness, have imposed upon these poor men, and would now use them as instruments to extend their own obscene grasp still deeper into the public purse; who speculate alike, as occasion may permit, upon the necessities of the laboring man, and the sympathies of members of Congress; and who, through the medium of a hireling press, (not all the press, thank Heaven,) denounce members of Congress whom they do not find pliant to their purposes, and seek to hold them up to the world as hard-hearted and unfeeling. I wish to put upon the record this expression of the opinions and feelings I entertain on this subject; so that, however much I may be misrepresented and maligned in this latitude, for doing my duty, by those whose foul pockets I refuse to fill out of the public Treasury, I shall, at least, convey to my plain and unpretending, but just-minded and honest-hearted, constituents at home some idea of the true state of things here, and of the motives which govern me, and of the reasons which determine my votes.

Mr. DODGE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were accordingly ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have a few remarks only to make. I sympathize with the honorable Senator from Arkansas, and from Iowa, in a great deal that they have said. I have asked the Senate once or twice, to take up a measure in reference to our Western waters, but have not been able to succeed; but this measure has come up without any difficulty. Notwithstanding my sympathy with them, I see the day is coming, and is near at hand, when the valley which they and I represent in common, will have a strong voice in this and the other branch of Congress, and when objects which we have at heart will, perhaps, have more voices; and I hope as able heads to support them as any we have now.

But, notwithstanding all that sympathy, I shall vote differently from my friends on this occasion, and I think it due to myself, as reluctant as I am to consume the time of the Senate, to state why I shall differ from them. I do it because it is not an original question. I was opposed to the plan of extending the Capitol in the beginning; but you have commenced the work, and you have appropriated money, and expended some hundred thousand dollars in its prosecution. Now, for reasons assigned by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Cass,] for the stability of our legislation, for the prevention of oscillation, which would place us in a ridiculous attitude before the public, I am willing to execute the plan which has been adopted.

Suppose you begin the construction of a custom-house, lay its foundations, and spend a hundred thousand dollars, and then repeal the law; suppose you begin a marine hospital, and expend a hundred thousand dollars, and then repeal the law—what an attitude would the Congress of the United States occupy in the estimation of the American people, if they would thus dot the whole country over with public buildings and public works, partially constructed, and then abandon them and the law without going any further? Sir, I think we should lose in the estimation of the public more by presenting such a spectacle than by spending the millions which perhaps we may have to spend before this structure is completed, although I think, like my friends, that the money could have been spent infinitely better in another way. As to the idea of fixing the seat of Government here by this expenditure, it will not have that effect whenever the West think it best to have it removed. You cannot tie it down by dollars and cents. I thought it necessary to make these few remarks, in order to account for my vote.

Mr. BORLAND. I am glad the honorable Senator from Kentucky has made one suggestion in assigning the reasons for his vote; not that I think it a good one, nor that he will insist upon it as good; but because, in connection with it, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to one fact. He exclaims, what an attitude the Government will be placed in, if it begins works of this sort, expends money upon them, and then abandons them! He asks how it would look for the Government to commence the erection of a custom-house, and expend $100,000, and then repeal the law, or abandon the work? Does he not know that that is precisely the course which has been pursued in respect to improvements on the Western rivers? Does he not know that it has caused more mischief, and the loss of more money than any other course that could have been pursued? Such a course as this, in regard to the West, was and is the just ground of complaint against the course pursued by the last Congress. It was the custom, in former Congresses, to appropriate a small sum, enough to remove a few logs from the rivers; and when the appropriation was exhausted, did they make another? No, sir; they have left the whole Western valley "dotted all over," as the Senator expresses it, with unfinished works, and now requiring more money than it would have taken in the beginning to complete them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope for better times.

Mr. BORLAND. Sir, it is too late for the Senator to say that the Government must not put itself in that position before the world,—that its reputation repudiates such a course. So far as precedent is concerned, they are as "plenty as blackberries." And, so far as my vote is concerned, it is no matter to me whether we have begun the work, or how much we have expended. If, after it is begun, even if at first I had approved it, I discover that it is improper and unnecessary, I shall vote for abandoning it; while, on the other hand, even if I had opposed it at first, I should vote for it now, if I found it proper and necessary. Because we have expended a hundred thousand dollars, or half a million of dollars on a work, and now find it unnecessary, wherein consists the reason why a million more should be wasted on it? Sir, we live to little purpose, if we are but to follow out in the future the course we have pursued in the past. Shall we not profit by our own experience? It seems to me that the argument of the gentleman, if followed, would put us in a strange position indeed. It is a new version of the doctrine of precedent, which involves its advocates in inextricable dilemmas.

Mr. DODGE. If I am at liberty, I will modify my amendment, so as to make it $300,000, instead of $250,000.

The PRESIDENT. The amendment may be modified in the manner suggested by the Senator, with the unanimous consent of the Senate.

The amendment was accordingly so modified, and the question was taken, and resulted—yeas 16, nays 24.

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Borland, Bradbury, Brodhead, Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Downs, King, Norris, Rusk, Wade, Walker, and Weller—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Berrien, Brooke, Clemens, Cooper, Dawson, Fish, Geyer, Hale, Hamilton, Hunter, Mallory, Mangum, Miller, Morton, Pratt, Seward, Shields, Smith, Spruance, Stockton, Sumner, Underwood, and Upham—24.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BORLAND. I have an amendment which I wish to offer. It is to strike out all after the word that, and insert the following:

To enable the proper officers of the Government to pay the laborers who have been employed on the extension of the Capitol the same amount of wages which they would have received had they been employed up to the present time, and one month's wages in addition.

I do this to present, as it does, my views and feelings, in regard to the laborers, whose hardships have been so much talked of here. And it serves me with an occasion, too, to mark, and disprove the willful, malicious, and slanderous misrepresentations of my motives and purposes, which have been made through the Administration organ in this city, to the effect that I had thrown myself before the hungry mouths of the laboring men, and deprive them and their families of the means of support. I wish to be placed right on the record. I have no opposition to the honest laboring men of the country. They have my respect and sympathy. But, while I would take all care of them, and protect and provide for them, I would mark, with the strongest reprobation, those heartless cormorants, and their hireling advocates, who feed upon the necessities of these laboring men, and, in the same sordid spirit, would speculate upon the bones of their own fathers.

Mr. HALE. If it is in order I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment which I have just offered.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALE. I am not going to make a speech, but I simply wish to say that I shall vote against the amendment; and if it is not adopted, I will move to add it as an additional section, striking out the words at the end of it, "one month's additional wages."

The question was then taken, with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Borland, Brodhead, Chase, Dodge of Iowa, Walker, and Weller—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Bell, Berrien, Bradbury, Brooke, Cass, Clemens, Cooper, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Fish, Geyer, Hale, Hamilton, Hunter, King, Mallory, Mangum, Miller, Morton, Pratt, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Smith, Spruance, Stockton, Sumner, Underwood, Upham, and Wade—33.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BORLAND. I have an amendment which I wish to offer, by way of a proviso, to come in at the end of the bill:

Provided, Nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize any officer, or agent of the United States, to bind the United States by contract, beyond the amount appropriated by Congress, or to sanction any such contract heretofore made.

I deem that an important amendment; because, if the bill passes, I wish to have it properly guarded. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CASS. I am altogether in favor of the proposition if it is a proper one; but I consider it unnecessary.

Mr. SEWARD. What right have they to do so, even without that provision?

Mr. CASS. The only question is, whether they could do so. I am in favor of the principle of the amendment; but would not the adoption of such an amendment authorize a general impression that the Administration did go beyond its power? That is a thing which I do not believe. I can understand that, under an administration a deficiency may occur which might create the necessity of an expenditure beyond the actual appropriations for a specific purpose. It might be necessary to go beyond appropriations to keep soldiers from starving; but I do not understand the necessity of any Administration going beyond the appropriation, in a case of this kind, when imperious necessity does not require it, and when Congress does not order it. I do not believe the Administration has done it; but still, if any one believes it, I am willing to make the declaration which is contained in this amendment.

Mr. HUNTER. In relation to the power of any Administration to make contracts, I believe it is defined in the law of 1820. They may make contracts for supplies for subsistence in the quartermaster's department, and for certain supplies for the Navy. They may make contracts without appropriations, when specially authorized by law, and not otherwise. But, by way of abundant caution, I am willing to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. HALE. I wish to say a single word with regard to the practical working of this principle. I think it is within the knowledge of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] that Congress once appropriated $250,000 for a dock, and when the work was stopped, for want of means to carry it on, the Administration asked and obtained the opinion of the Attorney General, which was that they could not go on. The consequence was that the work was suspended for a whole year, because they could not go on without money. I think they have no such authority, and my objection to the amendment is, that if it is adopted the bill will have to go back to the House of Representatives, and it will be a month or two perhaps before the appropriation can be made. I am in favor of the principle, but as it is not necessary to declare it, I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am afraid that the gentleman's amendment will defeat the object he has in view. I agree with him in principle that such things ought never to be done. I do not believe that they have any right to do it; and if this bill is so qualified by inserting this provision, how will the matter stand hereafter? It will be as much as to say, that unless you make this provision in every bill by which the Administration is allowed to disburse a certain amount of money hereafter, that Administration, for the time being, may go on and make contracts and incur expenses ad libitum. I am not ready to say that; and it seems to me that this amendment would lead to the very thing to which the gentleman is opposed. I think that the Executive has no such authority now; and by the adoption of that amendment, you seem to me to say, and the legitimate inference will be, that they have such power. I do not believe it.

Mr. BORLAND. I think I can answer the Senators from Michigan and from Kentucky without difficulty, and very briefly.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CASS] says that he sees no necessity for such an amendment, because he can conceive of no such power in the officers of the Government. I agree with him that no such power does rightfully exist. But this amendment is to make that certain, beyond dispute—is to make a positive prohibition of this power which is not possessed, but which this Administration seems to be constantly exercising. Why, sir, in the answer of the President to the call for information as to the contracts, we find that the contracts cover the whole work for five years, involving some millions of dollars. Here is the exercise of this very power.

Allusion has been made to the deficiency bill. In that we have proof that not only have contracts been made, and debts contracted, beyond the amount appropriated, but in the very face of the positive and express refusal of Congress to make the appropriations. Why, before the preparation of the appropriation bill of last year, estimates were sent in from the Departments, for certain amounts for the public service; and after a long debate, and hard struggle, they were refused—that is, they were much reduced. The Administration was told, in the most solemn forms of legislation, that only so much money, and no more, should be expended in certain branches of the public service. Here was a positive rejection of its estimates. Yet, in despite of that, we find this same Administration setting Congress at defiance—treating its laws with contempt, and spending millions of the public money, not only without authority, but in defiance of an express, positive, and solemn prohibition of law. And, in this matter of the Capitol, we find again, with authority of law to expend but $100,000, obligations upon the Government have been incurred to the amount of millions, and for years to come. Sir, it is because there is no such lawful power—and yet it is constantly exercised—that this very provision is necessary. It is to arrest and prevent this flagrant usurpation, and dangerous abuse of power.

I know it is said that those contracts are not binding, because they are conditioned to be contingent upon the appropriations. Now, sir, we know very well what that means. We know very well, and so does the President and the contractors, that if the materials be furnished, and the work be done, whether by authority of law or not, we will pay for them. Everybody understands that; and hence the readiness to enter into these contracts, and push on the work in advance of appropriations. This has grown to an abuse which it is necessary now to arrest and remedy.

I cannot understand how the amendment to this bill can create the necessity to attach it to all other appropriation bills; but if it should, as suggested by the Senator from Kentucky, tend to "exclude the conclusion," he apprehends then, it will be very easy to put it upon all. It is proper and necessary here, and ought to be adopted.

Mr. MANGUM. The Administration, as I was advised—and I have no doubt I was advised correctly—or the managers of this work, whichever you please, have at no time exceeded their lawful authority. They have made no contract in violation of the authority conferred upon them by the clause in the appropriation bill appropriating $100,000 for the extension of the Capitol.

Mr. RUSK. Will the Senator from North Carolina allow me—

Mr. MANGUM. Yes, sir, in a moment. I was about to say, that every contract that has been entered into with the view of having materials at hand where the work should be done, has been made on the express condition that appropriations shall be made by Congress; and there is no obligation whatever, either upon the President or upon Congress in regard to these contracts, unless Congress shall choose to make the appropriations.

One other remark. I was prepared to vote for the amendment of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] when it should be offered, but I hope he will not propose it upon this bill. I shall vote for it as a matter of punishment to ourselves, for having been delinquent in doing our duty in the right time. I mean the amendment in regard to the payment of the laborers. I hope the Senator will not persist in his amendment, because if the bill is not passed as it came from the House, it will have to go back there, and will be much delayed, and the work will never be got under way. The season, the public interest, the advancement of the building, every consideration requires that we should proceed forthwith. I trust, therefore, that the amendment will not be offered to this bill, for the one especial reason I have just assigned.

As to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, it involves a principle, the truth and propriety of which I have never heard anybody dispute. But we understand from gentlemen who are no doubt well informed upon this subject, that the law already furnishes sufficient security in reference to this matter; and why should we reenact here that which is already provided for? I do trust, therefore, that this amendment will not pass, for it will send the bill back to the House of Representatives, and delay action upon it.

Mr. GWIN. I do not intend to oppose the passage of this joint resolution; but if the Senate intends to prohibit, or withdraw its sanction from, the contracts which have been made, it is absolutely necessary to adopt this proviso. I have some knowledge of the manner in which these contracts are made. Contracts have been made for the whole of the materials which are to be used in the building. To be sure, there is a proviso in all these contracts that they shall be of no effect to an amount beyond the actual appropriations; but whenever an appropriation is made, the contracts hold. I know that such is the constant practice in all cases of this description. I know this was the practice when some of our large custom-houses were built. A contract is made for the whole, and a proviso put in that the contract shall not be binding unless the appropriations are made; but if made, it stands. If we intend to prohibit contracts being made beyond the amount of the actual appropriations, this proviso is absolutely necessary; for if it is not put in, contracts may be made at once for the whole building and all the materials, with a proviso that they shall not be binding until the appropriations are made, but that when the appropriations are made, they shall be binding.

Mr. BORLAND. I know that the provision of which the Senator speaks is in all the contracts which have been made for materials for the extension of the Capitol. In each of the contracts there is this provision:

"It is also expressly understood and agreed by the parties, that if Congress shall at any time fail to make the necessary appropriations for the execution of said work, then and in such case the execution of this contract shall be suspended, without thereby creating any claim on the United States by the contractor."

I know that is in all these contracts; but does not everybody know that if the work and labor is done, we will recognize it and not deprive the individuals, who have done the work and furnished the materials, of payment, although the debt may have been improperly contracted? This clause would not exonerate us. It would in a court of law; but it would not exonerate us if the men should furnish the labor and the materials, and then come before us and ask for payment. In that case, would we refuse it? Who believes that Congress would refuse to pay for labor and materials thus furnished? Is there a member of the Senate or the House of Representatives who would vote against paying for them in such a case? No one could do it in conscience, or in common fairness. Therefore the clause in the contracts which I have read, amounts to nothing at all.

Mr. GWIN. The gentleman has mistaken my argument entirely. I say the proviso is necessary.

Mr. CLEMENS. I shall vote against this amendment, and against all other amendments which may be offered to this resolution. As I understand it, the law now prohibits the President making contracts beyond the actual appropriations. Then if you put this clause in the resolution, you do not strengthen it. If he will disregard a law already in existence, what is to prevent him disregarding this? If you cannot punish him for disregarding that, how are you to punish him for disregarding this? How do you strengthen the law by adopting this provision? What good does it do? What is the effect of it but to send the resolution back to the House of Representatives? I shall vote against it.

Mr. RUSK. I shall vote for this appropriation. I voted to reduce it, and thought we ought to have done so. I believed that we might, perhaps, have produced a little economy by that course. The greatest abuses that I have noticed in my short service here are the interminable claims that are created by these agents. You make an appropriation, they are bound by law not to go beyond it; but they still enter into these kind of contracts, by which a claim is created against the Government. Gentlemen may say it is not a legal claim; that it is made conditional upon an appropriation of Congress. If they make the appropriation, then it purports to be a binding contract. It is true that they may make another contract. But here they have gone on and contracted for the whole of the materials for the building, which is certainly a reckless extravagance in the matter. It is true, under the law, possibly this contract might be set aside, and a new one made if cheaper and better materials could be procured; but, then, have you not created here, in the very teeth of, and contrary to the law, and contrary to good policy, a sort of equitable claim that will fill your galleries with agents pressing on you to relieve such contractors by appropriations of money as damages? It is the greatest abuse in this Government, and one that must be stopped, or it will ruin it. You made an appropriation some time ago for running the boundary line between the United States and Mexico. You sent a commissioner there; he exhausted that appropriation, and, if I am correctly informed—and I received my information from an intelligent gentleman—three fourths of the money has been squandered upon objects not at all appropriate to the expedition; and here, in the deficiency bill, is an appropriation of $80,000, to cover that deficiency which has been expended in collecting lizards, bugs, and plants, and one nonsense and another, which he was attending to, whilst the commissioner on the part of Mexico was absolutely cheating him out of a large portion of valuable territory, properly belonging to us, and of vast importance to the United States. We have that appropriation to make. You are informed by the quartermaster's department that drafts are coming in, which cannot be met, constantly. Well, sir, it is time to stop this kind of expenditure.

When the appropriation of $100,000 was made, what gentleman, who voted for it, dreamed that a contract or contracts with favorites (or not, I do not care; it makes no difference, because I do not know anything about the contractors or about the agents employed; but still it is opening a door which may be used improperly) for several millions would be made depending simply upon the appropriations by Congress, which, I must say, have always heretofore followed too much as a matter of course? We are embarrassed in regard to this measure. First, I want this work to go on; it is proper and right that it should. Next, I want to relieve these laborers—these men who get but a very small pittance out of this; and in order to effect that object, to do justice to these few laborers, I am bound here to sanction this monstrous assumption of making contracts for several millions of dollars, to extend, perhaps, throughout ten years, for the materials to be used upon the building here.

Mr. HUNTER. I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings of the House of Representatives, who has given more time to the examination of this matter than I have, that the whole amount of the contracts made amount to about $419,000, which is less than the appropriation contemplated in this bill.

But I rise to another question, and that is, as to the propriety of this amendment. I made a statement in relation to the law of 1820; the section is a short one, and I will read it to the Senate:

"No contract shall hereafter be made by the Secretary of State, or of the Treasury, or of the Department of War, or of the Navy, except under a law authorizing the same, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment, excepting always contracts for the subsistence and clothing of the Army or Navy, and contracts of the quartermaster's department, which may be made by the Secretaries of those Departments."

The exceptions are for the quartermaster's department, the subsistence and clothing of the Army and Navy, and when Congress, by a law, authorizes a contract to be made, but makes no appropriation. The difficulty that may arise in relation to this law is, whether it is such a law as authorized this contract or not; therefore it was, that I said that out of abundant caution I was disposed to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas; and I shall do so, because it leaves no doubt on that question. If there can be any doubt, it must arise on the question whether this is such a law—if the joint resolution passes—as will authorize a contract, without appropriations. If the amendment is passed, it will leave no such doubt. They will have then no authority to make contracts, except as appropriations are made; and I think that would be the safer course; I am, therefore, willing to accede to the amendment, and shall vote for it.

Mr. BORLAND. I, perhaps, owe an explanation to the Senator from Texas, as it was on my statement he based some of his remarks. I stated that the contracts amounted to some million dollars. That was my inference from the report which I have before me, which was made in answer to a call of the Senate. So far as I have been capable of understanding that report, or as anybody has explained it to me, the contracts cover the whole work. How much that will be, I do not know, and cannot know; and I do not believe we have any evidence that will enable any one to know; and that is one of the objections I have to the passage of the resolution—that it is a sort of entering wedge to the expenditure of money, the amount of which we cannot estimate. How much it will be, I do not know; but my inference, and the only inference I can draw from the report that has been sent in to us embracing all the contracts, is, that it covers the whole work. If it does not, then I am incapable of understanding the report.

The question being taken on the amendment, by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Borland, Bradbury, Brodhead, Cass, Chase, Davis, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Downs, Felch, Gwin, Hamlin, Hunter, King, Mallory, Norris, Rusk, Shields, Stockton, Sumner, Walker, and Weller—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Berrien, Clemens, Cooper, Dawson, Fish, Geyer, Hale, Mangum, Miller, Morton, Pratt, Seward, Smith, Spruance, Underwood, Upham, and Wade—17.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. If the Chair has in his possession the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Arkansas, I will now offer it as additional to the amendment of the House.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the Senator will bring that question up in a separate measure, and not as an amendment to this resolution.

Mr. HALE. I would not offer it but for the fact that we have already made one amendment, which will create the necessity of sending the resolution back to the House.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have drawn up an amendment which I think will suit the gentleman's purpose. It is to add—

"That the laborers employed upon the Capitol shall be entitled to and receive pay for the time during which the work was suspended, according to the regular prices at which they were originally engaged."

Mr. HALE. I accept that.

Mr. HUNTER. For what time are they to receive pay?

Mr. HALE. Up to the present time.

Mr. HUNTER. From when?

Mr. HALE. From the time the work was suspended.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand that these men were brought here by advertisements which were published inviting them to come, and a stipulated price was promised to them. They have been kept here while the work has been suspended, and have been unable to obtain employment. I propose to pay them for the time they have been kept here during the suspension of the work.

Mr. HUNTER. For the whole winter?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not know, nor do I care, what may have been the length of time. That does not affect the question whether they ought to be paid.

Mr. HALE. It certainly cannot be a new principle to pay men who have been "waiting orders," and I think that if there has ever been a set of men waiting orders, it is these workmen. I understand that a great many of them have been induced to come from a great distance by the advertisements of the officers of the Government. They came here expecting work. They have been here during the whole winter. They are out of money; they are out of credit; and they are out of heart. I trust that we shall pass this amendment, so that they will not be wanting, in all respect, for the candor and good faith of the Government.

Mr. SEWARD. I want to hear the amendment read again, in order to see whether it describes who are the workmen to be paid, and whether it can be ascertained at all who have been waiting, and will be entitled to claim pay; or whether all the workmen in the city of Washington and in the city of New York are to be paid.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. WELLER. I believe some of the workmen went home, and are engaged in other work.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want some gentleman who has examined the subject, to tell me, if he can, how this work was carried on? Was it done by contract? Did contractors engage to carry on the work and employ their own laborers? or was it done by officers of the Government, who were charged to carry on the work? I want to know what was the nature of the contract under which these men were employed before I vote. If some gentleman can inform me, I would be glad to receive the information.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to ask, also, whether, besides the laborers who have been out of employment who are to be paid, those who may have found employment elsewhere, are also to be paid by the Government?

Mr. BORLAND. It seems to me that this question is very easily understood. If the officer whose duty it shall be to execute this provision of the law, be a man of common sense—a man of common fairness and honesty—he will have no difficulty in carrying it out. It refers to the laborers—not to the superintendents, but to the laboring men who get their seventy-five cents or a dollar a day for their manual labor, in erecting this building. We all know what we mean by laborers. It seems to me that those Senators who are willing to make this large appropriation of $500,000 need not stop at all. They need not hesitate to pay the small additional sum which is proposed to be paid to the poor men who have been kept here, and have had to live, with their wives and children, on expectation, during a long and severe winter. Many of them, I know, are almost in a state of starvation. I see many of them daily who are fit objects of relief. I do not care what amount it costs. I would vote more to pay them than I would to build the Capitol. This appeals more strongly to my sense of justice, and my sense of public duty, and our common feelings of humanity. I think it is the highest obligation that can rest upon the Government to relieve the necessities of those men who have been brought here without authority, as I contend, and kept here without authority, but not by their fault, but by the fault of those whom they have entrusted with the power and with the money, to whom we gave credit before the country to operate upon the minds of these laboring men. We have incurred, therefore, an obligation which we cannot, in my opinion, now repudiate. I, therefore, will vote for this amendment, if it costs double the amount that it is proposed to appropriate for the continuation of the work on the Capitol.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I must try again to get some information. If the gentleman from Arkansas can answer my question, I would be very glad to hear from him.

Mr. BORLAND. I did not introduce the amendment—it was the honorable Senator from Illinois.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I see nothing at either end of the Capitol but some stone work which has been done. Now, I want to know whether that stone work was let out upon advertisement to contractors, or whether it was done by an officer of the Government, employing men to do it? I want to know what was the nature of the contract, if I can get at it.

Mr. SEWARD. It was done by day labor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman from Arkansas can tell me the nature of the contracts, and how the work was done, I should be very glad to obtain the information.

Mr. BORLAND. If the gentleman wishes to know what the agents, and architects, and superintendents appointed by this Administration, have done, and how they have done the work, he must go to other sources. I have no means of knowing it. The gentleman must ask his political friends, who are carrying on this work, and are now asking this large amount of money at our hands to continue it. If he paid any attention to the remarks which I originally made, he might recollect that I stated that this work was carried on at an expense five or ten times as great as it ought to have been. Whether it was done by contract or not I do not know; but I expect it was done by day labor, and that the superintendents, getting their five dollars a day to superintend, took especial pains to employ as many laborers as they could, and to keep them doing as little as possible. I have stood myself, for an hour at a time, and looked on at the work; and I think that two good men could have done more labor than was done by ten at that time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have made various inquiries after information from the gentleman from Arkansas, because I thought, from his connection with the subject, that he would be enabled to give me the information. He tells me I must go elsewhere and hunt it up; therefore, I do not still know how these laborers were employed, or by whom they were employed. I do not know what contracts were made on entering into employment; and, in the total ignorance under which I labor in regard to these points, the gentleman gets up and says that the laborers are entitled to claim against the Government so much damages, and that therefore we have nothing at all to do but to pay them. I, for one, cannot legislate upon any such grounds. I never give a vote, unless I know the propriety of giving it, and see that there is justice in it. If these laborers have been employed during the suspension of this work, profitably for anybody else, and made double as much as they are to receive by their contracts, is it proposed that they are to pocket this too? Can anybody tell me anything about it? Are we to vote this blindfold, for sympathy? Why, if so, it is worse than any material aid granted to Kossuth, as great a humbug as I conceive him to be.

Mr. GWIN. It is very evident that this work has all been done by day labor. These parties are not contracted with at all. I take it for granted that the architect advertised for laborers—that they came here, and that they were employed by the day. There is no contract about it; but I conceive this to be a very dangerous precedent. If you pay these laborers for the time the work has been suspended, you will have to pay other laborers on every public work in the United States when it is suspended, and the laborers are thrown out of employment in consequence of the failure of the appropriations. Why, the chairman of the Committee on Finance knows very well that applications are being made to us constantly to put appropriations in the deficiency bill for such objects, because it is said if we do not make appropriations now, the workmen will be thrown out of employment at some future period. There will be a precedent here established if we adopt this amendment, by which laborers can come in and receive compensation during the interval after one appropriation is exhausted until another is made. Such applications will come up from every part of the Union, and there is no telling what amount of money it will cost the Government.

Mr. COOPER. If the amendment is to pass, I think it ought to be amended.

The PRESIDENT. It is not susceptible of amendment. It is an amendment to the amendment of the House.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would suggest, then, in order to obviate the difficulty, and to make it reasonable, to insert in my amendment, after the words "laborers that have been employed," the words, "and who have been retained, but kept out of employment."

Mr. COOPER. That is the amendment which I was about to suggest.

Mr. HALE. I am willing to have it in any way, so that we may get a vote.

Mr. SHIELDS. Let the language of the amendment be, "laborers who have been employed and detained here waiting for employment."

Mr. WELLER. I know a great many people of that sort.

The PRESIDENT. The amendment can be so amended by unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. I want to say a word in answer to the Senator from California. I think he has taken a mistaken view of this question. Congress frequently suspend work from Thursday to Monday, or from Friday to Monday. I want to know whether those who are waiting here, draw for Saturday and Sunday; because if they do, there is a precedent. Further, I have been informed that there are some members here, who sometimes suspend labor with a view to go home, and stay some two or three weeks. I have actually heard it intimated that I have done that very thing. [Laughter.] I want to know whether the Secretary, when he makes up the pay roll, deducts the per diem for that time. I have heard it said further, and I think it is a fact, that members of Congress who receive eight dollars a day, do, in addition to that, vote themselves a vast amount of books, which cost something like $1,000. I think it has been done at this session for new members. And what do we do here besides? At the end of every session we vote an additional compensation to laborers who have been here—not waiting pay—to our messengers, clerks, pages, and everybody else. We give them a donation of some $250 or $500, and nobody's constitutional stomach is disturbed; but when we come to the mere laboring man, who gets but little, and that little is exhausted, constitutional objections rise up, like Roderick Dhu's men, from every bush, and coppice, and hill, so thick that it is almost impossible for a man to make his way through; and people are wonderfully in want of information. I wonder why gentlemen do not want information when some other case comes up than that of the day laborer. Look at the Navy Register of men, "waiting orders," and see men getting $2,500 and $3,000 a year, who have been "waiting orders" almost ever since they came out of their cradles. There are no constitutional scruples in regard to that; there is no bad precedent there; but is a wonderful bad precedent to propose to pay the day laborer while he has been "waiting orders."

Mr. President, let us have the vote. I am sorry that I have had to make this speech. I will admit any modification of the amendment, with the sense of the Senate; but just let us have a fair vote, and do something like justice to men who came here, who left their homes, and who have been living on what little they earned, and then living on that "hope deferred" which "maketh the heart sick" and the body faint. I trust we will do justice to them.

The PRESIDENT. Does the Senator propose to modify his amendment?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir; any way Mr. COOPER says. [Laughter.]

By unanimous consent, the amendment was modified by adding the following:

"Provided, That they shall not be entitled to such pay unless they remained unemployed at the seat of Government, awaiting the appropriation."

Mr. RUSK. We can very frequently express great sympathy for the suffering of individuals, and in our conduct, so far from carrying out these sympathies, by a particular process defeat the very end which we seem to have in view. I regard it, that this amendment will have precisely that effect. Here are a number of laborers that have been thrown out of employment. That fact is known. The contracts under which they came here are not known. We are not in a condition, from want of information, to do them justice at all. Suppose that we adopt this amendment, and it goes to the House, does anybody suppose that it will not be discussed there, and that it will not delay the passage of the joint resolution? Now, sir, whether or not it is better for these men, who are idle and wanting work, and who cannot go on from the want of this appropriation, which has been delayed week after week—many of whom are without credit in this city; brought here by the Government, and have been suspended in their work—would it not be better for them if this resolution passed, without this embarrassment, which will create discussion, and delay the passage of the resolution? There will be a discussion on it, beyond all doubt, in the House of Representatives. The passage of the bill will, perhaps, be delayed two or three weeks longer by it. Should we keep them in that state of starvation, under the delusive hope that they are to get some extra pay? If this is a claim, (and I apprehend it is a good claim against the Government of the United States—they have been brought here by the Government, and have been thrown out of employment by it,) it can be put in another bill, and not embarrass this.

Mr. HALE. I want to say that I have no purpose of embarrassing this resolution by offering this amendment. I gave early information that I would offer it but upon the suggestion of some of the friends of the resolution that it would embarrass it in the other House; I refrained, and did not offer it; and it was not until after another amendment was agreed to by the vote of my friend from Texas, who has read me so kind a lecture, which created the necessity of the bill going back to the House, that I offered this amendment. Now, sir, if some gentleman who voted for that amendment will move to reconsider it, I will be willing to withdraw this, and put it forward in a separate measure. If any suggestion is made to the effect that the amendment will be reconsidered, I will withdraw this.

Mr. RUSK. I cannot, for my life, see that the amendment which has been adopted in relation to preventing gentlemen making contracts upon suppositions of appropriations hereafter to be made, can meet the slightest objection in the House. I understand the only objection which was made here to it was, that it created the necessity of sending it back to the House; but I am utterly mistaken if the amendment which is now under consideration would not create discussion there. I understand from members of the House who ought to know all about it, that the amendment which we have adopted will not create any discussion there, and that it is likely this one will.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I demur to arguing about the amendment which has been adopted. I think it is decidedly a salutary one, and I wish to hold on to it. More than that; I wish to defend the people's Representatives from the imputation which my friend from Texas makes upon them. If the Senate, with its aristocratic feature, its six years, and everything else, does an act of justice to the working men, I take it that the more immediate Representatives of the people of this country will not dare to withhold their consent. I have no fears of that sort. This amendment will pass there much more easily than it will pass this body. I hope we shall adopt it. "The laborer is worthy of his hire."

Mr. SEWARD. I think that the honorable Senator from Arkansas, who, I believe, favors this amendment, and who complained of the interested influence which is brought to bear upon Congress by the gathering of these laborers, would find that a stronger influence would be created against the passage of this resolution, if this amendment should be agreed to. It would have as great a tendency to make a delay in its passage as any that was ever found to delay a bill before Congress; for these laborers, with all their friends, would have the authority of the Senate for the position that they ought to be paid until the bill passes, if it should be in August or September, just as much as if they worked all the time.

Mr. SHIELDS. I merely wish to make a short reply to the honorable Senator from Texas, who seemed to intimate that this amendment was intended, perhaps, to defeat the measure. Certainly I have no such intention as that. On the contrary, I look upon this as the most equitable provision in the whole resolution, and certainly I think it ought to meet with the strongest support in the House of Representatives; and I will state why in a few minutes. As I understand it, these men were brought here by public advertisement. They were promised uninterrupted employment. They came here. When the appropriation was exhausted they expected to be employed, and they were kept here from day to day, as I understand it, by the agents of the Government who had the control of this work. That is my understanding; that these agents expected that an appropriation would be made immediately for this purpose; they did not want to break up the arrangements they had made, and they kept these laborers here from day to day. It is not the fault of the agents, nor of these men, but it is the delay of Congress. Now, the only question in a case of this kind is, whether it is just and equitable to allow these men daily wages for the time they were thus detained by officers of the Government for the purpose of being employed upon this work?

It is said this amendment will defeat the resolution, as it will have to go to the other House. I should not have offered or insisted upon this amendment if a previous amendment had not been made. But it goes to the House now, and if they refuse to pass this amendment and it comes back to us, and gentlemen are anxious to pass the resolution, we can recede from it. But let it all go together if it is just. If this is not just, vote against it at once. If these men are not entitled to pay for the time they have been kept here by the agents of the Government, waiting, as I have already said, and expecting that every day an appropriation would be made, then reject it; but if it is just that they should be paid, then let all go to the House together, and let us see how the House will act upon it. My impression is, that this will be the strongest provision in the resolution when it goes back to the House.

Mr. RUSK. In the few remarks which I had the honor to submit to the Senate, I cast no imputations upon the motives of any one. I am not in the habit of casting imputations upon any one's motives. I attempted to address myself to the effect of the provision. Nor did I make any charges against the representatives of the people of the United States.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. If my friend understood me as making any assertion of that sort, he misunderstood me very much. I desired simply to say that I had not the least doubt that any amendment of this sort which we might adopt would be readily adopted by the other House. I made no sort of implication against the Senator's intentions.

Mr. RUSK. I am glad to receive the information, though I would not consider it a very high compliment to pay to the House of Representatives to say that they will do nothing but register the Senate's decrees. I have not the least objection to paying these laborers what is equitable and right. I will vote to pay them whenever a proposition is presented of a proper character. I will be one of the first to vote what I conceive to be equitable. Beyond that I will not go. I will go that far whether there is one laborer or a thousand to be affected by it. This amendment as it has been modified, is in these words:

"That the laborers employed upon the Capitol shall be entitled to and receive pay during the time for which the work was suspended, according to the regular prices at which they were originally engaged: Provided, That they shall not be entitled to such pay unless they remained unemployed at the seat of Government, and waiting the appropriation."

Now, what sort of an amendment is that?

Mr. BROADHEAD. It is all right.

Mr. RUSK. Some gentleman says it is all right. Let us see whether it is or not. Suppose the case of a man with a family, who was engaged on this work at two dollars a day, but who has been out of employment: That man, if he properly regarded his family, would go and work at a quarter of a dollar a day if he could not get more, in order to endeavor to support his family; and yet the fact that he did get employment at a quarter of a dollar or half a dollar a day, would exclude him from the benefits of your justice. It is only the idle man who will not employ himself, but who goes to grog shops and walks about the streets, who is to get the benefit of this justice. Will not the House of Representatives be likely to discuss a proposition of that sort? The objection that I have to it is, in the first place, that it embarrasses this resolution, and in the next place that it is not digested in such a form that I can vote for it. If there is any distinction to be made, I would prefer to pay the man who showed his industry by working for small wages when he could not get larger, rather than reward one who would not work at all.

Mr. CASS. It seems to me that this is a peculiar case, and it demands peculiar action. There is a great number of laborers who have been invited here to aid in a great public work for which an appropriation was made. They have been collected in this District, where there is very little demand for labor, and being thrown out of employment, they become necessarily destitute of the means of support. This is not like a large city, such as Philadelphia or New York, where labor is constantly in demand; but being thrown out of employment here, they have no means of livelihood. We have been in session for over four months. The appropriation made for this object has long since been exhausted. We have suffered time to pass on without making another appropriation, and I feel myself responsible for it to some extent. Some two months since, or more, some of these very men came to me, and I told them that I expected we would make an appropriation immediately. I encouraged them to remain, inasmuch as an appropriation would certainly be made in a few days. But I have been deceived; the measure has been delayed until the session is half over, without any good reason under heaven why we have not made the appropriation. Under these circumstances I am willing to pay a just and reasonable compensation to these men. I think an honest, and just, and reasonable man would do it in his own case. If he had collected together a large number of laborers, and they had been thrown out of employment in consequence of pure neglect on his part, I think he would do so. I think the amendment is sufficiently guarded. At first I thought it provided for all the laborers, but it only provides for those who have been unemployed, and who have been thrown out of employment by the action of the Government, and had no means of subsistence. I am willing to go that far; but certainly men who have been employed elsewhere in the mean time, ought not to be paid by the Government.

Mr. SHIELDS. I merely wish to state that, in 1839, there was a precisely similar provision made for the laborers on the Treasury Building. It is in these words:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the commissioners appointed by the President of the United States to superintend the prosecution of the work on the construction of the new Treasury Building, be and they are hereby authorized to examine the claims of the workmen to indemnity for the loss of their time during the suspension of the work upon said building by order of the President of the United States, pending the question before Congress on the bill reported by the Committee on Public Buildings, providing for the removal of the walls of the Treasury Building, and the erection of a fire-proof building for the Post Office Department, and that said commissioners allow to such of said workmen respectively as were suspended from labor during the pending of said appropriation bill, with the encouragement and under an authorized assurance that, upon the decision thereof, their labor would again be required by the Government, and who immediately had no opportunity of obtaining employment in the city of Washington, such reasonable indemnity for the loss of wages for labor during the suspension of the work, as, under the circumstances of their respective cases, justice and equity may require; not exceeding, however, in any case, the average rate of the earnings of said workmen in the employment of the Government for a like preceding period of time."

Mr. RUSK. If the Senator will put the amendment in that form, I shall vote for it.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish to offer it in that shape.

Mr. RUSK. It is not in that form now.

The PRESIDENT. With the consent of the Senate, the amendment before offered can be withdrawn, and this substituted in its place.

There being no objection, the amendment was so modified.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is a precedent which, like the gentleman from Texas, I am willing to follow. I am not willing that these laborers should suffer from any violation of a contract on the part of the Government, or on the part of the agents of the Government, that has been legitimately entered into with them. Not at all. They are entitled to their damages for a violation of that contract, as much so as if it were made with me; and I am for paying them under such circumstances. But I have objected from the beginning that, under what I think a sympathy misplaced upon the occasion, Senators get up here and offer an amendment not at all matured in any of its bearings, and we are called upon to adopt it without knowing what we are voting for. Now, if you will not embarrass this resolution, introduce a proposition according to the precedent, or even appoint a committee of Congress, if you choose to investigate it in that way; or name any set of individuals of respectable standing in the city, to make the investigation, and I will pay these laborers every cent to which they are entitled most cheerfully. But I think it is ill-timed and ill-placed to attempt to embarrass this resolution in this way, in this hasty manner, and it ought not to be done.

Mr. GWIN. The law of 1839, which has been read, was a separate law, providing for the payment of laborers who had been employed on the Treasury Building. Why incur this resolution with such a proposition? I am opposed to putting it into it; I think it will jeopardize the resolution.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT. The amendment will have to undergo great modification. The resolution in the book which has been read, and which has been offered, relates to another matter, and is not applicable to this.

Mr. SHIELDS. It will only be necessary to change a very few words.

Mr. HUNTER. I would like to suggest to the gentlemen who are pressing this amendment, that this is probably a new principle which they are introducing. The work was stopped in the winter, and those workmen who have been employed at day labor remained in the city under the hope of being again employed in the spring. We did not make an appropriation so soon in the spring as I think we ought to have done, and I desired we should do; but the question arises whether we ought to pay them for the whole of the time they have been waiting and took the chances like everybody else? If we adopt this principle, will it not apply to every other public work which is suspended? Will we not then have to pay the workmen who may say they have been waiting until an appropriation shall have been made? This is a very important principle which we are establishing. I hope it will not be ingrafted in this resolution. I trust gentlemen will not embarrass this measure by forcing us to vote on this amendment. If they want to have this carried through, let them bring it forward in a separate measure, where the merits of the claim can be examined and separately passed upon, and let this bill go as it now stands. I hope gentlemen will not press the amendment, but will withdraw it, and allow us to pass the original measure.

Mr. BORLAND. There seems to be great objection to adopting the amendment to pay these day laborers for work which they have not actually done. Now, look at the architect—look at the superintendent, getting their $2,000 or $3,000 a year, whether they are employed or not. You do not propose to stop their pay because they have not been employed. You do not propose to stop the $3,000 or $5,000 per annum which the architect gets, or the $2,000 which one superintendent gets, or the $1,000 which another superintendent gets. Gentlemen do not look at that. They do not propose to cut off their pay because they have no employment, and have been lounging about as idly as the day laborers. I cannot understand how it is that gentlemen find such difficulties in the way of paying a dollar a day to the laborers who have, without any fault of their own, been kept here waiting, feeding on expectation, from day to day. I admit that it is very unsubstantial food, and not enough to support them and their wives and children. The superintendents of this work get their pay per annum. We are giving them from $2,000 to $3,000 a year, whether they work or not, and there is no difficulty in the way of that.

While I am up, I would answer the inquiry made by the honorable Senator from Kentucky a while ago, with regard to the amount of information I have on the subject of these contracts. He asks me where the contracts are? Here they are. Upon the resolution introduced by me, the President has sent in what purports to be copies of all the contracts which have been entered into. I have looked through them, and I see not one word on the subject of laborers; and I take it for granted, therefore, that they are employed by the day. There are contracts covering every sort of work—stone, sand, lime—everything but labor. There is no contract in regard to labor. I take it for granted, therefore, that the officer of the Government employed the laborers by the day.

Mr. BADGER. My friend from Illinois having moved this amendment suddenly, without making the verbal alterations necessary to make it applicable to the present case, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that it may be modified by striking out the inapplicable words, and inserting words applicable to the present case; so as to make it read, instead of "the commissioners appointed," &c., "that the architect appointed by the President of the United States to superintend the prosecution of the additions to the Capitol, be authorized," &c.; and then, instead of "during the suspension of the work upon said building by order of the President of the United States," insert "during the suspension of the work upon said building for want of an appropriation;" and put in the word "architect," in place of "commissioners," where it again occurs; so that the amendment shall read:

"That the architect appointed by the President of the United States to superintend the prosecution of the work in the construction of the additions to the Capitol, be, and he is hereby, authorized to examine the claims of the workmen to indemnity for the loss of their time during the suspension of the work upon said building for want of an appropriation; and that the said architect allow to such of said workmen respectively as were suspended from labor during the pendency of said appropriation bill, with the encouragement and under the authorized assurance, that upon the decision thereof their labor would again be required by the Government, and who immediately had no opportunity of obtaining employment in the city of Washington, such reasonable indemnity for the loss of their wages for labor during the suspension of the work, as under the circumstances of their respective cases justice and equity may require; not exceeding, however, in any case, the average rate of the earnings of said workmen in the employment of the Government for a like preceding period of time."

There being no objection, the amendment was so modified.

Mr. BADGER. I think another verbal alteration is required in the amendment—to substitute for the words "during the suspension of the work," the words "from the suspension of the work to the making of the appropriation."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that is exactly right; but I put it to the friends of the workmen, whether it would not be better to pass this amendment as a separate and independent measure, rather than, by sending it to the House of Representatives, delay the passage of the original resolution?

Mr. GWIN. I am willing to vote for this amendment as a separate measure; but I am not willing to put it in this resolution to embarrass it.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. As one of the friends of the workmen, I say let this be a part of this resolution. It is legitimate to the subject. This is a resolution to continue the work upon the two wings of the Capitol. These workmen have been engaged upon that, and therefore this amendment is appropriate to the resolution.

Mr. RUSK. I regard that as a very important compromise, which was made with the laborers upon the Treasury Building in 1839; and, as the order of the day is the finality of compromises, I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. I merely want to inquire how often a Senator has the right to speak upon the same day upon the same subject?

The PRESIDENT. Only twice, if it is objected to.

Mr. BADGER. I wish to suggest another verbal amendment in this amendment, which, it appears to me, may be necessary. There is in it a clause providing for the payment of these laborers "during the pendency of said appropriation bill, upon the encouragement and under an authorized assurance that, on the decision thereof, their labor would again be required," &c. I think perhaps it would be better to strike out the words, "under an authorized assurance."

The PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent to make that change.

Mr. GWIN and others objected.

Mr. BADGER. Then it will do well enough as it is.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I must express my extreme regret that my friend from California will not allow the Senator from North Carolina, who has come to the side of the workmen on this occasion, to modify the amendment in the mode he has proposed.

The PRESIDENT. The objection did not come alone from the Senator from California; other Senators objected.

The question being taken, by yeas and nays, on the amendment offered by Mr. SHIELDS to the amendment of the House of Representatives, resulted—yeas 29, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Badger, Borland, Brodhead, Brooke, Cass, Chase, Cooper, Davis, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Felch, Fish, Geyer, Hale, Mangum, Miller, Norris, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Stockton, Sumner, Underwood, Upham, Wade, Walker, and Weller—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Berrien, Bradbury, Dawson, Downs, Gwin, Hamlin, Hunter, King, Mallory, Morton, Pratt, Sebastian, Smith, and Spruance—15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS. We have already adopted a proviso prohibiting officers of the Government from making contracts beyond the actual appropriations. I think it would be proper to add some penalty for a violation of that provision, and therefore I move to amend, by inserting after the proviso that we have adopted, the following:

"And that if any person or persons shall violate the provisions of this proviso, he or they shall be liable to indictment in any court having jurisdiction of criminal offenses; and on conviction, shall be removed from office, and confined in the penitentiary for a term not exceeding five years."

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to learn from my friend, whether that would not subject the Senate, who have already voted for the amendment just adopted, to indictment. It strikes me that it might. We adopt a provision that the Departments or the President shall not make a contract beyond the amount of appropriation. Now, we have just voted large sums to a certain class, who have labored—who have remained here without any appropriations—and hence we have supposed that a debt has been incurred by these officers, which the very provision we have adopted to-day provides they shall not have the power to create. Most clearly, therefore, I think Senators themselves may thus be subjected to indictment under this provision.

Mr. ADAMS. I will answer the Senator. The gentleman did not notice the proviso offered by the Senator from Arkansas, and which has been adopted by the Senate, or he would have perceived that there was no penalty affixed to its violation. If I understand the proviso, it prohibits only persons making contracts in behalf of the Government, to an amount not exceeding the appropriations actually made. But the proviso affixed no penalty to its violation. The amendment which I offer proposes to fix a penalty, not to past, but to future offenses. Congress cannot violate the law. How does the Senator say that they can? Congress is the law-making power. If it modifies the law, its modification becomes the law. Congress cannot violate the law. It is the authority—the legislative body—to make the laws.

What use is there in adopting a provision that contracts shall not be made beyond the amount of the appropriations, if you do not affix a penalty to a violation of the provision? As has been suggested, a law was passed before prohibiting any such thing; but there was no penalty affixed to it; hence we see that it has been done, notwithstanding the law. Now, my amendment is only to affix a penalty to a violation of the law.

Mr. BORLAND. I should like to have the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Borland, Brodhead, Brooke, Dodge of Iowa, Hamlin, King, Mallory, Sebastian, Walker, and Weller—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Berrien, Bradbury, Cooper, Davis, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Fish, Geyer, Hale, Hunter, Mangum, Miller, Morton, Norris, Pratt, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Smith, Spruance, Stockton, Underwood, Upham, and Wade—28.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on concurring with the amendment of the House of Representatives as amended.

Mr. HALE. Is the resolution now in committee or in the Senate?

The PRESIDENT. Neither. The question before the Senate simply is on adopting the amendment of the House of Representatives as it has been amended. The Senate passed the resolution originally. It was sent to the House, there amended, and returned to the Senate with an amendment. The question now is on concurring with the amendment as amended.

Mr. HALE. I had supposed that we were considering the resolution as in Committee of the Whole, and that it was now in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT. The question is simply on the amendment of the House of Representatives as amended; and that does not go through the stages of a bill.

Mr. HALE. Is it in order to move to amend the amendment as amended?

The PRESIDENT. It is in order to add to it.

Mr. HALE. Is it in order to move to strike out?

The PRESIDENT. It is in order to move to strike out any portion which has not been inserted by the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I want to put one other question to the President. Is it in order to move to concur in the amendment as amended, with an exception?

The PRESIDENT. No, sir.

Mr. BADGER. I suppose the question comes up on these various amendments which have been agreed to, whether the Senate will concur in them?

The PRESIDENT. That is the question.

Mr. BADGER. Upon that point I wish to say a word. I wish to suggest to gentlemen who are in favor of the appropriation, that we should not concur in the amendments which have been made; but that we should permit the resolution to pass without incurring it.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator will not get at his object by not concurring; for if the amendments are not concurred in, the amendment of the House of Representatives will be rejected.

Mr. HALE. The Senator can move to reconsider.

Mr. BADGER. I did not vote in favor of it, therefore I cannot make the motion. But I will let it go.

Mr. BORLAND. I wish to know if the vote we are about to take now is on adopting the amendment as it comes to us from the House?—whether it is the final vote?

The PRESIDENT. It is the final vote; but it is on the amendment of the House of Representatives as it has been amended.

The amendment of the House of Representatives as amended was concurred in.

PRIVATE BILLS.

On the motion of Mr. RUSK, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Anna Norton and Lewis Foskit. It was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to pay to Anna Norton and Lewis Foskit, the only heirs of Zephaniah Ross, a revolutionary soldier, the amount of pension which would have been paid to said Ross had his pension been continued to him from March 4th, 1822, to January 1st, 1828.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the relief of Francis E. Baden was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Francis E. Baden upon the pension roll, and pay him the compensation of a major in the United States Army for five years from January 1st, 1851.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On the motion of Mr. HAMLIN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned until Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 9, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. MACE. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. DANIEL. I hope the gentleman will yield, in order to enable me to offer the usual resolution to close debate upon the bill for the relief of the legal representatives of General James C. Watson, late of the State of Georgia.

Mr. MACE. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. DANIEL. I then move the following resolution:

Resolved, That all debate in Committee of the Whole House, upon House bill No. 136, for the relief of the legal representatives of General James C. Watson, late of the State of Georgia, shall cease in thirty minutes after it shall next resume the consideration of the same; and, if the committee shall not sooner come to a conclusion, it shall then proceed to vote upon such amendments as are pending, or may be offered, and report the bill to the House, with such amendments as it may have agreed to.

Several Voices. "One hour."

Mr. DANIEL. Well, I will put it one hour.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. I rise to what ought to be a privileged question. I do not know whether it is or not. Upon the first day on which this bill came before the committee, I obtained the floor, and, after speaking about twenty minutes, I gave way for a motion that the committee rise. When the bill again came up in committee, I was confined to my bed by sickness, from which I have not yet entirely recovered. But I lost my right to the floor. Now, I should feel under very special obligations to the House if they would postpone the time for closing this debate long enough to give me an opportunity to occupy the remainder of my hour. I do not know whether it is a privileged question or not.

Mr. DANIEL. I think the gentleman will have ample time within an hour if he can get the floor, and as far as I am concerned, I hope he will get it.

Mr. HOWE. I understand the floor has been taken for one hour in committee, by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. BARTLETT.]

Mr. DANIEL. Well, I suppose we can close debate at any time.

The question was then taken, and upon a division of the House there were—ayes 71, noes 32; no quorum voting.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask for tellers.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. I would suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina, that if he will make the time two hours, I presume there will be no opposition to the resolution.

Mr. DANIEL. I have very little choice in the matter. The bill has already been discussed two days, and I think it is all that will do any good. If gentlemen wish it, however, I will make the time two hours.

The question was then put on the resolution as modified, and it was adopted.

The question then recurred upon the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. MACE], to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. LANE. It will be recollected by the House that Monday after the next is the day set aside for the consideration of territorial bills. I hold now in my hand three bills which I desire to present and have referred.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can present them by unanimous consent.

There was no objection, and the following bills were introduced, read a first and second time by their titles, and severally referred as indicated below:

A bill making appropriations for the improvement of Yam Hall river, in the Territory of Oregon. Referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals;

A bill making appropriations for the completion of light-houses, and the erection of a custom-house and a warehouse in the Territory of Oregon. Referred to the Committee on Commerce; and

A bill to amend an act entitled "An act to settle and adjust the expenses of the people of Oregon, in defending themselves from the attacks and hostilities of the Cayuse Indians in the years 1847 and 1848." Referred to the Committee on the Territories.

PRINTERS' UNION.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit a resolution adopted by the Printers' Union of Philadelphia, approving of the establishment of a public printing office, and urging the passage of the bill already introduced for that purpose. As the subject of printing may occupy the attention of this House and the country soon, an expression of opinion upon the subject, coming as it does from a numerous and most important branch of the arts, and being one of the most respectable and intelligent of the industrious classes, should be entitled to the respectful consideration of this House.

Mr. MEACHAM. I object.

Mr. FLORENCE. I hope at least the resolution may be read for information.

Mr. MEACHAM. I object.

Mr. MACE. I now insist on my motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following joint resolution, of which previous notice had been given:

Joint Resolution in regard to the Public Printing.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the second section of the joint resolution of 1846, "directing the manner of procuring the printing for the two Houses of Congress," shall not be so construed as to allow the joint committee of the two Houses to discharge one contractor and employ another; but in all cases where the committee shall deem that there has been unnecessary delay or neglect, the facts shall be reported to Congress, and the committee shall be governed by its direction.

Objection was made to its introduction.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I wish to suggest that there is business upon the Speaker's table, which the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means is very anxious to get at. Objection has been made to its being taken up out of its order. Now, I propose that we consume the morning hour upon the bill in reference to discipline in the Navy, which has been up for several mornings past. I think we can dispose of it during the morning hour, then proceed to take up and refer the bills upon the Speaker's table, and then go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. I hope the House will adopt that course.

Mr. DANIEL. I object.

Mr. STANTON. I do not ask to submit a motion to go to the business upon the Speaker's table, but to spend the morning hour upon the naval bill, so that we might then get at the business upon the Speaker's table. We can dispose of it during the morning hour. That bill has been under discussion for several days in the morning hour.

Mr. DANIEL. We can hardly expect to dispose of that bill during the morning hour, and we have devoted so little time to private business during this session of Congress, that I trust that we shall now proceed to that business.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STANTON] is objected to.

Mr. SIBLEY. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MACE] has given way to allow me to ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce certain resolutions from the Legislative Assembly of Minnesota.

Mr. DANIEL. I feel bound to object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the memorial cannot be introduced.

Mr. SCUDDER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to introduce resolutions from the Legislature of Massachusetts.

Mr. MACE. I object.

Mr. SACKETT. I wish to inquire whether it is in order to move to receive reports from committees for one hour?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order during the pendency of the proposition now before the House. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MACE] insists upon having his question put to the House.

Mr. FLORENCE. I arise to a privileged question, or I beg to ask the Speaker whether it is not a privileged question? When I had the honor to ask the unanimous consent of the House to present a resolution from the Printers' Union of Philadelphia, I understood the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MEACHAM] to object to its introduction because I had, on some previous occasion, objected to the introduction of a resolution by him. Is that a privileged question? I desire to ask the gentleman whether he made the objection for that reason?

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. There is no privileged question involved in that.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. FLORENCE, (interrupting.) I wish the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MEACHAM] to withdraw his objection to the introduction of the resolution, and that it be read.

The following is the resolution Mr. F. desired to present, viz:

Resolved, That we recommend the immediate passage of the bill now before Congress, introduced by Mr. Doty, for the establishment of a public printing office, believing it to be the commencement of that progressive reform, which will eventually secure to the toiling millions their true position in society, and a fair compensation for labor in every useful occupation.

M. C. BROWN, President.

JAMES W. WOLF, Secretary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STANTON] was recognized by the Chair, as upon the floor.

Mr. STANTON. The question of order I desire to make is this: that the bill, which was discussed yesterday morning by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOCKOCH], and the morning previous, by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART], and another gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON], was admitted into the House by unanimous consent of the House, and is therefore the first thing in order this morning, as the unfinished business during the morning hour of yesterday, and I insist that it has precedence.

The SPEAKER. Even if the gentleman's proposition were true, it could not affect the motion made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. MACE.] He regularly obtained the floor, and has made a motion which is a privileged one.

Mr. STANTON. I hope I may be allowed to state to the House that last week we went through the Private Calendar, and there is but little to do. We can properly spend the morning hour in disposing of this naval bill, and it ought to be disposed of.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to correct the gentleman. There is a great deal upon the Calendar of a litigated nature.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. MACE, and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, (Mr. STUART in the chair.)

GENERAL JAMES C. WATSON.

The CHAIRMAN. The first business in order before the committee is House bill No. 136, for the relief of the legal representatives of General James C. Watson, late of the State of Georgia; and upon that bill, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. BARTLETT] has the floor.

Mr. BARTLETT. Being a new and inexperienced member of this body, I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. I desire to know, sir, from the volume of your experience, whether the same rule obtains, in relation to the latitude of debate, in the Committee of the Whole House, that, by custom, obtains in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Vermont, that by the rules of the House, discussion in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, is confined to the bill under consideration.

Mr. BARTLETT, (resuming.) I regret that this is so, for this reason: that since the opening of the present Congress, on different occasions, allusion has been made to myself, and never expecting, in the course of time, to be able to obtain possession of the floor again, I should be willing to record the sentiments which I feel, and should be happy to express, in reply to the allusions to myself, made by the honorable gentleman from Florida, [Mr. CABELL], who at an early period of this session, when he opened the political ball, alluded to my humble self—a Representative from the far North, among the cold regions of Vermont, where gentlemen are not easily excited, slow to anger, but when really aroused and thoroughly warmed, retain the heat for a long period of time. But being reminded by the Chair that I am under obligation by the rules of the House to confine myself strictly to the question under debate, I shall confine myself to the more substantial things of earth, and discuss the merits of this bill, so far as I am able, now called up for consideration.

Mr. CABELL. I ask the gentleman to permit me to say a single word. The gentleman speaks of my having alluded to him in a former debate. I will say that the only allusion made, was the reading from a newspaper a list of names of gentlemen who composed the central Democratic committee. It seems to me that it was perfectly fair and legitimate. That is the only allusion I have ever made to any of them.

Mr. BARTLETT. I would have been contented to give a silent vote against this bill, had it not been for the positive and emphatic declaration of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. DANIEL], who reported it, that if this bill had not involved the title to slave property, there would have been no opposition to its passage; accompanied with the declaration on his part, that, inasmuch as the bill involved the consideration of slave property, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SACKETT] pricked up his ears, and started in a stampede. The gentleman from New York can answer for himself; and I wish the members of this House to distinctly understand that I do not belong to that class of cowards who ever run. I never dodge. Being constrained, from my convictions of duty, and from what I believe to be right, to vote against this bill, I choose to state the reasons which influence my judgment and control my mind in relation to the merits of this bill, rather than leave them to the tender mercies of the advocates of this bill. The invitation of the honorable gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART], now in the chair, addressed to Northern men, and to Southern men, to discuss the subject-matter involved in this bill in the same spirit and in the same manner in which they would discuss any other matter; accompanied with the prophetic declaration, that the discussion of this subject in the same spirit, will do more than all other causes combined to allay irritation, has had some influence upon my mind, in calling me from that silent and still position which I have hitherto occupied as a member upon this floor.

Mr. Chairman, the word agitation, in the popular sense which it has obtained at the present day, is a word obnoxious to me. And I commend the good taste, and the good judgment of the honorable gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART], now in the chair, for substituting in lieu thereof, the word irritation.

Mr. Chairman, ever since I arrived at my majority, and until the present moment, I have been an ardent and devoted member of the Democratic party of the United States. I have not belonged to "young America," neither have I belonged to "old America." Sir, I belong to the United States of America, without distinction of party. Yes, sir, to the United States, as they now exist by virtue of the solemn compact between the States and the Federal Union.

Sir, the first President of the United States for whom I ever voted, was Andrew Jackson; and I have voted for every Democratic nominee since, General LEWIS CASS included. In 1848, I had something to do with his nomination; but, since I have taken my seat as a member of this Congress, I have learned, to my chagrin and to my deep mortification, that I am not entitled, even by membership with the Democratic party, to meet in Democratic caucus with my friends. If I am not entitled by membership—if I am not entitled by my devotion, and my desire to promote the interests of the Democratic party, to membership in the party, I am willing, at any time, to enter into the proof whether or not I am entitled to my discharge, with a certificate of good conduct; but, sir, not with a view of entering into the service of any other party. No, sir. If I cannot serve with the Democratic party, I wish the country to understand distinctly that I serve nowhere.

But, one word on this subject of irritation. If there be any evil in the history of this Government that I have more reason to deplore than another, it is the discussion of the subject of slavery in the Congress of the United States. Sir, I am willing to abide by the Constitution and its compromises, and the just construction of that instrument, together with all laws that are passed pursuant to that sacred instrument. But, in the spirit of kindness, in the best of feeling, in the kindest motives of the human heart, let me say to the country and this nation—inasmuch, sir, as I have a desire to allay the spirit of irritation—let me say to all men, irrespective of all party considerations, that the proper way to allay irritation is for gentlemen to cease to apply their irritants. When the representatives and members of this Confederacy shall learn not to arraign and impugn the motives of men; when they shall learn not to arraign and impugn their integrity, their patriotism, their democracy, and their love of the Union, and stigmatize them as traitors, apostates, and dogs, for the reason that, from birth, education, religious habits, and from all their associations, from their youth up, entertain sentiments and feelings in relation to a peculiar and delicate institution not in accordance with their views, then, sir, irritation will cease; and, what is far better, counter irritation will also cease!

Mr. Chairman, it becomes us who represent the people, as wise and sworn legislators, to remember that there is in man a spirit of resistance; I say it emphatically, sir, a spirit of resistance. It is in the very nature of man; it is interwoven in his mental constitution; and God has endowed him with the physical elements of manifesting this innate disposition within him, and he will do so to the resisting and overcoming that power which annoys, oppresses, and afflicts him. I, sir, am not insensible to the fact that I stand in the presence of the most august, awful, dignified, and orderly Representatives of the most mighty and powerful Government among the nations, and I feel a degree of timidity and embarrassment creeping over me when I reflect that I am in this great, august, and awful presence; but I think the honorable Speaker of this House, for whom I had the pleasure of voting, would have but very little hammering to do—very little of the material rapping as contradistinguished from the spiritual—to keep this House in order, if every member was as obedient to the rules of this House as myself.

Sir, when I came to Congress, I was disposed to look upon the Representatives of the Southern portion of this Confederacy as men who had no sympathy in common with the North in relation to national affairs. I have been a quiet, and, I hope, a patriotic observer of the events which have here transpired, and I do not see but what the Southern members of this Confederacy are as much interested in, and appear to take as active and interested part in all the deliberations of this body, which concern the interests of this nation, as the members from the North, and seem to identify themselves with the interests and prosperity of this great nation. They seem to act in complimentary harmony with the Constitution and the laws which have been made in accordance with the provisions of that Constitution; and, therefore, I have come to the conclusion, in my own mind, that the Representatives in this body, without respect to party, to section, or to location, are all friends of the Union.

Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that I am not at liberty to explain my position. I regret it exceedingly, because I represent a portion of the people of the North, and as a Democrat, and a man who has devoted more time than any man in the north of Vermont to promote the interests and welfare of the Democratic party, justice to myself and my constituents demands that I should have an opportunity to express my views and reflect their will upon the subjects that interest the country. Sir, at this late period, to have it spread before the members of the Democratic party in this body in scurrilous, mean, contemptible sheets, that I am not entitled to membership in the Democratic party, makes me wish the rules of the House would permit me to pour out the sentiments and feelings of my heart upon these calumniators, who so richly deserve it. [Laughter, and cries of "Good!" "Pour it out!"]

Mr. POLK. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman be permitted to pour it out.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether these suggestions of the gentlemen about me are made in the spirit of kindness or ill will.

Mr. POLK. Out of kindness.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask, Mr. Chairman, no suspension of the rules. I ask for nothing which I have not a right to demand, and what I have a right to demand I will stand up to. I know, sir, that there is a difference of feeling, and a difference of sentiment prevailing in different portions of this Union in relation to a certain institution, and there is one gentleman upon the floor of this House—I look to the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, and if by the rules of this House I am permitted to speak his name, I allude to the honorable Mr. BRECKINRIDGE—who, if I understood the temper and the tenor of his speech, delivered in this House some time ago, said, that he did not require that Northern men should indorse and approve of the compromise measures of the last Congress.

Mr. Chairman, with these preliminary observations, I now proceed to the investigation of the bill called up for consideration, and I am not insensible to the fact that I have no influence, nor any consideration in this body, by which I can seriously endanger the passage of the bill. I know that very well. But, sir, I wish to record, and have recorded, the reasons which influence my opposition to this bill.

Before I proceed to the discussion of the merits of the bill, I wish to bring before the committee the facts of the case. I understand that, in 1836, General Jesup, the commander of the military forces of the United States engaged in Florida in the Seminole war, entered into a written stipulation and agreement with the Creek nation, that, in consideration that that nation would raise some six hundred to one thousand valiant fighting men to aid and assist the United States in their war against the Seminoles, they should receive the pay and emolument of the regular soldiers of the United States, together with such plunder as they should capture, belonging to the Seminoles. I learn, in the prosecution of that war, that a certain number of negroes were captured, and when taken, were in an attitude of hostility to the United States. I learn, further, from the advocates of this bill, that, at a subsequent time, General James Watson, for the relief of whose heirs this bill is introduced, through the agency of General Armstrong, the agent of the Creek Indians, entered into a contract by which he purchased the right of the property of the Creek nation in these negroes, for the consideration of $14,500, which sum was paid by Watson to the Creeks, who distributed it to those to whom it belonged. I never address the Chairman (the Chairman being in conversation with a member) when he is talking to somebody else; for it is contrary to the rules of the House. [Laughter.] I do not thank any gentleman to intervene between him and myself. [Renewed laughter.] I have seen that course of proceeding too long not to reprobate and condemn it. So long as I am orderly addressing the Chairman, I am entitled as a matter of right to his respectful consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will endeavor to give the gentleman his especial consideration.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is time for "young America" to insist upon her rights. [Prolonged laughter.] I will do it, sir, though the gallews stands between me and the desk; and the old men of this House must learn that while reverence is due to old age, good manners are due to both young and old.

General Watson purchased these negroes, and it is said that he purchased them with the sanction of the Government of the United States. Now, inasmuch as I have accepted the invitation of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] I feel bound to accept it upon the terms proposed, and to discuss the bill in a spirit of kindness and goodwill, keeping in remembrance the Constitution and law. It is impossible to discuss the matter involved in the bill, without referring to the subject of slavery. It is as much impossible as it was for the boy who was extremely timid and bashful, and could not declaim in public. His father, with the view to have the poor boy overcome his timidity and his bashfulness, erected a stage in his cabbage garden. Now, said he, "My son, take your place upon this stage, and imagine that all these cabbage heads are men, [laughter,] and address them as such. [Renewed laughter.] It proved a most perfect failure. Why? The boy said "Father, it is very easy to suppose men are cabbage heads, but it is not equally easy to imagine cabbage heads are men." [Laughter.] Now, it is impossible to discuss this subject without referring to the institution of slavery. With a view to answer the arguments of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. JOHNSON,] I acknowledge that the institution of slavery existed in this country prior to the formation of the Federal Constitution. I acknowledge, in the spirit of candor as an American citizen, as the Representative of a portion of the American people, that our forefathers in the framing of that Constitution, recognized the existence of this institution, and the man who will not recognize this I am disposed to think is a fanatic. This is most clearly proved and demonstrated by the second article of the Constitution of the United States. It is most clearly proved by that provision of the Constitution, which in substance enacts that no person, whose services are due to another, shall be discharged by reason of any law of the State to which he has escaped, but shall be delivered up to his owner. I acknowledge that this provision in the Constitution of the United States must relate to slaves. If it does not relate to slaves, then that article in the Constitution is without any meaning, as there is no other description of persons to whom it can possibly apply. Slavery, in my judgment, as I understand the theory and interpretation of the Constitution, is a social and domestic institution, and belongs to the several States in which it exists. Am I right? There are gentlemen around me who understand all about the institution of slavery, who understand the relative and reciprocal rights of master and slave. I ask, am I right, then, in the view which I express, that the institution of slavery is a domestic and social one, belonging exclusively to, and under the sole and absolute control of the States within which it exists? I am a Free-Soiler; that kind of Free-Soiler compatible with the Constitution. If these sentiments which I have advanced are erroneous, let Southern gentlemen, more intimate with the institution of slavery, who understand the relative rights of master and slave, say so. Now, I am not going to condemn the Florida war. I have been always on the side of my country in every war in which she was engaged, and, right or wrong, I ever will be. That is my motto. I respond to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. WILCOX,] whose acquaintance I have not the pleasure to have, that, when my country is involved in war, I am for fighting her out, right or wrong. I am for relieving her from the embarrassment of the present exigency in which she may be involved.

Mr. Chairman, how many minutes have I left? The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-three.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have not yet got into the pith of the matter. I must proceed, then, with great rapidity, to state the reasons of my opposition to this bill. I do not know that my intellectual machinery will operate with sufficient rapidity to enable me to express even the reasons of my opposition. I do not find any proof to show that the institution of slavery existed amongst the Seminole Indians, either de facto or de jure. How does slavery exist in the several States? Does it exist by the law of brute force? No, sir. Slavery exists in the several States where it obtains, by virtue of the local and respective regulations of those States. It is upheld, it is maintained by virtue of the local laws and regulations of the several States. Let me assert here a principle, a proposition. Repeal all of the local legislation of the several States where slavery exists; repeal all general legislation where Congress has identified itself with the subject of slavery within the territory where it has exclusive jurisdiction, and slavery would exist nowhere in all our borders.

Slavery, then, exists by virtue of the local regulations of the several States, and I hold, and am willing to maintain, that the Congress of the United States has no right, by the Constitution, to interfere with it at all. If slavery exists by virtue of law, where is the evidence tending to show that slavery existed in the Seminole nation, either de facto or de jure?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia. I will ask the gentleman, if there is any evidence before this committee, that the institution of marriage is recognized by the Creek tribe of Indians? I will ask the gentleman, furthermore, if there is any evidence before the committee, or country, that the Creek or Seminole Indians were governed or guided by statutory laws? I will ask the gentleman, further, if slavery cannot exist by virtue of customary laws without statutory laws?

Mr. BARTLETT. These questions, provided I have time, I will dispose of. [Laughter.] I had no idea that the mere suggestion of the proposition that there was no proof tending to show that slavery existed by virtue of law among the Seminole Indians, would bring out so quickly and suddenly the advocates of this bill. I had no idea that they would flutter so suddenly, but it has brought them out in full tilt.

If slavery exists by virtue of law, it must exist, if it existed at all amongst the Seminoles, by virtue of law, and not by force. Did slavery exist among the Seminoles by the laws of Florida, or was it by the savage statutes of the Seminole nation? We do not know. These gentlemen who represent the institution of slavery would not doom a free man to slavery. They are too magnanimous—they have too great a respect for the rights of man—they would give a man a fair trial. Now, let me ask, in the spirit of candor, where is the evidence tending to show that by law the institution of slavery existed amongst the Seminole nation?

Slaves are that description of persons who are wholly subject to the control of another, without any voluntary freedom of action—whose persons and services are, in law, the property of another. But we learn that these negroes, who are the subject-matter involved in this bill, had great influence with the Seminoles, and that the Seminoles were subject to their influence. These negroes exercised a controlling and powerful influence over these Seminoles. If this is true, they were not slaves de facto. Why? If I am absolutely subject to the control and will of this gentleman who sits upon my left, [Mr. BOGOCCK,] without any freedom of action, and my sinews, my bones, and my blood are his, then I am his slave. But reverse it. This gentleman is subject to my will and control, and I influence and direct him. Am I his slave de facto or de jure? Congress has power to declare war by the Constitution. It has power to raise munitions of war. It has power to provide compensation for officers and men, but I deny that a military commander has any authority, by the Constitution or by law, to promise an extra consideration to a favorite regiment, unauthorized by law. When a boy, I recollect the beautiful and laconic letter of J. K. Paulding, addressed to Commodore Elliot. I was a mere student then. I recollect it, and can repeat it nearly verbatim et literatim. He says:

DEAR SIR: You are requested to point out to this Department the article of war authorizing the importation of jackasses in national ships.

J. K. PAULDING, Secretary of the Navy.

Commodore ELLIOT.

[Laughter.]

Let me request the advocates of this bill to point to the article of war authorizing a military commander to raise or enlarge the compensation of a favorite regiment engaged in the war against the Seminoles, or any other nation. I deny that the commander of any American force has a right to enter into a stipulation promising a part of the military force of this country, and in consideration that they will fight valiantly for this country, they shall be paid for their services in the bodies of the enemy. I learn, from the facts in this case, and from the advocates of this bill, that a portion of these negroes were contending against the whole military power of the United States, and all the appliances which this Government could bring to bear. I deny, according to the law of nations, that obtains among civilized and Christian nations, that a military commander has the right, by the law of nature, to enter into an engagement with the Creek nation, in consideration that they would fight valiantly against the Seminole nation, that they should receive—and we all know it was a war of extermination—the bodies and souls of their enemies taken in such war. Ah! thank God—thanks to the Constitution under which we live, move, and have our beings as a Republic, our forefathers did not incorporate in it any such authority or power. The exercise of such an assumed and unwarranted authority would not be binding upon the Government. Gentlemen around me, who understand the institution of slavery and its reciprocal rights, have seemed to acquiesce in the sentiment I advanced—that it is a domestic and social institution. Are there any contingencies which may happen—and I wish to be distinctly understood upon this subject—in the fortunes of war, by which the social and domestic relations of life can be severed? Can the fortunes of war dissolve the marriage relation? Can the fortunes of war change the relation of parent and child, husband and wife, guardian and ward, master and servant? No, sir; the result of war cannot change any of these relations. Then, for the sake of argument, suppose slavery, in point of fact and in law, did exist among the Seminoles. The Seminoles were subdued; they were subjected to the military power of the United States. Did that dissolve any of these domestic relations? No, sir. Though I cannot complete, by way of argument, what I desire to say in relation to this subject, I shall proceed, in that same connection which I had proposed for myself. The Seminole war terminated; and I wish to say, if that war had been continued to the present moment for the same cause,

I would still vote to prosecute the war, and to provide the munitions of war. And I would vote to raise men and supplies, because there may be a time when the value of this Union will be worth nothing—when the Federal Government shall forget and cease to exercise the power granted to it by the States to protect and defend them from foreign invasion and domestic violence. Then the time will have arrived when the Union will be of no value to the States, and when, in my judgment, for this cause alone, it will be the duty of the States to resume and exercise those attributes of sovereignty which they have, by the Constitution, granted to the General Government. I hold, and wish to state this, in illustration of what I am hereafter to say, that this Government is not a slaveholding nation. The Government of the United States is not a slaveholding Government. The powers not granted by the States are reserved to the States, or to the people, respectively. No power to hold men in slavery is granted by the States. I submit it, as a question of law—as a question of constitutional law, to all gentlemen who are members of this House, and who are in favor of a latitudinarian construction of the Constitution, to say what express grant of power made by the States, cannot be exercised by the General Government without the exercise of an implied power to hold slaves. Why, the Government of the United States has no more power to enter into this domestic and social relation of slavery, than it has to contract marriage. I should demur, if I were a lady, to be the bride; and lawyers will understand what I mean when I say there is a constitutional impediment to contracting any such relation, and it would be void ab initio. There would be no power to consummate it, and, therefore, the relation can never exist.

What, if anything, has this to do with the subject now before us? Why, if the Government is not a slaveholding Government—if the Federal Government has no authority by law to hold slaves—then it had no authority by the Constitution, or by law, to sanction the contract made by General Jesup with the Creek nation; and that is the end of the whole matter. If the Government had no authority to hold slaves, if General Jesup had no authority by law to enter into this contract, then the advocates of this bill may talk as long as they please about the Government sanctioning this transaction, and about the Secretary of War, or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, sanctioning it, because all statesmen and all lawyers know that that which is void in its inception is incapable of any confirmation afterwards.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. Just seven minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Well, sir, if I had not great confidence in the patriotism of my ancestors, and in the previous legislation of Congress, in the adoption of these rules, I should claim that this one-hour rule was unconstitutional, as abridging the freedom of speech. [Laughter.] I never expect to obtain the floor again in the American Congress; but I have only stated my programme; the performance has not begun yet. [Renewed laughter.] But I must proceed. These negroes were the property of the Creek nation, were they not? The advocates of this bill claim that the Government of the United States made this contract. Why, the documentary evidence that has been put into this case most clearly and most manifestly proves that the right of property was in the Creek nation, by virtue of the contract with General Jesup, and by virtue of the capture. Where did they acquire the title? It was by virtue of the contract and the capture.

Now, let me ask, What interest had the United States in these slaves? Not the least in the world. The documentary evidence shows that General Watson bought these slaves of the Creeks, through the agency of General Armstrong, and that he paid the consideration to them. Yet the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. JOHNSON] declares that there is no jury in the country that would hesitate a moment to return a verdict for the claimants in this case. Suppose the gentleman had his declaration filed in assumpsit, there was no contract on the part of the Government. The right to the property was in the Creek nation. They undertook to sell it through the instrumentality of their agent, General Armstrong, and they received the money. The Government never had the least interest in the property. But these gentlemen here say that the General Government gave an order, and that they were bound to deliver this property. Sir, the position is untenable. This gentleman upon my left has $14,000 worth of property in my possession, and with my knowledge; he sells it to my friend from Ohio upon my right, [Mr. EDGERSON,] and he gives an order upon me to deliver it to Mr. EDGERSON; but before I can deliver it an armed force—a third power, claiming this property, interferes, and by force prevents my delivering it in pursuance of the order; am I responsible for that property? Sir, I deny the proposition that because of this direction to me I am bound to deliver the property at all hazards. It has no foundation in law or reason.

Then, again, I deny that the word “plunder” comprehends negroes. The gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. JOHNSON,] the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. DANIEL,] and the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS,] contend for a proposition that never had any soundness in England or America, nor anywhere else where jurisprudence is cultivated and known as a science. They do not contend that the word “plunder,” in its legitimate and true sense, comprehends negroes and slaves, but they say it was understood by the parties to comprehend slaves. They say it is the interpretation and understanding of the parties that is to be the governing rule. I deny it, sir. It is the understanding and interpretation of the parties that is to govern in relation to the construction of the contract, so far as it can be collected from the instrument itself. Will the lawyers in this body rise up and tell me—will they state it to the nation, and let it go upon the record, that the understanding of the parties is to control, without reference to the instrument? No. The understanding and intention of the parties, as far as it can be collected from the instrument itself, is admissible; but it is a well-settled principle—settled in England, settled in America, settled in every State in this Union with which I am acquainted—that parol evidence of a parol contemporaneous understanding, inconsistent with the terms of the instrument itself, is never admissible to control, to vary, enlarge, or diminish the terms of the instrument. But gentlemen may say that in equity the claimants in this case ought not to be bound by this rule. Sir, the rule in equity is the same. I have not consulted legal authorities, but relying on my general reading, I assert, in the presence of the American nation and of the world, that the principle in the courts of equity is the same as that which obtains in the courts of law, in relation to the rejection of parol evidence. Talk about the understanding of the parties! Are you to rely upon the frail, uncertain, and dishonest memories of men, to the exclusion of the written and dedicated memorial? But perhaps the advocates of this bill may appeal to moral equity—to moral equity as contradistinguished from legal equity. Well, sir, let me refer to the statement of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. MACE,] one of the committee from which this bill emanates. He says it was the object and intention of General Watson to purchase these negroes and sell them into eternal bondage, without reference to their condition, whether they were free or whether they were slaves. Ah! Why, sir, my Lord Coke, whom I studied more than seventeen years ago, lays down this great axiom, that “he who comes into a court of equity claiming equity, must come into court with clean hands.”

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I propose to say a very few words upon the subject of this bill, and I shall not detain the committee long.

It seems to me that some gentlemen who have engaged in this discussion have fallen into singular legal errors, and it shall be my purpose to attempt a correction of them. The gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. BARTLETT,] who has just submitted a very able address, repeated the error into which the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SACKETT,] who opened this discussion when the bill was first before the committee, fell; and that was, the position that it was incumbent upon the advocates of this bill to prove that slavery existed among the Seminole nation, as gentlemen term them, precisely as if, under the Constitution of the United States, or any of the laws of the United States, any Indian tribe had a distinct existence as a nation. In common courtesy, we call them nations; but if the gentleman had looked twenty years back in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, he would have found that that fiction was attempted to be used in the case of the Cherokees; that a distinguished professional man, who had previously been Attorney General of the United States, attempted to arrest the action of the local authorities of Georgia, who were proceeding to execute Tassell, an Indian, for murder, by an appeal to the Supreme Court, and was turned out of that tribunal almost with ridicule. The Indian tribes, although for certain purposes, and in view of certain considerations, they are treated as nations, have no such character whatsoever in view of the Constitution of the United States, or of any law passed in pursuance of that Constitution. They are only quasi nations, recognized as such for some purposes. But so far as legal relations are concerned, they have not one constituent as a nation; they are members of the community or State in which they are located, part of its population, subject to the control of its municipal laws, and to be punished for breaches of those laws, precisely as the Supreme Court decided in the case of Tassell, to which I have referred.

Mr. SACKETT. I would ask the gentleman from Maryland whether there is authority, or ever has been, either in the United States, or in any of the States, to settle the rights of property among the Indians of any of the tribes?

Mr. WALSH. There may have been special treaties, by which particular rights of property were to be settled by their own tribunals; but that depended on the laws that the United States chose to pass for that purpose. But, except so far as this Government has given them the privilege of deciding on their own rights of property, they belong to the State, and are subject to the State in which they reside. The gentleman will assert what every professional man and every reader of constitutional law knows to be heresy, if he means to say that these Indians located within the limits of particular States, are not subject to the control of the State laws.

Mr. SWEETSER, (interrupting.) I desire to submit a legal proposition to the gentleman. Waiving the question that these Indians were citizens of the State of Florida, and that they held slaves in conformity to the laws of that State, I ask the gentleman to answer this point: If that was their relation to this domestic institution, under the protection of the laws of Florida, by what authority did the Government of the United States, in a contest with these tribes in a state of war, authorize a transfer of that property to any individual, or to the Creeks?

Mr. WALSH. Why that does not depend at all upon the laws of Florida. But I am not looking to that question now. I was alluding to the point made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SACKETT.] My answer, however, is, that if they live within a State where slavery is recognized, they can hold slaves just as well as any other portion of the population. The law in Maryland, and the law I believe in every Southern State, is, that even a free negro may own slaves. The only essential to the right to hold slave property, is the freedom of the owner. And under this law, the spectacle is often presented in Maryland, of free negroes asserting dominion over slave property. Now, the question as to the existence of slavery in Florida, I am not aware has been raised here. There can be no controversy upon that subject. That this institution was known under the laws of the State, and was sustained by those laws, cannot be a question which will give rise to any difficulty.

Mr. SWEETSER. The gentleman does not distinctly understand my point. I desire that the gentleman will answer this as a legal proposition. For the sake of the point, I am willing to take the position he assumes for granted, that these Indians were authorized by law to hold slaves. But I desire to know by what authority the United States could give instructions for the transfer of these slaves. Why, if you admit that these Indians were the rightful owners, they would revert back to them, even though the transfer was made when they were in a state of war. I again say, I desire to know by what right the United States directed this transfer to be made? These slaves could not be taken, unless condemned by a judicial tribunal of the country, and I know of no authority existing in the Government to direct any such transfer.

Mr. WALSH. I will come to that directly.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, (with the permission of the gentleman from Maryland,) [Mr. WALSH.] I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEETSER] a question: If the Government had no right to take these slaves, I desire to know by what authority they took the horses and cattle of the Seminoles?

Mr. SWEETSER. Two wrongs cannot constitute a right. If there has been an assumption of power upon the part of this Government in one instance, that cannot be pleaded to justify it in again disregarding the rights of any man, or set of men.

Mr. JOHNSON. One further question. By what right, or what authority, did this Government levy contributions upon the citizens of Mexico during the late war?

Mr. SWEETSER. That was an entirely different thing. There was an independent nation, and the principle which has been maintained by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. WALSH.] These Seminoles were, to some extent, under the protection of the flag of this country; and this Government was bound to protect the rights of these individuals, as citizens of the State of Florida or Georgia, or in whatever State they resided.

Mr. WALSH. Why, if the gentleman concedes we could take this property from Mexico, could we not do it in regard to any portion of the people which should rebel against the authority of this Government?

Mr. SWEETSER. I do not wish to be misunderstood. I did not concede that there was any such authority as the gentleman indicates in relation to Mexico. There was no power in the Army of the United States, or in the Government to enlist men, and to offer them, as inducements, the control over the persons and liberties of the citizens of Mexico. No such power whatever was asserted.

Mr. WALSH. That goes upon the Abolition ground. I will come to that directly. That depends upon the question of whether these negroes were persons. The gentleman will not deny that, during the war with Mexico, the Government had the right to take the property and levy contributions upon the citizens of the country we had invaded. We had the right of conquest. Now, if that right exists with regard to a foreign country, the same principle of the right of conquest exists with additional force with regard to a rebellious tribe of Indians within our own limits. Why, sir, it is one of the punishments which are inflicted by a nation whose rights have been invaded, upon the nation invading those rights. This taking of property and levying of contributions is a right of conquest, and is the means of enforcing just demands. You must do it by making your enemies suffer in person and in property. You did it in Mexico, by contributions, and you may do it in any state of war where it is necessary to subdue any people who have disregarded your rights. The only inquiry which can arise in regard to the gentleman's point is, whether these negroes are to be regarded as property. That the General Government had the right to make such a contract, or that even the commanding officer had the right, cannot be a matter of any successful controversy. The Government employed these Indians against another savage tribe of Indians. We have had all the sympathy expressed here which is usual by a certain class of persons whenever the question of slavery is brought up. The gentleman who spoke upon the first day this bill was before the committee, and who, I suppose, will have the floor to speak upon it to-day, [Mr. JOHN W. HOWE] made a great parade of the ages of these slaves. There was one man seventy years old, and one infant two years old. All these things are uniformly thrown in by these Abolition orators, to excite hatred against this institution.

Now, I know nothing of the condition of these particular people, but I do know that, as a general thing, men of seventy years of age, and children of two years of age, are generally better cared for among the slave population than are the free negroes of a similar age in the cities of your Northern States. But this sympathy is continued to be poured out. Gentlemen do not seem to recollect that, at the period when the Government was forced into this negotiation with the Creek Indians, that murders had been committed. The dwellings and habitations of the citizens of Florida had been fired and made desolate. Under the pressure of such a necessity, the Government was called upon to invoke Indian strength against the Indian tribes which had rebelled against it. The officers of the Government made that contract, and it was one reasonable under the circumstances. It was called for by the nature of the service to be performed. Under this contract these slaves were captured, and they were justly and fairly the property of the Creek nation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, they were property. We hear a great deal said upon this clause of the Constitution. We hear it asserted that, because there is a provision in the Constitution which recognizes the slave population, to a certain extent, as a basis of representation, that, therefore, slaves lose their distinctive character as property. Do not gentlemen see, that that very recognition was put into the Constitution for the purpose of throwing additional guarantees around the Constitution. It was like one of those fictions in the common law, sometimes adopted for the purpose of insuring truth and justice. That was the very reason for placing this fiction in the Constitution. That was the reason for making this species of property to some extent a basis of representation. It was, that being made so, the strength of the South would be increased in our national councils, an additional guarantee thrown around the institution of slavery. Sir, they are recognized as property. But that is not the question before us. If this House, by the rejection of this bill, is to say that slaves are not property, and that slavery is not protected by the guarantees of the Constitution, why, the South will indeed have new cause for alarm and terror. Are we to be told that these negroes are to be taken from these Indians, and no return made to them upon the part of this Government, because they are recognized as property? The proposition cannot be maintained. They are property. That is not an inquiry to be ascertained.

Now, the gentleman over the way, [Mr. SWEETSER] who argued this subject with a great deal of ability, seemed to suggest particular forms of action, which, he says, could not have been maintained against the Government or against any private individual standing in the position the Government occupies in this matter. Does the gentleman deny or doubt, that when these negroes were captured and came into the custody of the United States at Fort Pike with the Indians, who had been captured in the same campaign, they were in the hands of, and under the control of the Government, and could not be disposed of without the consent of the Government? Now, it is plain that General Watson made this purchase with the consent of the recognized agents of the Government, and upon the faith of the Government. And, no matter whether they were slaves or not, by this contract these Creeks had a right, and upon the assertion of that right this man is compelled to part with his money. Now, what is this Government to do? what are we bound in good faith to do? These negroes being under the control, and in the possession of the officers of the Government, they were bound to deliver them up, and in case of refusal, they were liable to an action in the nature of trover, the same as for any other property. No lawyer would question that. The General Government having these negroes in possession, the Creeks parted with their title. They transferred whatever title they had to Watson, and he, the owner and possessor of that title, might bring an action of trover against any party who withheld that property from him. But the case is still stronger against the General Government. They not only failed to deliver up this property, which, according to the terms of this contract, belonged to the Creeks, but they actually permitted the Seminoles to carry the slaves along with them west of the Mississippi. Now, will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEETSER] tell me, if I own property which I have gotten under a regular bill of sale, or by a regular purchase, and another person shall step in and take that property from my dominion, and out of my jurisdiction, whether that third person would not be liable in an action of trover? That is the real question at issue, for that is precisely what the General Government have done in this case.

Mr. SWEETSER. I understand the gentleman to put this case upon the ground that the Government has failed to discharge its duty, waiving the question of original right. The Government has failed to discharge its obligations to General Watson. If the gentleman puts it upon that ground, it changes the whole face of the case. But the gentleman is talking in relation to an action of trover. Now, the gentleman understands perfectly well that an action of trover cannot be maintained except against the person who has possession of the property, or who has converted it to his own use. Now, I do not understand that it is claimed in this case that the General Government have been guilty of converting the property, or have failed to protect it in conformity with its engagement, or of diverting, or using, or disposing of it in any way. The question then arises, upon what ground in law or equity can this case be maintained?

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is mistaken, I apprehend, as to this law. I can maintain an action of trover against a party who meddles with my property, or diverts it, though he gets no pecuniary benefit from it. I can bring a special action against an individual who takes my property for no pecuniary purpose, and transfers it from my dominion and out of the jurisdiction of the State where I live.

Mr. SWEETSER. I am sure my friend does not wish to misunderstand me. My point is here: If the Government of the United States have transferred the property, over which they have no right of ownership, and thus prevented the real owner from coming in possession of his property.

Mr. WALSH. Then, I hold the gentleman to his pledge. This property was in the hands of the United States authorities at Fort Pike; it was under their control. They know General Watson purchased the title of the Creeks, which they themselves have admitted to be good, and knowing that, they have entirely refused to deliver upon demand, but they have transferred it with the Seminoles, beyond the Mississippi. Now, it seems to me that this is as clear a case as was ever presented. They are liable, not only for the non-fulfillment of the contract they had authorized their agents to make, but they are liable in trover for refusal to deliver upon demand, and they would be liable to a special action for transferring these slaves, to go along with their masters west of the Mississippi.

They got a good consideration for it, which makes this case conclusive upon the Government. The gentleman who opened this debate thought that, in the conclusion of the treaty, or the agreement made by General Jesup with the Indians, the clause permitting them to go with all their property and slaves, west of the Mississippi river, conflicted with this claim.

Sir, the Government, by getting Watson's money, were enabled to fulfill that stipulation, and the slaves were permitted, according to the terms of the treaty, to be carried west of the Mississippi river, under the authority of the Government. Watson had paid his money, and enabled the Government to complete their treaty stipulations, and fulfill them at his expense. It seems to me, without enlarging upon this consideration, that if ever there was a just claim presented to the consideration of this House, the claim set forth in this bill is one.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Some weeks ago, when this matter was under consideration, I looked through all the documents referred to in the report of the committee, and referred to in this claim, and made a memorandum of the facts, and came to the conclusion that the Government were clearly liable, and bound by every consideration of equity and justice, to pay this money to Watson's heirs. I have not thought much upon the subject since; and, as I did not arrive at the House to-day in time to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. BARTLETT], I do not know what different light he may have thrown upon this subject. I thought then, and I have not altered my opinion, that the question whether those negroes were slaves in fact, is not in issue, or at least not directly in issue, so as to make the validity of this claim depend upon it. And I will answer the question propounded by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SWEETSER], because it will give to the committee my view of the case—a question which I did not understand the gentleman who just now addressed the committee [Mr. WALSH] to answer. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEETSER] asked this question: Could the Government of the United States transfer these slaves to the Creek nation?

Now, I answer, No. The Government of the United States never did transfer these slaves to the Creek nation. The Government never had any property in these slaves. The question assumes a fact contrary to the truth, and contrary to the proof before the committee—a fact which never existed. Now you see what a different case will be presented, if you follow that idea out. How did the Creek nation get their title to the slaves? By capture. It was well said by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. BARTLETT,] by capture. Was the title or ownership of these slaves ever in the United States? Never, never. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SACKETT] asked a question the other day, which was followed up by a question of the same import by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] which is this: Can the Government of the United States own slaves? Can the Government of the United States deal in slaves? The answer to that question is not involved in this issue. I am not going to answer it, because I do not think it necessary, and I do not think it is right towards these claimants, to answer an immaterial question, when the answer might provoke an immaterial issue to the prejudice of the claimants.

Mr. FREEMAN, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman allow me to state a fact? I know the fact that the Government of the United States have dealt in slaves, and that they have sold slaves under execution to pay debts due to them. And they have taken slaves in payment of obligations, due upon United States bonds of public officers in the South.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, (resuming.) I do not say whether the Government can or cannot own slaves. What I say is, that that question is not involved in this case. Most clearly the Government might be compelled to sell slaves in a certain contingency; for instance, upon an execution issued upon a judgment obtained against Government defaulters, especially if that was all the property that could be levied upon. How could the Government avoid selling them? Whether the Government could or ought to bid them off on such sale, and hold them as Government property, is another thing. But that is a question which I think is not involved in this matter. Now, what are the facts upon which this claim rests? I will state what the facts are, and I will ask the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SACKETT,] and the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. BARTLETT,] when I state those facts, to say which of them is not a fact. As I stated before, I made a memorandum of the facts, and noted the documents referred to by the committee to prove the facts.

In 1836 (August) General Jesup, in command of our troops in Florida, made an engagement with certain Creek warriors for their services in the Seminole war. They were to have all the plunder, they should take from the Seminoles; they were to have all Indian negroes and other Indian property taken by them; they were also to have $20 as a reward for each slave belonging to citizens of the United States captured.

Mr. SACKETT, (interrupting.) No, sir. That is not so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, they were to have all the plunder they might take from the Seminoles; and they were to have $20 for each slave captured belonging to citizens of the United States.

Mr. SACKETT. That is not so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I say General Jesup says by the written contract that the Creeks should have all the plunder, and General Jesup says he subsequently agreed to pay them $20 a head for such of the captured slaves as might be the property of white citizens, as an inducement for them to save their lives.

Mr. SACKETT. General Jesup said at a subsequent period of the war, that he would give them $20 for each slave captured, belonging to the whites.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. We do not differ. The original contract between General Jesup and the Creek warriors was, that they should have all the plunder they took.

This is one fact. We will strike out all the rest. The Seminoles then had many negroes living with them reputed to be slaves; some of which belonged to citizens of the United States, principally in Florida—some they had bought.

Is that fact disputed? There was at that time, when the contract was made, negroes living with the Seminole Indians, which General Jesup says in his letter were slaves; which Colonel Humphrey and other citizens of Georgia say were slaves; and a gentleman by the name of Heath, informs us of the names of the persons from whom about forty of them were purchased by the Seminole Indians.

Mr. WALSH, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman allow me a moment to say, what I intended to have said in connection with my remarks. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. BARTLETT] admits that slavery is a State institution, and that the laws in the several States are to govern that institution and protect it. Now, I stated as a principle of law, that will not be contradicted, that color in the whole Southern country is prima facie evidence of slavery, and if a black man denies that he is a slave he is bound to prove it. That principle is universal in the slave States.

Mr. SWEETSER. Inasmuch as this discussion is intended to get the facts fairly before the committee, if the gentleman will permit me, I will propound one question, touching this point, to which he has directed the attention of the committee. I understand that Mr. Harris, the gentleman at the head of the Indian Bureau, authorized this arrangement to be made in relation to the transfer of these slaves to Watson, of whom the present claimants are heirs, and that it was done independently of the Secretary of War. Now, I should like to know by what authority Mr. Harris did authorize the transfer and holding of these men, whom we captured in this war with the Seminoles? I do not know that there is any authority.

Mr. SACKETT. There is no authority at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have already stated that the Government of the United States never owned, and never claimed to own these slaves. Nor did Mr. Harris, or any other agent, ever undertake to transfer the property in these slaves to the Creeks, if that is what the gentleman means.

Mr. SWEETSER. I understand that the ground upon which the claimants seek remuneration for these slaves, rests upon the basis that there was an understanding made with Mr. Harris, acting upon the part of the Government, authorizing the transfer of these captured slaves to Mr. Watson; and I understand the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. WALSH] to predicate his argument upon the ground that the Government, after having authorized this transfer, authorized this purchase to be made by General Watson. I understand the course of the argument of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. WALSH] is, that this arrangement was made under the authority and by the sanction of the officers of the Government of the United States. The question I propound to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is, upon what authority did Mr. Harris act? He admits that he had no authority.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have no interest in this matter. I merely wish to give my legal view of the case. Now, in the first place, permit me to remark, that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, if men are honest in their differences of opinion, these differences arise from a mistake about facts. In this case, these children, or heirs, are likely to be prevented from obtaining their just rights, in consequence of a mistake of the facts—in consequence of assuming that for fact, which never existed. Now, I have stated the contract that General Jesup made, in the way the gentleman from New York [Mr. SACKETT] wants it stated; and I have stated that at the time the contract was made, there were negroes living with the Seminole Indians, and that they were called slaves by General Jesup; called slaves by the Secretary of War; called slaves by the citizens of Georgia; called slaves by the Creeks and by the Seminoles; and the negroes themselves never denied that they were slaves, and never claimed to be free. Now, I state that they were black, and that they are called slaves in these papers, and were reputed to be slaves. Is it disputed? Well; what then? As I mentioned before, I made some time since a memorandum of the facts, and a reference to the documents which prove those facts, but so much of my time has been consumed, I will have no further reference to it, but can probably more briefly state the facts without any further reference to it. And I am sure that no gentleman will deny what I state. The Creek warriors did aid the troops of General Jesup in the war with the Seminoles.

The Creek warriors did capture slaves. General Jesup says they did; the Government has said so; everybody has said so. They did capture certain negroes, whom the Creeks claimed to be slaves; the negroes, so captured, themselves did not deny they were slaves; and the General Government has admitted them to have been slaves, and, through its officers, proclaimed them to have been slaves, over and over again.

There were about one hundred and three slaves and free negroes captured under this arrangement, besides the slaves belonging to white persons—of the latter there were ninety-three, which were returned to their owners. There were about one hundred and thirty negroes captured, belonging to white citizens of Georgia; and General Jesup paid the Creek warriors twenty dollars a head for them, and sent them home to their owners. General Jesup says there were some eighty slaves—he calls them slaves—which the Creek warriors had captured, whom he sent to Fort Pike. There were seventeen left behind, and he says that some one or two or more, on examination, might be found to belong to white citizens of Georgia, but that the greater part of these slaves at Fort Pike were captured by the Creek Indians, and were their property under the contract. What then? The documents are full of evidence to show that the Government was embarrassed as to what they should do with these negroes. Why embarrassed? Why, sir, from knowing human nature well enough to know that the question raised upon this debate, and that the very excitement produced here, would be produced by any act of the Government in relation to these negroes. General Jesup knew that it would not do to send them west—such was the declaration of the officers of the Government—because it would renew, as was supposed, the war between the Seminoles and the Creeks. What, then, were they to do? General Jesup imprudently—imprudently, I say, because it would have been extremely imprudent for the Government to buy these slaves—offered the Creeks $8,000 for their interest in them, over and above the $20 paid for each slave captured, belonging to the whites; which offer was sanctioned by the Government, but the Creeks refused to take it. What then? Still the policy of the Government was not to allow the negroes to go west with the Seminoles, or with the Creeks. What then? In May 1, 1838, a deputation of the Creek Indians, with Captain Armstrong, came to Washington to ascertain from the Department of War, whether they, the Creeks, were to be permitted to take the negroes, (then reduced to sixty or seventy,) or were to be paid for them. And Mr. Armstrong swears that this whole matter was discussed, and that the Government, to relieve itself from the dilemma, sent for General Watson, and procured him to purchase the slaves.

Mr. SWEETSER. I ask the gentleman if, when he speaks of the Government, he alludes to Mr. Harris, as Commissioner of Indian Affairs?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I understand that is disputed. I have not time to read the affidavit of Mr. Armstrong; but I say that it is full, unequivocal, and explicit as to these facts.

What further? General Watson did purchase these slaves, with the knowledge, with the approbation, and at the instance and suggestion of the Government, and did pay in cash, part here and part in Philadelphia, $14,000 to Captain Armstrong, and, Captain Armstrong swears that he took it, and paid it over to the Creek Indians. Now, what more? Where were the negroes, the slaves, that Watson had bought? At Fort Pike, in the possession of the Government, under the care of Lieutenant Reynolds. Now, what were the Government bound to do—what ought the Government to have done? You have to bury every principle of justice, every principle of right and wrong, to say that the Government were not bound to deliver these negroes—negroes, sir, whether they were slaves or not. What, after all these acts of the Government, after procuring Watson to purchase them—after acknowledging over and over again, through its officers, that they were slaves—can the Government say that they were not slaves? That is the point of this matter. Can the Government set up now as against this claim, that these negroes were not slaves? It is not pretended that they were the slaves of the Government. They were the slaves of the Creeks, and the Creeks sold them to Watson, and the Government, a day or two after the sale to Watson, issued an order for their delivery to Mr. Collins, the agent of the Creeks, that they might be delivered over by him, as the agent of the Creeks, to Mr. Watson, in pursuance of the sale. The officer, Lieutenant Reynolds, having the custody of the negroes, declined obeying the order, for which act the Secretary of War reprehends Lieutenant Reynolds, and tells Lieutenant Reynolds that it is much to be regretted that he did not obey the order of the Government. This is enough. The negroes were not delivered up, as they ought to have been. They were moved west, with the Seminoles, by the officer or officers of the Government. Watson could not, and did not, ever get possession of one of them; and it was through the fault of the Government of the United States.

Now, where do you get, in this case, the question whether these negroes were slaves or not? Is this a question between these negroes and the Creeks? Is this a question between these negroes and their Seminole owners? Is it a question whether they are slaves or not? Certainly not; certainly not. Whom is this claim against? Against the Government of the United States. Do not the principles of law and equity estop the United States from saying they were not slaves? I procure you, or permit you to purchase property in my possession, assuming it to be slave, or any other particular property, and you purchase it at my instance and request, where do you get your rule of morality, or your rule of law, that permits me, after you have paid your money, to set up a defense by saying that what I said was false? What kind of morality is this to preach in a Hall like this, which ought to be, if it is not, a hall of justice? Why, sir, not slaves! Is it any difference whether they were slaves or not? Is the equity of the case depending upon the question as to whether they were slaves or not? Not slaves! Did not the Government say they were slaves? Did not the Government procure this man to buy them? Is it here a question between Congress and these negroes, and are they pleading for their liberty before us? Mr. Speaker, is that the question? If the question of slavery comes up at all, it does not come up directly. It is merely collateral.

I say again, that cannot be considered the issue in this case, because the Government, by the acts and declaration of its officers, has put itself in a position which precludes it from setting up now that these negroes were not slaves. The negroes are not here asking us to manumit them. The question here is not a question between the negroes and those claiming them as slaves; a question of their freedom or slavery. The payment or non-payment of this claim will not alter their condition. Will refusing to pay this claim bring them from the Seminoles? Then why this sympathy, why this excitement? It is not a question of slavery. Will your vote and your determination upon this floor to pay or not to pay this money affect, in any manner, the rights or condition of these negroes? If they are free, will it make them slaves? If they are slaves, will it make them free? If they are, in fact, slaves, will they not still remain slaves whether you pay the money or not? Mr. Chairman, it is this which has induced me to say a word upon this subject—I mean the unnecessarily involving and bringing an issue into this case which has nothing at all to do with it; and in my judgment a plainer, more just, and more equitable claim never was made out than this. Now, let me ask who is it, who sets up and pleads here that they are not slaves? Whose duty is it? I say, the Government's mouth is closed. It has no right to assert that they are not slaves as against Watson or his representative. Do gentlemen ask me whether they were slaves or not? I say, it is no matter whether they were slaves or not. You are bound to pay the money—the claim is not for slaves, but for money. Why, the question put by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SACKETT], whether this Government can own slaves or not, is not at all involved in this matter.

Now, one word about this contract. What is meant by the term plunder? Anything taken from an enemy without his consent, and by force of arms, or by capture in war or battle, is called plunder. The term characterizes not so much the kind of thing taken, as the manner or mode by which the thing is taken. If I purchase your horse, and you give me a bill of sale and deliver the horse to me, I thereby acquire a possession and title by purchase. So of slaves. But if you are a public enemy or foe, and I take the slave from you by force—if I take the horse from you by force—the slave, or the horse, is plunder. It does not mean any particular thing or kind of property; it only means a mode of acquiring the thing as distinguished from purchase, as distinguished from a peaceful acquisition; it means an acquisition or possession acquired by force. In old times, when by the law and custom of nations, the captive, whether bond or free, became the slave of the captor, it was plunder. These negroes were the slaves of the Seminoles; so it must be assumed here, in looking at this claim. I have shown that the Government are estopped, by the acts and declarations of its officers, from setting up now, as against Watson or the Creeks, that they were not in fact slaves. The Seminoles and the Creeks were engaged in open war, as the enemies of each other. The Creeks took these negroes from the Seminoles, in open war, by force. This was their title, and all the title they had. Their title was the capture, and not the contract of General Jesup. Indeed that contract prevented the Government from acquiring or claiming any title, because it said that the Creeks might acquire this title by capture. Nor can it be made a question here, between the Government and Watson's representatives, or between the Government and the Creeks, whether General Jesup was in fact authorized to make this contract:—

1st. Because we have shown, that the possession and the title of the Creeks, whatever it was, was acquired by capture from the Seminoles, and not under or through that contract, by purchase or otherwise from the United States—and therefore the question of authority is immaterial.

2d. If the authority of Jesup is material, as between the Government and third parties, Watson or the Creeks, it must be assumed that he had authority, the subject-matter of the contract being within his proper jurisdiction and cognizance. If Jesup exceeded his authority, that is a question between him and the Government, and not between the Government and Watson, and between the Government and the Creeks—innocent third parties must not suffer.

3d. The Government, through its officers, have ratified and confirmed this contract, and the right and title of the Creeks, however acquired, by their repeated acts and declarations; by the offer to purchase the negroes of the Creeks for $8,000; by their procuring Watson to purchase the negroes of the Creeks as the slaves and property of the Creeks; and by uniformly treating them as the slaves and property of the Creeks; and therefore the Government cannot now deny the right and title of the Creeks, or of Watson, under the purchase from them.

Now, Watson paid the purchase money to Armstrong, and he paid it over to the Creeks, as is expressly sworn to by Armstrong in his affidavit, and as is acknowledged by the Government; and the Government has had the benefit of this money, because it was the settled policy of the Government not to deliver the negroes to the Creeks to be moved west with them; and it is apparent from the evidence, that if Watson had not purchased the negroes, the Government would have been compelled either to purchase them itself, or to procure some other person to purchase them.

It can make no difference whether this claim is presented here by the Creeks or by Watson. The Government, I think, is bound by every principle of justice to see that Watson, or his representatives are repaid at least the amount paid by him to the Creeks, with interest; and such payment to them would absolve the Government from all liability to the Creeks.

Mr. SWEETSER. Mr. Chairman, how many minutes are there left before the termination of the debate?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirteen.

Mr. SWEETSER. I had intended to trespass for a few moments upon the attention of the committee, by the courtesy of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. DANIEL], but the time remaining previous to the closing of debate will be sufficient for my purpose. It is my desire that this bill shall be explained with reference to certain points, so as to authorize me to cast my vote in favor of its passage. It involves, in my judgment, a very grave and important principle, and I intend, in the few minutes allotted me, to direct my attention to two points of the bill. I do not wish to introduce into this debate any question which shall excite the feelings of members so that their judgment may be withdrawn from a full and fair consideration of the merits. I have no time to go back into the details of the bill, but will at once approach the two points I desire to make, and to these points I will call the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. DANIEL], who will close this debate. I waive all of the questions touching the right of these Indians to hold slaves, or their peculiar condition under the laws of the State in which they reside. In order that the claimants may recover the amount claimed by an intelligent vote of the House, there are two points which must be answered, and answered fully. Now, Mr. Chairman, I take this first position, and call the attention of members particularly to it, that the Government of the United States, through the instrumentality of any of its officers, had no power under the Constitution to make the arrangements they did make with these Indians, in order to induce them to engage in the Seminole war, and that the possession acquired as the result of the arrangement conferred no title whatever upon these Creek Indians, to the supposed slaves found fighting with Seminole Indians. I do not undertake to discuss the elements of a title by capture. I take the broad ground and predicate my position upon the argument adduced by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SUTHERLAND], that the United States Government had no power under the Constitution to make any such arrangement. The doctrine of the transfer of the LIBERTY OF PERSONS—of individuals captured in war, is unknown to our institutions. It is without any precedent in civilized warfare. I desire to raise my voice here distinctly against any such principle as that. I will not, however, dilate upon that subject.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. You say, then, because the Government had no power, that this man ought to lose his money!

Mr. SWEETSER. I am coming to that point.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then I would not take the position that it has no power. It makes no difference.

Mr. SWEETSER. If the gentleman will listen he will find that I will dispose of that point. The gentleman said that the slaves were captured fighting with the Seminoles, and sent to Fort Pike, and that the Government was embarrassed by the then condition of the matter. Certainly, they were embarrassed; and they were so because the intelligence of the Government at once perceived that this arrangement, made by General Jesup, was not authorized by law, or the customs of war, but was, on the contrary, in direct violation of those principles which should always govern the administration of this Government in time of war, was a barbarism that even savages would scout as unworthy of even savage warfare. They saw that the Government had no power to hold these men, or to transfer them to the Creek Indians, engaged in the war with them, as stipulated by General Jesup. There can be no doubt upon that subject.

Now, I will call the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina to another point. I hope he will reply to these points. I know the intelligence and candor with which he always argues questions before the House. Watson became a speculator in these negroes, and, if he had been a prudent man, it was his duty to have ascertained by what right these Creek Indians claimed these slaves, which they proposed to transfer to him. It was his duty to have ascertained whether General Jesup had any authority to make the contract alleged to have been made. It was his duty to find out by what authority the officers acted in delivering over to an Indian ally, men taken in battle, to the Creek Indians, to be by them sold into perpetual slavery, and whether they had the power to bind this Government to such an arrangement, alike disgraceful to the Government and the age. Upon the explanation only of these points can this claim rest. All these duties were enjoined upon the man who sought to deal in this kind of property. He was bound to consult the record to ascertain if he was acquiring a title which would avail him. He acted at his peril with these officers of the Government, who had no right to enter into this contract, and his title failing, he has no right to appeal to Congress to be indemnified for the loss he has sustained. I know the gentleman will take pleasure in answering this point. Let me repeat it again, that the gentleman may more fully understand me. I maintain, before the House and the country, that the Government were embarrassed in consequence of the arrangement which was made by General Jesup. They were alarmed as soon as they discovered they had no authority to make such an arrangement, and fully realized the awkwardness of this, if not its criminality. Harris, the Superintendent of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, alone entered with Mr. Watson into the agreement, who was purchasing these slaves, if rightfully slaves, worth $50,000 or $60,000, for about $14,000, as a speculator. If, I say, he did not look into the title, and see what position it rested upon, and has not now a perfect title, there is no obligation upon this Government to indemnify him for what he paid the Creeks for their invalid claim. He has no business here to ask, at the hands of the Government, to be remunerated for his loss.

I will go no further. There is one ground upon which this claim can be predicated. If this Government, through its authorized authorities, have entered into a final arrangement with this man, and encouraged his aforesaid purchase, and have pledged the faith of the Government, to deliver these slaves to him—I will not discuss the question of morals involved, and I care not how unlucky the compact—we are bound to maintain the pledged faith of the Government, and hold the authors responsible to the animadversions, by public opinion. If such a case is made by the proof, the claimants have the right to be here to-day asking Congress to be remunerated for the loss they have sustained. When that point is made out, my vote for the bill will be given most cheerfully. I beg gentlemen to waive all minor considerations. The question is, whether the faith of the Government shall be preserved inviolate, or shall be trampled in the dust in the Halls of Congress.

Mr. DANIEL. I suppose the gentleman is throwing out these arguments to be answered. I think that is the true view of the case, though I differ in many respects from the gentleman.

Mr. SWEETSER. That is the point upon which this committee are to vote and act in relation to the indemnification of this man. I do not care how long the engagement of the Government was anterior to this time. If it is shown by the record that this man Watson, made this purchase not exactly under the authority, but under the advice of the Government, with the faith of the Government pledged that his right, whatever it might be, should be secured to him, this Government is bound to indemnify him. Now for the argument of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. WALSH.] He puts it upon the ground that the Government has converted the property—or done some act inconsistent with the right of Watson. I understand that to be his assumption.

Mr. WALSH. They refused to deliver them upon demand, and permitted their officers to take them west of the Mississippi.

Mr. SWEETSER. Now, if the Government, after having sanctioned this arrangement made by General Jesup with the Creek Indians, and the subsequent, made by Watson with the Creeks for the purchase of the slaves, has been guilty of any act or connivance to relieve themselves from the original contract—have been guilty of any wrong, it is the duty of this Government, and it is the duty of this House of Representatives, to fully indemnify that man. There can be no question about it. LET THE FAITH AND HONOR OF THE GOVERNMENT BE PRESERVED ALTHOUGH THE HEAVENS FALL. That is the principle which will control my vote here. I hope the honorable gentleman who will close this debate will show to this committee, and the country, that this bill is based upon the faith of the Government pledged to Watson at the time he made the purchase of these slaves, or that the Government have been guilty of some act of bad faith towards Watson, the purchaser, which fixes a moral obligation, if any such facts exist, which will authorize the passage of a bill so repugnant to all my opinions of propriety or right.

I thank the gentlemen of the committee for the indulgence they have given me upon this occasion. I say this case involves a grave and important principle. Let us now determine it upon this bill, at a time when there is a comparative calm in regard to this matter, in relation to the character of property that is so exceedingly delicate, and which has caused so much excitement in the land. Let us come up here, and vote like American representatives; and where the faith of the Government has been pledged, I care not with what understanding, it is sufficient for me that the honor of the country is at stake, to command my vote. Let that be shown, and let us record our votes in favor of a bill which will show, not only to the South, but to the whole country, that the people's representatives, acting upon a great principle like this, will speak out, discharge their duty, and put their names upon the record of the country like men.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. I understood that it was out of courtesy to me, and at the instance of friends, that another hour was to be given to this debate. I feel under strong and lasting obligations to this committee, though, owing to some circumstances not now fully made known and for which I cannot account, I have not had a moment of that time.

Mr. DANIEL. As nobody else seems disposed to occupy the floor, I will commence.

Mr. SACKETT. I desire to move that the committee rise, for the purpose of extending the time, for the benefit of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Howe.]

The motion was made for extending the time one hour, to enable him to resume the floor to finish his remarks, which sickness prevented him from doing heretofore.

Mr. STANLY. I hope the committee will not rise that we may extend the time for debate, but I trust that by common consent the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Howe,] who differs from me in views as widely as man can, will have that courtesy granted to him which was never denied to any gentleman under similar circumstances; and I move that by general consent he have the balance of his time, which he lost on account of illness.

Mr. DANIEL. I have no objection, if it is the pleasure of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the only method of which he is aware, under the rules, by which the gentleman from Pennsylvania can get the floor, is by the courtesy of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. DANIEL,] who reported this bill, to yield him a portion of his time. The House having fixed the time at which the debate is to be closed, it is not in the power of the committee, even by common consent, to extend it.

Mr. DANIEL. I do not know whether I shall have an opportunity of reading to the House some testimony which has not yet been read, and submit such remarks as I may deem pertinent. If I was sure I should have ample time, I would not have the least objection to yield a portion of my hour to the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania. I will do this much: I will endeavor to get through the material points of the case as soon as possible, and then, if I can, I will yield to the gentleman a portion of my time.

Mr. HOWE. I will only state—

Mr. DANIEL. How much time had the gentleman before?

Mr. HOWE. There is no record of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for closing the debate is known.

Mr. DANIEL. The gentleman commenced and spoke some days ago.

Mr. HOWE. I spoke, I should think, about twenty minutes. I called upon Mr. DISNEY afterwards to know the length of time—

Mr. SACKETT. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. DANIEL. I hope the committee will not rise. We have consumed some two days in this debate already. I am entitled to the floor, and will not yield it for any such purpose.

Mr. STANLY. Has anybody objected to the proposition I made? I ask that by general consent, and as an act of courtesy, the gentleman from Pennsylvania be allowed the balance of his hour, without interfering with the rights of my colleague.

Mr. DANIEL. I have no objection if it is not taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] that, inasmuch as the House has by its own order fixed the time for closing this debate, the committee cannot, by unanimous consent even, change that order.

Mr. DANIEL. I have heretofore expressed the opinion that a great deal of irrelevant matter had been introduced into this discussion—matter which was not at all necessary to decide upon the merits of this claim. I really think the true view to be taken of this case is in accordance with the suggestions made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SWEETSER,] though I differ from the views which he entertains as to what the decision should be. Although this irrelevant matter has been introduced into the discussion, it may not be improper to notice some of the points adverted to before I shall proceed to show that, independent of these considerations, the petitioner is clearly entitled to the relief which he demands. The chief objection which has been raised is, that these captors of the Seminole Indians possessed no property whatever in these slaves. That objection has heretofore been raised by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SACKETT,] who addressed the House at a former occasion upon this bill. He insisted first, that the contract would not embrace slaves. He further insisted that General Jesup had no right to make such a contract. That is reiterated by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SWEETSER.] He further remarked that this transaction between General Jesup and the Seminoles had not been recognized by the Government. Taking all these positions to be on his side, he said that there was no merit in this claim, and that we are not authorized to pay it. I think the gentleman is clearly wrong in all these positions. I have seen a very intelligent letter from General Jesup, published after the discussion, some days ago, explaining the agency which he had in this matter. He reiterates in that letter all the facts, and shows that slavery did exist among the Seminoles.

Mr. BARTLETT. I rise to a point of order. I desire to know whether the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DANIEL] is at liberty, by the rules of the House, to discuss this question, and bring into the case matter that has not heretofore appeared in evidence before the House? That is my point of order.

Mr. DANIEL. The gentleman himself has just given us an evidence of such a range of remark—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, that the rule cannot be applied in this case. In this committee the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. DANIEL,] in the opinion of the Chair, will be in order when he confines himself to the subject before the House, whether the evidence has appeared heretofore or at any period whatever, or whether it has been introduced into this discussion before or not.

Mr. DANIEL. It is not very material, but I thought it proper to state this. I have seen the letter. General Jesup states what he had previously stated, and expresses the opinion that the petitioner was entitled to $8,000, he having agreed to give that price for the slaves. So far as the contract is concerned, it is unnecessary for me to consume any more time in reading the several dispatches made to the War Department by General Jesup and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. They have all been referred to by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SUTHERLAND,] who has just taken his seat. They show the understanding of General Jesup, and the understanding of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, (Mr. Harris.) But there is some additional testimony I propose to read, showing the understanding of the Secretary of War, (Mr. Poinsett.) All of this, I think, goes conclusively to show what construction was put upon the engagement made by General Jesup with the Creek warriors. The Creeks understood this contract in the same light in which General Jesup says he understood it—in which Mr. Harris understood it, in which the Secretary of War understood it. After all this, can there be any doubt, notwithstanding the objections raised and expressed by gentlemen opposed to this bill? It seems to me that it would be exceedingly unreasonable for us to shut our eyes against all these expositions of the true import of that contract, as to the power of General Jesup. We know in what light the Indians have always been regarded by this Government. We exercise a supervisory and parental control over them, but, in a great many respects, we regard and treat them as independent nations. They are quasi nations, and in that light we make treaty stipulations with them. We make conventions and arrangements with them through the Executive branch of the Government. That is very frequently done. How was it here? We were engaged in a war with the Seminoles in Florida. There was another tribe of Indians who were friendly to the United States. They were willing, by the inducements held out by General Jesup, to engage as his allies in that war. They did engage as allies, and received pay. In addition to that, they were to have all the property they captured, slaves as well as other property. Now, it may be said that this arrangement was never submitted to the Senate. But it has received the sanction of the Government subsequently—of every branch of the Government. Whether there was doubt or not, as to the authority of General Jesup to enter into this arrangement with the Creek warriors, there can be no sort of doubt that, in pursuance of such arrangement, the slaves in question were captured by the Creek warriors, who claimed them as their property.

Well, sir, what was to be done with them? Hostilities were going on. They were taken into the custody of the United States by authority of the United States officers, and they were held in the custody of the United States for the use and benefit of the Creek warriors. That is plainly to be seen in the whole correspondence in relation to this matter, as I showed on a former occasion. General Jesup entered into negotiations with the Creek warriors, who were entitled to the slaves, to purchase their interest in them, with a view of sending them to Africa; and he actually ordered Lieutenant Searle to pay the Creeks $8,000 for their interest in the slaves. When that sum of money was tendered to the Creek warriors, they refused to accept it; they wanted more. The arrangement, therefore, was not consummated, and the slaves were still held in the custody of the Government for the use and benefit of the Creek warriors. Well, sir, what takes place next? A delegation of the Indians proceeded to Washington, in company with Indian agent Armstrong, for the purpose of making some arrangement in regard to these slaves. They came here and demanded the delivery of the slaves then held in the possession of the United States, for their use and benefit. The Government of the United States was then engaged in the work of removing, not only the Seminoles, but the Creeks also, west of Arkansas, and they were sensible of the consequences which would result if the negroes were removed to the territory to which those tribes were to be transferred. If they had been sent there as the property of the Creeks, the Seminoles would, no doubt, have claimed them. If they had been permitted to go there as the property of the Seminoles, the Creeks would have been dissatisfied, and would have claimed them, and a deadly war would, in all probability, have ensued. This, then, was the position in which the Government was placed; and, if Judge Iverson is to be believed—and no one who knows him can doubt his statement—while the Government was thus perplexed, from motives of humanity, and seeking some means whereby such direful consequences to the two tribes might be avoided, a proposition was made to General Watson, on the part of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to buy out the right of the Creek warriors, the Executive Department of the Government informing him in advance that the negroes were in the custody of the Government, and that they should be delivered to any person that the Creek warriors would authorize to receive them. After this was fully understood, after the price was agreed upon between Watson and the Creek warriors, under the advice of the Indian agent, he procured the money, and paid it to the Indian agent, Armstrong, and a bill of sale was made to Watson; and a power of attorney given by the Creek warriors to a man by the name of Collins, authorizing him to go to Fort Pike, and to demand the slaves of the officers who had custody of them; and orders were issued from the War Department to deliver them up.

Collins proceeded to Fort Pike and demanded the negroes. But before he got there, and indeed, it would seem from the different dispatches, just about the time that the Creek warriors arrived in Washington, the Seminoles reached Fort Pike on their way to the West. They were there brought in contact with these slaves previously captured from them and sent there. Being thus brought together the Seminoles manifested great unwillingness to go west unless their former slaves were permitted to accompany them. Lieutenant Reynolds, who was charged with the transportation, was unable to detach the slaves from their former owners and effect a delivery, to use persuasive means, which alone he felt authorized to use. Hoping that he might find an opportunity of delivering the slaves at or before he reached Fort Gibson, Mr. Collins accompanied Lieutenant Reynolds and the emigrating party to Natchez, and there ineffectual efforts were made to deliver the negroes without the application of force. Not succeeding in obtaining them there he proceeded to Fort Gibson. First, however, at Little Rock an application was made to the Governor of Arkansas for aid in effecting a delivery of the slaves, but the Indians manifested so much excitement when they saw that there was some disposition to wrest their slaves from them that the Governor refused to afford any aid, and directed those having the Indians and slaves in charge to remove them as soon as possible. At Fort Gibson an appeal was made to General Arbuckle, and he was requested to deliver the slaves to Collins. He saw that there was no prospect of doing it without the application of force, and as he did not feel authorized to resort to force, he declined and permitted the Seminoles to retain possession of the slaves.

These are the material facts of the case. The money which was paid by Watson was taken to the Creek nation and divided among the Indians. The affidavit of Colonel Armstrong shows that the money was received and divided. It is as follows:

District of Columbia, Washington County:

Personally appeared before me, William Armstrong, who being sworn, saith that he now is, and was in the year 1838, superintendent of the Western Indians, and was at Washington city in the spring of 1838, in company with a delegation of Creek chiefs, who represented and acted as the agents or attorneys of the Creek warriors who served in Florida under General Jesup, and who claimed a number of negro slaves whom they had captured in Florida from the Seminole Indians, under and by virtue of an arrangement or contract made with General Jesup. That said delegation of chiefs acted under a power of attorney from the said Creek warriors, and had ample and full authority to ask for, demand, receive, and dispose of said negroes, who at that time were understood to be in the possession of the officers of the United States, at Fort Pike, near New Orleans, and had been there for several months previous. That whilst at Washington in said spring of 1838, deponent, at the instance and on behalf of said delegation, made application to the Secretary of War, to cause said negroes to be delivered to said Indians, or their agents, or to be paid a fair value for them. That it was advised and deemed better by the officers of the Department, or at least by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that the negroes should not be transported to the west by said Creeks, but that it would be more prudent and proper to sell or dispose of the same, so that they might remain east of the Mississippi. In this opinion, this deponent fully concurred, under the conviction that such population ought not to be increased amongst the Western Indians, and because their presence there was likely to give rise to serious difficulties between the Creeks and Seminoles. This deponent concurred in the advice given to said delegation to sell said negroes, and they were accordingly sold by said delegation to General James C. Watson, of Columbus, Georgia, who was then at the seat of Government on other business, and for the sum of $14,600, which was paid in cash, part in this city, and part in the city of Philadelphia, which said money was placed in my hands by said chiefs, for safe-keeping and distribution amongst the warriors who were entitled to the same; and which was subsequently carried by deponent to Arkansas, and paid out to those entitled thereto, at a council held on the 4th of July, 1838. This deponent knows that at the time of the consummation of said contract, a bill of sale for said negroes, in number about one hundred and three, was executed by all of said delegation, to the said Watson, which was witnessed by deponent and other witnesses. Deponent has no doubt that said sale and purchase was fair and bona fide, and that it was the most politic disposition which could have been made of said negroes, both for the Indians and the Government of the United States. This deponent is fully satisfied that said negroes, being now in the possession of the Seminole Indians west, and having been surrendered to them by the Government officers who had charge of them at the time of said sale, could not now be obtained or reclaimed by said J. C. Watson, or any other person, on behalf of said Creeks, without the aid of the Government, and the use of a military force, and even then their recovery would be attended with great difficulty and expense, and, probably, produce much excitement amongst the Indians.

With a full knowledge of the facts in the case, this deponent feels it his duty, as an officer of the Government, and as intimately connected with Indian relations, and thoroughly acquainted with these interests, to express the opinion that every consideration of justice and policy requires that the said J. C. Watson should be remunerated and paid for said negroes, the amount which he has expended in consequence of said sale, and the prosecution of his claim under it.

WM. ARMSTRONG,

Sworn to and subscribed before me, this 26th June, 1840:

CLEMENT T. COOTE,

Justice of the Peace.

P. S. In addition to the foregoing affidavit, the deponent, William Armstrong, further swears that he knows that the said claimant, James C. Watson, incurred large expenses in the prosecution of said claim. That as many as three agents, to wit: John H. Watson, of Georgia, Nathaniel F. Collins, and Barrant Dubose, of Alabama, were all west of Arkansas, the two latter of whom remained some months in the country west, endeavoring to obtain possession of said negroes, which was finally refused by the officers of Government who had them in charge, and the negroes delivered over to the Seminole Indians West by the said officers.

WM. ARMSTRONG,

CLEMENT T. COOTE,

Justice of the Peace.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, from this statement, that those points which have been raised by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Sackett,] and by other gentlemen who are opposed to the passage of this bill, do not necessarily arise. I think it is perfectly immaterial to determine whether the Creek warriors had a valid title or not. The Government was the bailee of the Creeks, for these slaves. They had received them into their custody, for the use and benefit of these Creek warriors. The Creek warriors transferred their title—perfect or imperfect—to Watson, and he paid them for it. But he was so cautious and provident that, before he would purchase, he even obtained from the bailee—if I may so express myself—who, upon principles of law, was under obligation to deliver the property to the bailors, without any previous arrangement or assurance, that the slaves should be delivered to the Creek warriors, or to their regularly-authorized agent, when required. But, sir, the slaves were not delivered to the agent of the Creeks, when required. Then was there not a clear violation of a legal obligation on the part of the Government, to the prejudice, nay, the ruin of a citizen? And is not the Government bound, upon every principle of law and equity, to indemnify that citizen, whose rights have been thus violated?

Why, sir, it seems to me that there never was a case of greater injustice than the facts of this case present. This money, paid by Watson, inured to the benefit of the United States. Suppose that the interest of the Creek warriors had not been purchased by Watson, do you think they would have rested content, and allowed the slaves to remain in the possession of the Seminoles? No, sir; if they had not been paid by Watson, or by the Government, they would have made efforts to obtain possession.

And now, forsooth, after the Government has received the benefit of the purchase-money, and been released from its engagement with the Creek warriors, we find gentlemen rising here and saying there is no obligation here to refund the money, and redress an injury, which the Government itself has occasioned. It seems to me that law, justice, and honor, equally require the redress of this grievous and ruinous injury.

I said, the other day, when I attempted to reply to the objections which had been raised to this bill, that it was hardly necessary to do so. I think so now. They can all be met and answered, both in regard to the facts and to the law. If I deemed it necessary, I would attempt to show that in all their objections, as well of fact as of law, the opponents of the bill are mistaken. But I will not consume the time of the House by going into that part of the subject.

In regard to facts, I propose to have read some papers which have not been before read, and which will go to disprove the position taken by the opponents of the bill. It has been said that this arrangement has not been sanctioned by the Government. Here is a letter from the Secretary of War to John W. Jones, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, which I read the other day; but as some gentlemen are here to-day who were not on that day, I will read it again:

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 11, 1840.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date, accompanied by a copy of a resolution passed by the Committee of Ways and Means, in relation to the claims of Smith and Watson, to the effect that if the War Department will say that it requires the appropriations to carry into effect the Indian treaty under which those claims respectively arise, and upon such an appropriation being made, will pay the claims, the committee will put the appropriation in the bill.

These claims did not both arise from the execution of a treaty, but stand on distinct grounds. The claim of Smith arises from transactions to carry into effect the treaty of New Echota for the removal of the Cherokees from the States east to the territory set apart for them west of the Mississippi. The appropriation asked for is therefore wanted to carry into effect the treaty, and upon its being made for that purpose the Department will pay Mr. Smith's claim.

Mr. Watson's claim arises under a contract made by General Jesup with the Creek warriors, which was sanctioned by the Department. The appropriation asked for is required to enable the Department to comply with that contract, and to carry it into effect—and upon its being made by Congress this claim will also be paid.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

J. R. POINSETT.

Hon. J. W. JONES, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

WAR DEPARTMENT, }
OFFICE INDIAN AFFAIRS, May 9, 1838.

SIR: The decision made a few days since, that the negroes captured by the Creek warriors in Florida should, in compliance with the engagement of General Jesup, be delivered to the delegation now here, has been communicated to them, with the intimation that when they had determined what disposition would be made of them, and communicated information of the same to this Department, the necessary orders would be issued. In a communication just received from the delegation, they state they have appointed Nathaniel F. Collins, of Alabama, their attorney in fact, to receive the negroes. I have the honor to request that an order may be issued to the commanding officer at Fort Pike, to Major Isaac Clark, at New Orleans, to the commanding officer in Florida, and to any other officers who may have charge of them, to deliver to Mr. Collins all the negroes in question. He will, of course, hold them subject to the lawful claims of all white persons. Abraham and his family should be excepted, in consequence of a promise made by General Jesup. The officers should be instructed to exercise due caution, so as to deliver only those captured by the Creeks. It is proper to remark, that it appears from a letter received from Lieutenant Under the direction of General Jesup, for their interest in these negroes.

Very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

C. A. HARRIS, Commissioner.

Captain S. COOPER, Acting Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, }
OFFICE INDIAN AFFAIRS, July 1, 1840.

SIR: Since my report to you of 8th April last, was transmitted to the honorable Mr. Dawson, a member of the Committee of the House of Representatives of Claims, authentic information has been received of the price paid by General James C. Watson for the negroes taken by the Creek Indians in Florida, to the capture and purchase of whom that report related.

These prisoners were the property of their captors, by the agreement between the Creek warriors and General Jesup. The difficulty about the possession of them, the action of the Government thereby, and the purchase of them by the present claimant, have been heretofore examined, and are fully understood. These negroes cannot, under the circumstances, be obtained by General Watson, and I have heretofore recommended that the money be paid the Creeks for them, and interest on it, should be refunded to him—but the amount of the consideration was then unknown here.

It now appears from the testimony of Captain Wm. Armstrong, taken on the 29th ultimo, that the contract between the Creek chiefs and General Watson for these slaves, (which it seems is now mislaid or lost,) was witnessed by him in the spring of 1838, that it was fair, and, considering the risk of collision between the Creeks and Seminoles in the west on the subject of the negroes, should they be carried there, he thinks the sale of them, before they reached Arkansas, was politic; that the consideration of the said sale was $14,600, which was, by the direction of the Creek chiefs, who were empowered to act in the premises for the Creek warriors that had been in Florida, paid to the deponent in trust for those entitled to it, and that it was actually paid over to them by him in the Indian country, on the 4th of July, 1838. The dates of the contract and of the payments to Captain Armstrong are not given; but the 1st of May may be regarded as the time, without the risk of injustice either way.

These negroes cannot be obtained by General Watson. Any attempt at enforcing a claim to them under the Creek warriors would perhaps have resulted in a conflict, and as the hazard of such an issue prevented the use of more than persuasive means, I think General Watson has a just claim on the United States for the money he paid, and interest.

The amount paid, as already stated, was.....$14,600
Interest from May 1, 1838, to July 1, 1840..... 1,898

$16,498

For this sum of $16,498 I think an appropriation ought to be made, and respectfully recommend, if it meets your approbation, that a communication be made to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, asking for it.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

T. HARTLEY CRAWFORD.

Hon. J. R. POINSETT, Secretary of War.

I have before me other letters and documents, recognizing this transaction, but I think it unnecessary to consume the time of the House by reading them. They fully sustain the case as it has been presented. The Executive branch of the Government having failed to discharge the obligation which it had incurred, has repeatedly recommended what the Government is, in equity, in conscience, and in honor, bound to do—to refund the money to General Watson's representatives, with interest. It is the recommendation, also, of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I call upon those who oppose this bill, if they will not refund the money, to say what they will do. Will they comply with our engagement, and have these slaves now delivered up to the Creek warriors? If you will not refund the money, the Creeks will be satisfied, perhaps, if the Government will fulfill its engagement, and deliver up the negroes; and Watson's representatives will probably be satisfied with such an arrangement. Having taken possession of the slaves, and stipulating to deliver them up, and failing to do so, it seems to me there is no alternative left, compatible with justice and honor, but to refund the money, or for the Government to discharge its obligation to the Creek warriors by delivering up the slaves to them.

Mr. Chairman, as I have time, I will offer a few remarks in opposition to the position which has been advanced, that slavery is not recognized by the Constitution and laws of the Federal Government. Some instances have already been cited, to show that this is altogether erroneous. The Constitution does recognize slaves both as property and as persons; and it seems to me that no gentleman having any correct knowledge of the Constitution can doubt it. Most of the enlightened men of the North, whose constitutional opinions are of any weight, however strong their anti-slavery feelings may be, admit it. But that is not all. Slaves have been recognized as property by our navigation laws. They have been so recognized by our laws imposing direct taxes, and in enforcing executions at the instance of the United States against owners of slave property in the slave States. Yet gentlemen assert that slaves are not recognized as property in the action of the Federal Government. Why, sir, there never was a grosser mistake, with all due deference to those who assert the position.

Mr. Chairman, those who insist that there must be a local law to authorize slavery, are altogether mistaken. I believe there are no States where any regulations by law were made anterior to the introduction of slave property. That is the case in my own State, and in Virginia and Georgia; and it was the case, I presume, in all the States in which it does and has existed. Slavery was introduced into the colonies, there being no legislative enactment against its introduction, mainly by the African Company, which was chartered, I think, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Queen Elizabeth, herself, is said to have been interested in the slave trade.

There are, it is true, laws recognizing this species of property in most of the States—not authorizing it, for it previously existed there. Most of these laws are humane in their provisions. Slavery existed by virtue of the manners and customs of the Cherokees. That it did exist there, that slaves were recognized as property by the Cherokees, we have abundant proof, from the dispatches of General Jesup who was amongst them, and who knew what their institutions were; and also from officers who were there, and who certainly were more competent to speak upon this point than any of us. All join in testifying that slavery did exist there. And I think, therefore, that General Jesup was warranted in assuming that the negroes that were captured were slaves, unless the contrary appeared. That, sir, is the presumption of law in the slave States. A man is presumed to be a slave because he is black. And why? Because nearly all the black people are slaves. But a man is at liberty, if he is a freeman, to show that fact. Now, such was the case here. Slavery existed among the Cherokees. It was confined to that class of the population, and General Jesup, and those who captured these slaves, were warranted in assuming that they were the property of the Seminoles, unless the contrary appeared. I think, Mr. Chairman, all the objections which have been urged against this bill are not well founded in fact or law. And if the objections were well founded, it would not put the Government in any better position. The Government failed to comply with its engagement. If it had complied with it, no matter whether the property was worthless or not, that was Watson's business. But there is no doubt but it would have been a very valuable speculation to General Watson, if the Government had complied with its assurances. But, sir, not only have all the advantages he anticipated been lost to him, but it is actually insisted that he shall not even get back the money which went to relieve the Government from its engagements to the Creeks.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that those who can considerably oppose this bill do not evince that sensitive regard for the honor of the nation which they ought. It has been suggested to me by a colleague of mine, or rather a question has been asked, Why all this delay since 1838? Why, sir, I think very likely that this sort of feeling that has exhibited itself upon this occasion has had some tendency to produce it.

I can say this much, that the Executive Department of the Government, the Secretary of War, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, have repeatedly recommended an appropriation to meet this claim against the Government. For some cause or other it has not been made by Congress. It has been before no committee, so far as my knowledge extends—and I believe I have examined the whole case—that have made an adverse report upon it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DANIEL. I move that the committee do now rise, and report the bill to the House.

The question was then taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman of the committee reported, that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration House bill No. 136, being a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of General James C. Watson, late of the State of Georgia, and had instructed him to report the same back to the House without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon ordering the bill to be engrossed for the third reading.

Mr. DANIEL. I demand the previous question.

Mr. GOODENOW. I rise, sir, to a privileged question. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was then taken, and the House refused to adjourn.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The bill was then read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and having been engrossed, was read the third time.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

This motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I move that the House do now adjourn.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to make a correction (which, I think, ought to be made) in the report of some remarks delivered by me last Friday, in reference to a pending amendment to pay the laborers upon the Capitol. Thereporter makes me say:

"Can anybody tell me anything about it? Are we to vote this blindfold, for sympathy?"

So far I am correctly reported.

"Why, if so, it is worse than any material aid granted to Kossuth, as great a humbug as I conceive him to be."

Now, sir, I did not say "him;" I said "that"—

"as great a humbug as I conceive that to be."

The humbuggery, in my opinion, is on the part of the sympathizers, and not the sympathizee, if I may make a word. I had no intention, certainly, to make any personal attack upon Mr. Kossuth, by applying any remark that could be at all offensive to him. Hence I have thought it proper to make this statement.

NORTH CAROLINA RIVERS AND HARBORS.

Mr. BADGER. I have three memorials which I desire to present to the Senate this morning. They are from citizens of Wilmington, and its vicinity, North Carolina. One of them calls the attention of Congress to the condition of one of the inlets at the mouth of Cape Fear river, and makes out a case from which I think it will be very difficult to resist the conclusion that they are entitled to the assistance of the Government to have that channel deepened. Another sets forth the reasons why a first-class light-house is indispensably necessary near one of the shoals near the mouth of the river; and asks that additional buoys may be placed on the shoals in the waters connected with the harbor of Wilmington.

The third prays, upon grounds both strong and peculiar, that there should be a marine hospital established at that point. I move the reference of these memorials to the Committee on Commerce; and, before they are referred, I beg to say, without making a speech, that I hope that committee will take them into very early consideration; and I feel very sure that if they do so, they will be obliged to come to the conclusion that all three of these applications ought to be granted, in behalf of the most important seaport of our State, which, for the last ten or twelve years, has been growing in importance, increasing in trade, and enlarging in population, and that they will feel a disposition to do what is a just and necessary act for a State which certainly has not received very large favors in that way from the General Government.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

THE TEXAS DEBT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I have the memorial of Leslie Combs, a citizen of the State of Kentucky, which he has requested me to present to the consideration of the Senate. In order to explain it, I beg leave to state some facts in regard to the legislation of Texas. It appears from the laws of Texas, which have been placed in my hands by Mr. Combs, that on the 20th of March, 1848, that State passed a law requiring her creditors to present their claims on or before the second Monday in November, 1849. The claims were to be presented to the auditor and comptroller of that State; and the auditor and comptroller were to give receipts for the claims thus presented, specifying upon the face of each receipt the value of the claim at the time the debt was contracted. In other words, they were to scale the claim and receipt to the holder for the value of the claim, according to its rate in the market at the time the debt was contracted. The act goes on to provide, that the claims that were not presented by the second Monday of November, 1849, should be postponed.

On the 8th of February, 1850, another act was passed, extending the time to the 1st of September, 1851; and that act states that the claims that were not presented by that day, should be barred. Mr. Combs says that he has claims against the State of Texas, amounting to $69,200, without interest. He says that he did not present them by the days that were specified in these acts, and that he could not present them, for various reasons, which he assigns in his memorial—among others, that the evidence of his claim had been filed, with his release, in the Department here, according to the act of Congress of September, 1850. The consequence is, that by the failures to present these claims within the time specified, they are now, by the law of Texas, barred.

It further appears, from the legislation which he has placed in my hands, that an act of Texas went into operation on the 1st of May, 1850, by which the holders of claims, audited and reported to the Legislature, under the act of 20th March, 1848, were authorized to surrender their claims to the commissioners of the land office, and receive land certificates, at the rate of fifty cents per acre, in payment of their claims. By that act, Texas provided for the payment of the outstanding debts that had been audited and reported to the Legislature by the auditor and comptroller, under the act of 1848, in land. But no provision was made by that law, as Mr. Combs says, which could embrace his claims. By an act of the 31st of January, 1852, passed by the Legislature of Texas, that State appropriated $2,000,000 of the United States stock she held, to pay the claims against her which had been submitted to the auditor and comptroller for adjustment, under the act of 20th March, 1848; and out of these $2,000,000, thus appropriated by the act of 1852, no payment was to be made, except of those claims which had been submitted to the auditor and comptroller, to be scaled in the manner which I have stated. The act further provides, that no payment shall be made, even out of those $2,000,000, until the authorities of Texas were informed by those of the United States that this Government was ready to issue $5,000,000 of stock, which yet remained behind. And it further provides, that the payment is not then to be made, unless the holder of a claim will give a receipt to the accounting officers of Texas, stating that the amount received is in full satisfaction of the demand, and also releasing the Government of the United States from all liability to pay the amount of the demand.

These are the facts, which I have felt it my duty to state, by way of explaining the petition which Mr. Combs has desired me to present. He states that he is not willing to submit to be scaled in this way; and he exhibits a report, showing that such debts as his have been rated at seventy cents on the dollar. Others have been rated at fifty cents, some at thirty cents, some at twenty-five cents, and some even as low as twenty cents on the dollar. One of these acts stops the payment of interest on the part of Texas, after the 1st of May, or 1st of July, 1850. He sets out all these facts, and states that he is not willing to submit thus to be scaled, and looks upon the Government of the United States as liable to pay the amount of his demand; having, by the passage of the law of September, 1850, assumed the debts for which the duties pledged by Texas were liable. All his claims are of that character, falling within the description of those that were to be scaled at the rate of seventy cents on the dollar.

There is also a decision of the Secretary of the Treasury, made a part of this petition, which I, perhaps, ought to state. The Treasury Department have required the whole of the creditors of Texas, who were provided for by the legislation of Congress, to file their releases before the retained $5,000,000 can be handed over to Texas; and, considering all these debts of General Combs embraced in the provision made by Congress, his claim cannot be paid until all the creditors release their claims.

These are, substantially, the facts of the case; and, to show the urgency of it, I will conclude by reading the latter part of General Combs's petition. He says: "Your petitioner has thus plainly presented his case to the Congress of the United States, and hopes he will not be considered impudent in urging their early attention to his individual claim, or to the passage of some general law, which will afford him relief, when he informs them that, at this very moment, the dwelling in which he left his wife and children has been levied on by the sheriff, and must be sold, if justice is either much longer delayed or refused him." Now, under this presentation of facts, I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and I beg them to consider the urgency, and take the subject into immediate consideration.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. President, I desire to say a single word. We have had a good deal of ex parte lecturing upon the subject of the Texas debt, both in and out of Congress; and I do trust and hope, that, whatever committee this petition shall go to, will furnish us with a report which shall legitimately bring up that subject for discussion. If I am not mistaken, the honorable Senator from Kentucky himself, in an argument in regard to a certain bill which passed here, appropriating $10,000,000 to Texas, assumed that, what he now terms the scaled debt of Texas, was the real debt; and offered some reasons why that amount of $10,000,000 should not be appropriated, because a less amount would pay the debt. I remember very well, that when I was before the committee of thirteen, I stated what was the amount of the Texas debt. It was upwards of $12,000,000. The appropriation made by the Government of the United States was only to the amount of $10,000,000.

I do not intend to go into this matter now; but I hope some bill will come before Congress, by which the whole of the facts in this case can be stated; and I pledge myself then to show what Government it is, Texas or the United States, that in this matter is the repudiator. I will show where the repudiating is. I know that the appropriation of $10,000,000 has furnished a fruitful theme for stump speeches all over the country; and whenever this matter comes before Congress in such a shape as to justify its investigation, I will show that, in any court of conscience or equity, the United States are bound for more than two thirds of the debt of Texas, by a policy which, in any other Government would have been disgraceful.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I cautiously avoided expressing an opinion upon the subject to which I called the attention of the Senate. I felt a sentiment of delicacy that operated upon me, to prevent an expression of any opinion of mine whatever, and intentionally avoided it. It is true, as the gentleman from Texas well knows, that I have expressed my opinion heretofore against the liability of this Government for the whole of these claims. Congress settled it against my opinion. I did not intend to revive that; but I merely called the attention of the Senate to the facts, as represented by the memorialist, without giving any opinion of my own. If the gentleman supposes that I intended to make any reflection upon his State, or to commit myself in one way or the other, he is entirely mistaken. I did not expect that he would have made any allusion to my past conduct, when these subjects were under discussion years ago, merely because I chose to present the memorial of a constituent, and state his views of the subject, founded upon the laws of Texas. I make this statement to show that I stand fully uncommitted in reference to the merits of this memorial, when the report of the committee shall come in. But I will say this, in behalf of the memorialist, that, according to everything which appears to me, he is entitled to a very large sum for these $69,200; and, as the Government has retained $5,000,000 until Texas shall make provision for such claims as his, and Texas has not yet made that provision, it becomes this Government to see that my constituents, as well as yours, sir, shall be paid out of the $5,000,000 retained. I think that is proper. But I do not wish to go into the subject now; and I am sorry that the gentleman has adverted to my conduct heretofore, which has drawn these remarks from me.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT. This discussion is not in order. The question is merely on the reference of the memorial to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. RUSK. I know it is; but I believe, on the question of reference, subjects involved in memorials are frequently debated. I simply wish to say, in answer to the honorable Senator, that I alluded to him in no unkindness. I merely referred to him because he formerly assumed what the Texas Legislature assumed, that they were only bound to pay the amount made available to them. I did not intend to express any opinion on that assumption—either to sanction the proceedings of Texas, or to say that the honorable Senator, when he assumed that argument in relation to the Texas bill, was right.

I have read the memorial which has just been presented, and it is in perfectly respectful language towards Texas. It shows a very strong case against the Government of the United States. It shows that when the Government of the United States undertook to act as a commissioner in bankruptcy over the State of Texas, it passed a very absurd reservation. I have read it very carefully; and it is couched in terms to which nobody in Texas, or anywhere else, can take exception. It is a plain statement of the case of the memorialist. It shows this fact: that he went forward and complied with the terms of the law of the United States requiring releases to be filed at the Treasury before payment could be made. He went forward instantly, and filed his release to the United States; and that very fact precluded him from complying with the Texas law in submitting his claim to Texas. He complied with the United States law; and that law is couched in such terms, that, until releases are filed for the very last dollar of the Texas debt, none of it can be paid. A large portion of the debt is held by orphans and minors, who cannot come forward now and file releases. The Government of the United States, by this provision, has placed him in a position where he cannot avail himself of the law of Texas, and, at the same time, puts him at the mercy of every creditor of Texas; for if the last one, having a thousand dollar claim, should refuse to file a release at the Treasury Department, not one single dollar of the five millions could be paid out.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ARSENAL IN GEORGIA.

Mr. DAWSON. I have received from the Governor of the State of Georgia, resolutions concurred in by both branches of the General Assembly of that State. They represent that the Government of the United States has established in the vicinity of Augusta, Georgia, an arsenal under the direction of the Ordnance Department; and they ask that, from its location, the dryness and salubrity of the climate, the great and increasing facilities of communication with the seaboard and the interior, Congress should take into consideration the propriety of increasing the number of arms placed in that arsenal. They also ask that inasmuch as a canal has been cut through the lands which inclose the arsenal, by which there is created a fine water power, such machinery may be erected as may be necessary to preserve the arms, and put them in proper order in time of emergency. I move that the resolutions be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC EXPENDITURES.

Mr. DAWSON. I have also received, Mr. President, a petition from a number of citizens of Harris county, in the State of Georgia, men known to myself to be very respectable, asking of Congress to take into consideration the public expenditures of the country. They state that they have seen a charge that the Administration of this Government is chargeable for these large disbursements of the public revenue; and they ask whether it is not within the power of Congress to restrain it? whether any officer of this Government, or in the Administration, can use the public money without an appropriation first being made by Congress? They make this request in order that a report may be set before the country to ascertain whether the executive or the legislative department is responsible for these vast appropriations. They also state that they have seen, with alarm, the increase of what are called mail facilities by the General Government, appropriating large sums of money for the construction of ocean steamers. They ask that Congress may take that subject into consideration, and ascertain whether that system is kept up merely for the purpose of gratifying national pride, or whether it is for the convenience of the country at large. The same petitioners also enter their protest against the extension of Woodworth's patent. I move that this portion of the petition may be referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office; and that the remainder of it may be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BRADBURY. I think part of that memorial ought to go to the Committee on Retrenchment.

Mr. DAWSON. I would ask of the gentleman from Maine, who is at the head of that committee, whether they would probably report on the subject.

Mr. BRADBURY. We will endeavor to let the gentleman from Georgia understand that there is such a committee, if he will make that reference.

Mr. DAWSON. As the memorial treats of financial questions, I thought it would be proper to refer it to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RUSK. I think it would be better to refer it to the Baltimore or Philadelphia Convention. [Laughter.]

The motion to refer was agreed to.

WOODWORTH PATENT.

Mr. BORLAND. I present the memorial of a number of citizens of Arkansas, among whom I recognize the name of the Governor, and most of the principal officers of the State, remonstrating against the further extension of the Woodworth patent for a planing machine. In presenting it, I deem it proper to say that if it had been received under ordinary circumstances, as I have received many others of the same kind, I should not have attached a great deal of importance to it. But it is accompanied by a letter from a gentleman of my State, Mr. George Brodie, a man of remarkable intelligence, and perhaps one of the best mechanics in the United States, who, from his general understanding of the subject, and his observation throughout the Western country, is well qualified to give information on this matter. He points out in his letter very strong, and, to my mind, satisfactory reasons why no further extension of that patent should be granted. I have deemed it proper to say thus much in regard to the memorial on presenting it. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. CLARKE, it was Ordered, That the petition of Nancy Bowen, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. SEWARD, it was Ordered, That the petition of Sarah Crandall, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. CLEMENS, it was Ordered, That the documents on the files of the Senate, relating to the claim of Jim Capers, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion by Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, it was Ordered, That Henry H. Marsh have leave to withdraw the documents on the files of the Senate, relating to his claim.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. President, I feel it due to myself, as well as to the Senate, to make a short explanation of a circumstance which occurred here some ten days ago, and which, I fear, may have been misapprehended. On Friday week last, I was about to leave here for the North. On the morning of that day, supposing that the bill for the relief of Elizabeth Arnold had, by a vote of the Senate, been laid upon the table, I moved that it be taken from the table and reinstated on the Calendar. I was under the impression that it had been laid on the table; and when I made the motion the Senate very courteously acceded to it, and ordered the bill to be reinstated on the Calendar. About an hour afterwards, I was told by the Secretary at the desk that the bill had been rejected and not laid upon the table. A debate was going on, and I could make no personal explanation to the Senate; nor had I any opportunity to move that the Senate recede from the vote ordering the bill to be reinstated on the Calendar; but, being about to go away, I requested my friend from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] to make a statement of the facts, and ask the Senate to recede from that vote and put the bill in the same condition that it was before I made my motion. Fearing, however, that he might forget it, I requested the Secretary to remind him of it, so that it should certainly be done. Yesterday, on my return, I found, on conversation with the Senator from New Jersey, that that explanation had not been given, and that the Chair, feeling himself bound to do so, had stated to the Senate the facts so far as they were within his knowledge.

I make this explanation now, merely for the purpose of assuring the Senate that I made the motion under an entire misapprehension as to the disposition which had been made of the bill. I supposed that it had been laid on the table and not rejected. On that supposition, I made the request which was so courteously complied with by the Senate. If my honorable friend from North Carolina, who happened to be out of the Chamber at the moment of adjournment on that day, had been present at that time, the vote would have been receded from. I went away, supposing that it had been done; and I have taken the first opportunity, on my return, to make this explanation, for the purpose of showing that it was from an entire misapprehension that the course proposed by myself was adopted by the Senate.

Mr. BADGER. I wish to explain, in this connection, why I appeared negligent of the request made by the Senator from Rhode Island. I did not either forget or overlook it; but a debate was going on at the time he made it, and while the debate was going on, I stepped out of the Senate chamber for a moment, having no idea at all that the debate would be concluded, or an adjournment moved before I should return. On returning, however, after an absence of about five minutes, I met the Senators leaving the chamber, the Senate having adjourned.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will take occasion to state that, on bringing the subject to the attention of the Senate, he said expressly that the motion was made by a mistake of the Senator from Rhode Island, and therefore he did not direct it to be put on the Journal. He considered that the motion was not really made, inasmuch as the order of business precluded it.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill for the redemption of certain Choctaw annuities, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which the memorial of citizens of the District of Columbia, and a resolution passed by the Legislature of Maryland, were referred, reported a bill for the improvement of Maryland avenue, from the Capitol to the turnpike road leading to Baltimore, and for making free and improving that road as far as the District line; which was read, and passed to the second reading. He submitted a report on the subject, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred a report of the Secretary of War of the 24th March, reported a bill directing a survey and estimate of the cost of constructing a canal basin at the terminus of the Ohio and Chesapeake canal, in Georgetown; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the petition of Mary E. D. Blaney, widow of the late Major George Blaney, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for her relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRODHEAD, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the petition of John A. Lynch, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. STOCKTON, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the memorial of Mary F. B. Levely, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for her relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

ST. GENEVIEVE PLANK ROAD.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to grant the right of way to the St. Genevieve, Iron mountain, Pilot Knob Plank Road Company; which was read a first time and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. GEYER. I hope that bill will be considered now. It proposes nothing but to grant the right of way to the plank road company from St. Genevieve, and Iron mountain, to Pilot Knob. It will hardly take five minutes to pass it; and it is important that it should be passed at an early day. The road is one of great importance, and persons are engaged now in entering the lands. I do not know of any instance in which the request has been refused when reasonably asked for.

No objection being made, the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the right of way shall be granted to said company for the road now in process of construction between St. Genevieve and Iron mountain, so called, in Missouri; and authorizes them to locate said road through any of the public lands of the United States which lie on the route selected for the location of the road, to survey and mark through said public lands a tract on the side of the road of one hundred feet in width; and furthermore, an additional quantity of twenty-five feet in width along each side of the road; which land shall be reserved from sale, and shall be vested in the State of Missouri for the use of said Plank Road Company forever, and for no other use. It enacts, further, that the company shall have the privilege to cut and use all such timber, and use all such stone, gravel, and other materials on the public lands of the United States, as may be necessary for the construction and repair of the road, to erect such buildings, &c., as the same may require, use such water as may be wanted, and cross such streams as may be necessary for the completion and use of the road; provided, that said company, when said plank road shall be completed, shall carry the mails of the United States on such terms as the Postmaster General may be enabled to contract for similar service with other plank road companies.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. BORLAND. I rise, Mr. President, to make a report—a somewhat informal, and perhaps anomalous, one—from the Committee on Printing.

It is, perhaps, known to the Senate, or at least to many members of it, that a new arrangement has been, or is about to be made for the execution of the public printing. In view of this, I deem it proper for myself, and my duty to the Senate, to state, in my place here, what has been done by the committee in regard to it.

For this purpose I will read certain resolutions adopted by the Committee on Printing.

The first resolution, adopted on the 8th of this month, is in these words:

Resolved, That the committee enter into a contract with Donelson & Armstrong to do the future printing of the present Congress in the House, and with Gideon & Co. for the Senate, upon such terms as shall be agreed upon hereafter."

Adopted. Yeas—SMITH, of the Senate, and GORMAN, STANTON, and HAVEN, of the House—4; Nays—BORLAND and HAMLIN, of the Senate—2.

The second resolution, adopted on the 12th, (this day,) is in these words:

Resolved, That for so much of the public printing as may be deemed necessary by the committee to remedy any neglect or delay on the part of the contractor, Mr. Hamilton, to execute the work ordered by Congress, the persons doing the work, under the direction of this committee, be allowed the same price as contained in Mr. Rives's bid for printing for the Thirty-second Congress: Provided, That in no case shall pay be allowed for double composition."

Adopted. Yeas—SMITH, of the Senate, and GORMAN, STANTON, and HAVEN, of the House—4; Nays—HAMLIN of the Senate—1.

The third resolution is in these words:

Resolved, That Mr. GORMAN confer with Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong, and with Messrs. Gideon & Co., and get from them, in writing, their acceptance or non-acceptance of the foregoing proposition."

Adopted, April 12—no dissent.

Mr. President, it is due to myself to remark the fact, that these resolutions of the Printing Committee were adopted without my concurrence. I was present when the first was adopted, and was absent when the last two were adopted.

In my opinion, the committee have the power here exercised under the joint resolution of August 3, 1846, under which the Committee on Printing was raised, and under which it has acted up to this time, and is now acting.

There are many members of both Houses of Congress, and particularly of the Senate, who dissent from this opinion—who do not believe the committee have any such power; but, on the contrary, believe that, when there is a failure on the part of the contractor, as in the present instance, to comply with his obligations, as to time and the quality of his work, it becomes the duty, as it is only their authority, to bring the whole subject before Congress, as one that can be legitimately disposed of by Congress alone, by additional legislation, instead of disposing of it definitively by the action of the committee; and this difference of opinion I am bound to hold in high respect.

I repeat, however, that I do entertain, and unhesitatingly express, as I have well considered, the opinion that the committee do, technically, or in the terms of the law, have this power even to the extent they have exercised it in this case. But while I hold this opinion as to the power itself, I am equally clear in the opinion, and as unhesitatingly express it, that it has been improperly exercised in this case. And that this is so, I remind the Senate that it has been done in part against my vote, when I was present, and altogether without my concurrence or approval.

In justice to myself, and to the Senate committee too, I must state further, that I think the process by which this improper action of the joint committee has been consummated has been, in itself, equally improper. I think the rule which obtains in joint committees—which are in their constitution like committees of conference, and should in their powers and action represent equally each its respective House—has been violated. That rule, as I understand and believe, requires a majority of each committee to make a concurrent vote of the two, or a final decision of the joint committee upon any question before them. In this opinion, however, as in the others I have presented, a majority of the Senate committee have been overruled by the vote of the House conjoined with that of one member of the Senate committee.

This statement, Mr. President, as plain and as brief as I could make it, places the matter of the public printing, as affected by the present action of the committee, fairly before the Senate. It is for the Senate itself to consider and determine what shall be done, if anything, in regard to it.

For myself, believing that this action of the joint committee has not been proper—believing that the policy adopted by the committee is wrong in itself, has been adopted by improper means, and requires wrong to be done, though by authority of law—I cannot, with my sense of self-respect and of duty to myself and the public interest, become the instrument (as I should be as chairman of the committee) of its consummation.

Without disrespect, therefore, to any of the committee, and without undertaking to censure what they have done, I conclude by asking the Senate to excuse me from further service on the Committee on Printing.

The request was complied with, and on motion by Mr. GWIN, and by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the President of the Senate fill the vacancy on the committee.

The President appointed Mr. RUSK.

DISTRICT JUDGE OF ILLINOIS.

Mr. SHIELDS submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be requested to inquire into the expediency of increasing the salary of the judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Illinois, to the sum of $2,000 per annum.

NEW MAIL ROUTE.

Mr. SHIELDS submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be requested to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route "from Jerseyville, in Illinois, via Jersey Landing and Portage des Sioux, to St. Charles, in Missouri."

COMMISSIONER TO CHINA.

Mr. BADGER submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations inquire into the expediency of allowing an outfit to the Commissioner to China.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HUNTER, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill appropriating land-scrip in full and final satisfaction of Virginia military bounty land warrants; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MORTON, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to authorize the sale of reserved lands, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, announcing that it had passed a bill entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of James C. Watson, of Georgia; and that it had agreed to the first, and disagreed to the second amendment of the Senate to their amendment to the joint resolution to authorize the continuance of the work upon the two wings of the Capitol.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of James C. Watson, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BILLS PASSED.

The following engrossed bills were severally read a third time and passed:

An act for the relief of Frances E. Baden; and An act for the relief of Anna Norton and Lewis Foskit.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRADBURY. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoliation committed by the French prior to July 31, 1801.

The PRESIDENT. There are some bills on the table which the Chair will put upon their passage with the consent of the Senate.

Mr. BRADBURY. They can be taken up any other time.

Mr. GWIN. I hope we will take up the unfinished business of Thursday last. We then adjourned in the midst of a vote, because there was no quorum present.

Mr. HUNTER. Before the vote is taken on the motion, I think it would be better to dispose of the bills upon the table. I hope that course will be taken.

Mr. BRADBURY. I have no objection to disposing of those bills if my motion will stand next in order. I supposed that it was the common understanding that the French spoliation bill would be taken up this morning, yet I find several Senators proposing to press other bills.

Mr. BADGER. I would suggest a compromise to my friend from Maine, that, whether his motion is agreed to or not, it shall be the common understanding that if he allows the bills upon that table to be disposed of his motion will then be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. BRADBURY. Very well.

The PRESIDENT. The joint resolution providing for the continuance of the work upon the two wings of the Capitol has been returned from the House with the following message:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives agree to the first amendment, and disagree to the second amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the joint resolution to authorize the continuance of the work upon the two wings of the Capitol.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to concur in the action of the House.

Mr. BRADBURY. I am admonished that this will lead to debate, and therefore renew my motion to postpone all prior order to take up the French spoliation bill.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the resolution of the House will be acted upon; it will lead to no debate. Let us finish one thing at a time. I give notice that, if we postpone prior orders, I am ready with the deficiency bill, and will struggle to get it up.

Mr. PRATT. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the motion.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator from Maine will not press his motion. I think this other measure should be disposed of now; and besides that, I must insist on having the compromise finally resolutions taken up, if other matters are brought forward. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. I dislike to interpose, but I have been waiting a week or two for a chance to get the action of the Senate upon the territorial business. The House of Representatives has set apart next Monday for the disposition of such business. There are three or four territorial bills here, which it is necessary to pass; and I shall appeal to the Senate to take them up—they will probably take but an hour or two—either to-day or to-morrow. I feel it my duty to give this notice, because if they are not passed in time to be referred to, and reported from, the committee in the House, before Monday next, they will have to go over to next session.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to state to the Senate, that we adjourned on Thursday evening, on the taking of the yeas and nays on a question, which was thoroughly debated, and can now be disposed of in a short time. I hope that it, being the unfinished business, will be taken up now.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to say that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. CHASE] is now absent, in the Supreme Court room, and he desired me to say that, when the bill to which the Senator from California refers, comes up, he desires to submit his views. He has prepared some tabular statements upon it, which he will submit to the Senate, and at his request I ask that this subject may be postponed until he returns.

Mr. GWIN. We can send for him very soon.

Mr. BRADBURY. I supposed that it was the common understanding that, after two months time, the courtesy of the Senate would be extended to-day, to considering and acting upon the bill which I have moved to take up. I therefore insist upon my motion, and hope the yeas and nays will be ordered upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I beg to inform the Senate once more that, if they intend to pass the Cumberland dam bill, they ought to do it now. If we intend to do anything for that work, time is passing by, and it is time to put the hands to work; I therefore hope that will have the precedence after you have got your Capitol bill disposed of, and appropriations for other quarters. I do not intend to make any speech about it; if the Senate will take it up, I am for voting upon it.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Maine, to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the bill named by him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know that; and I present this as a reason why I think we ought to vote it down, and take up the Cumberland dam bill in preference to his bill.

Mr. RUSK. For fear I may be misunderstood, I think it necessary to say that I intend to vote to take up the French spoliation bill. I am opposed to the bill itself, but shall vote to take it up, because I think we ought to get through with it. There are three subjects which I want to see disposed of; one is the Woodworth patent, the second the French spoliation bill, and the third the intervention question. [Laughter.] I want to get clear of them all, and shall therefore vote to take them up for the purpose of getting clear of them.

The question being taken, by yeas and nays, on the motion to postpone all prior orders, with the view of taking up the French spoliation bill, resulted—yeas 23, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Bayard, Bradbury, Clarke, Davis, Dodge of Iowa, Downs, Fish, Hale, Hamlin, James, Jones of Iowa, Mallory, Miller, Norris, Pratt, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Smith, Spruance, Sumner, and Wade—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Borland, Brodhead, Brooke, Cass, Clemens, Dawson, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Felch, Geyer, Gwin, Hunter, King, Mangum, Morton, Underwood, and Walker—19.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BADGER. I hope it will not be considered a violation of order to say that I shall, on Thursday next, if nothing particular or special intervenes, ask the Senate to take up the finality of the compromise resolution, in order that I may finish a speech which I commenced on the first of February, on that subject.

FRENCH SPOLIATIONS.

The Senate accordingly proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the bill to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to July 31, 1801.

Mr. BRADBURY. I thank the Senate for this expression of their willingness to consider this bill at the present time; and, as the best return I can make for this courtesy, I will say that, as the subject has been so often discussed, and is, or ought to be, so well understood, I am willing to submit it to the action of the Senate without detaining Senators by any extended remarks from me. I desire votes rather than speeches. The claimants, constituting a large number of our citizens, have, for half a century, been making application to Congress for redress, without being able, except on three or four occasions, to obtain a direct vote upon the subject of their application.

Perhaps I ought to explain in a few words the provisions of the bill.

It will be sufficient to say that it contemplates the appropriation of an amount not exceeding $5,000,000, in full satisfaction of the claims of our citizens for the spoliations referred to. It provides for the appointment of a board of commissioners, whose duty it shall be to ascertain the validity and amount of the demands of the several claimants; it contemplates the appropriation of the $5,000,000 at a future time; and further provides that the claimants shall receive a pro rata dividend, in case the aggregate of their claims exceed the amount of $5,000,000, and that they shall file, with their respective claims, a release, declaring that the dividend they may receive shall be a full discharge. It is my purpose, in order to secure a faithful execution of the commission, to offer an additional section to the bill, providing for the appointment of an attorney to the board, whose duty it shall be to resist all unjust claims, and protect the interests of the United States, and of the fund that may be appropriated to carry the bill into effect. Having said thus much, I propose to submit the bill for the action of the Senate. I prefer to let the twenty-eight favorable reports that have been made by committees of Congress advocate its justice. I prefer to let Marshall, Madison, Monroe, Livingston, and other distinguished men of that day, who were acquainted and identified with the facts, out of which the claims arose, speak in their behalf. If they are not heard, nothing that I can say will be likely to receive attention.

Perhaps, in frankness, I ought to state the position upon which the claims are placed. We contend—

1st. That previous to the ratification of the convention of September 30, 1800, numerous American citizens had just demands against the Government of France, for property of the value of several millions of dollars, seized and confiscated under authority of that Government, in violation of treaties and national law, for which France was bound to make indemnity to the sufferers.

2d. These demands were recognized and insisted upon by our Government as just.

3d. Their justice was acknowledged by France, who professed her readiness to make indemnity, and at the same time preferred claims of her own against the United States.

4th. Our Government undertook the prosecution of these demands, invited the sufferers to forward their evidence, and pledged the public faith that proper proceedings should be adopted for their relief.

5th. Our Government, in the ratification of the convention of September 30, 1800, canceled these demands, and, in distinct terms, forever released and discharged France from all claims therefor.

6th. Our Government obtained for this release a renunciation by France of claims of a national character which she preferred against the United States, for which our negotiators had offered large sums of money, and the offer had been repeatedly rejected by the French authorities.

These are the positions upon which we rest the bill, and I am willing to leave it here. I believe that the facts are sufficiently understood to rest the claims without a further exposition of them. If there is nothing urged against them, I shall willingly leave the matter here; if anything is urged, I shall desire an opportunity to make only a brief reply to such points as may be pressed, where silence might lead to misapprehension, but not to go into an elaborate discussion of the subject.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have heretofore voted for this bill, and I intend to do so again; but there is one clause of it which I wish to have amended, if the Senator from Maine will consent to it. The bill now states that this stock is to be payable at any time, at the pleasure of the Government, after twenty years. I desire to strike out from the thirteenth line of the seventh section the words "twenty years from."

Mr. BRADBURY. I accept of that modification.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I see no reason why we should hamper the Government in its operations. If the bill is amended in the manner I have proposed, it will read, "and each certificate of stock shall be redeemable at the pleasure of the United States at any time after the date of the termination of said commission."

Mr. HALE. I want to suggest to the gentleman who had charge of this bill, that if the amendment is adopted, some notice should be given when these certificates shall be redeemable. I think the Government should give at least twelve months' notice.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Say six months.

Mr. BRADBURY. Twelve months, I think, would be better.

Mr. HALE. I move to insert "twelve months."

The PRESIDENT. It is not in order to move that amendment till the question is taken on the motion to strike out.

The motion to strike out the words "twenty years from" was then agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I now move to add at the end of the section the words "upon twelve months' notice."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRADBURY. I will now offer an amendment, which I propose as an additional section:

"And be it further enacted, That an attorney to said board be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, whose duty it shall be to resist all unjust claims, and protect the interest of the United States, and of the fund that may be appropriated to carry this bill into execution; and to this end he shall have power to examine witnesses, and to cause testimony to be taken, and have access to all testimony before the commission for the purpose of examining it, and the right to be heard in all cases. He shall be sworn to a faithful performance of his duty as attorney, and shall be entitled to the same compensation as one of the commissioners."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS. Is it in order to move now to lay this bill on the table?

The PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS. As that will be a test question, I make that motion; for if the majority are inclined to pass the bill, I will offer some amendments, which I desire to have adopted if it passes. If it is not to pass, it is useless to consume the time in considering the amendments.

Mr. FELCH. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion for a short time.

Mr. ADAMS. I withdraw it with pleasure, to accommodate the Senator.

Mr. BORLAND. I move to amend the first section of the bill by striking out of the fourth and fifth lines, the words "to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars."

Mr. MILLER. How will the bill read then?

The PRESIDENT. It will make it unlimited.

Mr. WELLER. Then it will take a hundred millions of dollars to cover all the claims.

Mr. BORLAND. The object of the amendment is to strike out the limitation of five millions of dollars, which is now contained in the bill.

It seems to me that those who contend, as the advocates of this bill do contend—I am not one of them—that these are just claims against the Government of the United States, cannot fairly and properly, or with any regard for that justice to the claimants, on which they so much insist, limit the amount to be paid. If we recognize these claims at all, as constituting a debt—as we shall do by the passage of this bill—we must recognize all that may be proved. That is my view of the justice of the case. I do not see, and have never been able to understand, how far, or on what principle, we can, with justice or propriety, limit the amount to be paid. We know that a large number of these claimants are children. Now, because some of the claimants, in person or by their attorneys, come forward and ask us to reduce the amount, so that the country may not be frightened at the enormous amount, and the Congress might not dare to burden the Treasury with it, as they will do by recognizing it as a debt—because such claimants, who are willing to catch at a part rather than risk the loss of the whole, as they fear they would do if the whole thing was exposed beforehand, come here and ask us to reduce it to an amount which the country might be induced to tolerate, and Congress may venture to give—shall we, I ask, from considerations like these, violate the very principle upon which, alone, we dare recognize the claims at all, and in disregard and derogation of the claims of these children, who, if we owe them at all, cannot release us from any part of it, unless we pay them all? I ask, shall we do this?

I have not risen to make a speech; I shall not attempt one. My only purpose was to indicate what I regard as the principle in the case—the only principle—and what, in my opinion, inevitably follows as our duty, if it be recognized as a principle at all. We either owe the money, or we do not. If we owe any, we owe what can be proved; and that we must pay in full, or we repudiate the just debts of the Government. We cannot properly compound with our creditors without acknowledging ourselves either bankrupt or dishonest. I do not believe we are the former, and I cannot acknowledge we are the latter. If we do not owe it as a debt, we have no authority, no right, to give the public money away.

Mr. BRADBURY. The Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FELCH,] I believe, had a design to make some remarks to the Senate in regard to this bill, and I hope that he may be allowed to proceed. With his permission, however, I will occupy a moment or two in response to what has fallen from the Senator from Arkansas. That Senator moves to strike out of the bill the words "to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars," and argues that, if anything should be paid, the whole amount should be paid. At the same time, the honorable Senator informs us that he is individually opposed to the payment of anything. It would be a sufficient answer to the argument of the honorable Senator to say, that the claimants generally would be very glad to obtain their dividends of the five millions proposed to be appropriated. They are satisfied with this amount, and the motion to increase it or leave it indefinite, does not come from them.

I have heard another remark, that very probably this bill would involve the expenditure of an indefinite amount—twenty, thirty, or perhaps a hundred millions of dollars. Permit me to say that the claims were estimated at the time by our envoys to France at from fifteen to twenty millions of dollars. This embraced the entire mass of the claims—the claims of those who have received satisfaction under the Louisiana treaty, as well as those who have been paid under the Florida treaty. There has been received, under those treaties and a subsequent treaty, in round numbers $7,157,000.

If, then, the whole claims amounted to the largest estimate of $20,000,000, there would be now due $12,842,954. If, however, that estimate was too large, and the amount due was but $15,000,000, there would still remain to this class of claimants, who have received nothing, $7,843,000.

But, sir, I think the principle is a correct one, which is proposed to be adopted in this bill. The Government of the United States undertook the prosecution of these claims, and received, in consideration for their release, a discharge from the claims made by France against the Government of the United States. The Government did not receive compensation in dollars and cents, but it received a release from claims against itself. These claims were indefinite in amount, and had to be estimated. There is no tribunal to estimate them except the Congress of the United States. They are, I repeat, indefinite in amount, and they might have swelled to $20,000,000, or a $100,000,000; or they might, in the judgment of some, have fallen to $5,000,000. By this bill Congress undertakes to estimate the amount of the claims of France, which was consideration received, and fixes it at $5,000,000. We thus determine that the claims against France were worth $5,000,000 to the claimants, and that that is the value of the consideration received by our Government for these releases. It would not be correct to assume the amount of a claim to be in all cases the true measure of damages, when the Government makes itself liable to the claimant; but the value of it to the claimant, and that is to be determined in this case, in part, by the value of the consideration received in exchange, which we fix at $5,000,000.

But this amendment is urged by those who are opposed to paying anything. It is not for them to make this objection when the claimants say that although their demands may be greater, they are willing to accept $5,000,000 in full compensation of all their claims.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask the yeas nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FELCH. If the Senator who proposed to lay this bill on the table desires now to test the sense of the Senate on that question, I will yield the floor in order that he may make the motion.

Mr. ADAMS. I withdraw the motion with great pleasure.

Mr. FELCH. If the question is not taken on that motion, I desire before the vote is taken on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas, to say something on the subject.

The honorable gentleman then proceeded to address the Senate on the subject generally; and having spoken for some time without concluding, he gave way.

And on motion the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, April 12, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of Friday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the reception of petitions from the State of Maine.

[A message was here received from the Senate by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., their Secretary, notifying the House that the Senate had concurred in the amendments of the House to the joint resolution authorizing the continuance of the work upon the Capitol, with certain amendments, in which they asked the concurrence of the House.]

BUSINESS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. COBB. My object in rising this morning, is to ask the unanimous consent of the House, that the business upon the Speaker's table be taken up and referred—that is, such business, only, as will not give rise to debate. I do this disinterestedly, desiring that the business upon the Speaker's table may be referred to the committees and acted upon.

Mr. KING. Such as may not be objected to.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object to any qualification. I would be willing to go to the business referred to regularly.

Mr. COBB. I move a suspension of the rules for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of such business upon the Speaker's table as may not give rise to debate.

Mr. SMART. I claim the right to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is entitled to the floor, and moves to suspend the rules to enable him to submit a motion to proceed to such business upon the Speaker's table as will not give rise to debate.

Mr. SMART. The Speaker having called the State of Maine for petitions, I claim the floor for that purpose, as one of the Representatives of that State.

The SPEAKER. Maine was called for petitions, but it is also in order to move to suspend the rules.

Mr. COBB. I hope the gentleman will interpose no objection.

The question was then taken, and the House refused to suspend the rules, to go to the business upon the Speaker's table.

THE ADDITIONS TO THE CAPITOL.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. The joint resolution for the continuance of the work on the extensions of the Capitol, has just been reported from the Senate, and I desire the unanimous consent of the House, that it may now be taken up and disposed of. But, before making that request, I will state what I desire doing in reference to the matter. Two amendments have been made, by the Senate, to the resolution: one restricting the architect and the Secretary of the Interior, in their contracts, to the amount of the appropriation. I have no objection to that amendment, and shall move that the House concur in it. The other amendments propose to indemnify the workmen for the loss of their time, during the suspension of the work upon the wings of the Capitol—to pay them, as if they had been to work during the whole period. I will move to reject that amendment. It will not take five minutes to dispose of the resolution. I hope it may be taken up.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

Mr. BROOKS. Money will be saved, if the resolution is now considered.

Mr. FLOYD objected.

Mr. STANTON. Objection being made, I move a suspension of the rules, for the purpose I have indicated.

Mr. OLDS. The resolution is upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The resolution referred to was reported a few moments ago, from the Senate.

Mr. OLDS. We have just refused to proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table, and this joint resolution lies there.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moved to take from the Speaker's table a particular resolution, which being objected to, he moves a suspension of the rules for the purpose of submitting that motion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Georgia, demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

The question was then put, and it was decided in the affirmative. And the rules were suspended.

The amendments of the Senate were then read by the Clerk, as follows:

1. Provided, Nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize any officer, or agent of the United States, to bind the United States by contract, beyond the amount appropriated by Congress, or to sanction any such contract heretofore made.

2. That the architect appointed by the President of the United States to superintend the prosecution of the work in the construction of the additions to the Capitol, be, and he is hereby authorized, to examine the claims of the workmen to indemnify for the loss of their time during the suspension of the work upon said additions for want of an appropriation; and that the said architect allow to such of said workmen respectively as were suspended from labor during the pendency of this joint resolution, making such appropriation, with the encouragement, and under an authorized assurance, that upon the said appropriation being made their labor would again be required by the Government, and who, intermediately, had no opportunity of obtaining employment in the city of Washington, such reasonable indemnity for the loss of their wages for labor during the suspension of the work, as under the circumstances of their respective cases, justice and equity may require; not exceeding, however, in any case, the average rate of the earnings of said workmen in the employment of the Government for a like preceding period of time.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker—

[Cries of "Call the previous question!" "Call the previous question!"]

Mr. STANTON. If the previous question can be called upon both amendments, I do so.

The SPEAKER. The call for the previous question would operate upon both.

Mr. STANTON. I call for the previous question then.

Mr. ORR. Do I understand the gentleman to move to non-concur in the second amendment?

Mr. STANTON. That is the understanding. The call for the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question was then put upon the first amendment, and it was agreed to.

The question now being on the adoption of the second amendment,

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. ORR. Is the vote upon a motion of non-concurrence in the amendment?

The SPEAKER. The regular vote is upon the adoption of the amendment. That there may be no misunderstanding upon the part of any gentleman in regard to the nature of the vote, those in favor of the amendment will vote "yea," those opposed "nay."

The question was then taken upon the adoption of the second amendment of the Senate, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 19, nays 136, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barrere, Bowne, Dean, Florence, Gentry, Gorman, Harper, Martin, Newton, Samuel W. Parker, Poik, Price, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Stanley, Walsh, Washburn, and Yates—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, Allison, John Appleton, William Appleton, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Bennett, Bocoek, Bragg, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, Buell, Burrows, E. Carrington Cabell, Joseph Cabell, Lewis D. Campbell, Chandler, Chapman, Chastain, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Curtis, Daniel, John G. Davis, Dockery, Doty, Dunham, Durkee, Eastman, Edgeron, Edmundson, Picklin, Fitch, Floyd, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Goodenow, Grey, Hall, Hamilton, Hammond, Isham G. Harris, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Hibbard, Hillyer, Horsford, Houston, Howard, John W. Howe, Hunter, Jackson, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Gandy Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Landry, Leifer, Lockhart, Mace, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, McCorkle, McDonald, McLanahan, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, McEacham, Miller, Milson, Molony, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morehead, Murray, Nabers, Olds, Orr, Outlaw, Andrew Parker, Penslee, Penn, Pennington, Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Robbins, Ross, Russell, Scudder, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Smith, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abram P. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, St. Martin, Statton, Strother, Stuart, Sutherland, Taylor, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Tuck, Walbridge, Wallace, Ward, Watkins, Wells, Alexander White, Wilcox, Williams, and Woodward—136.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STANTON. I move that the votes by which the first amendment was adopted and the second rejected be reconsidered, and that the motion to reconsider do lie upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a joint resolution, of which previous notice has been given, in regard to the public printing.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Joint Resolution in regard to the Public Printing.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That neither the joint resolution of 1846, "directing the manner of procuring the printing for the two Houses of Congress," nor any other act or resolution of Congress authorizes, or shall be so construed as to authorize, the Joint Committee on Printing to discharge one contractor and employ another, or to take the printing from one person and give it to another. But in all cases where the committee shall deem that there has been neglect of duty or unnecessary delay on the part of the public printer, the facts shall be reported to Congress, and the committee shall be governed by its advice.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky objected.

Mr. BROWN. I move a suspension of the rules, to enable me to introduce the resolution, and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the House indulge me by having read a clause of the law of 1846?

Mr. BROWN. I object. If it is read, I will ask the privilege of replying to it. If it be read, it will be by way of argument. We are not now to vote upon the passage of the resolution, but only upon the motion to suspend the rules to allow it to be introduced for consideration. It will be open to amendment and debate, when introduced.

[Cries of "Let it be read!" "Let it be read!"]

Mr. BAYLY. The motion for the reading can be put to the House.

Mr. BROWN. I withdraw my objection to the reading of the law.

Mr. POLK. If objection is made to the reading of the clause indicated, I will move to lay the whole subject upon the table, as I am unwilling to vote upon the passage of that which I am not allowed to understand.

The SPEAKER. The matter is not yet before the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. I understand the motion to be to suspend the rules for the purpose of allowing the resolution to come before the House for consideration.

Mr. BROWN. That is all that is intended by the motion now pending.

The SPEAKER. That is the proposition. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] asks to have read a clause of the law of 1846, which the pending resolution proposes to affect.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Until the subject comes before the House for consideration I object to debate or the reading of anything. Debate will be proper when the resolution is regularly before the House.

The question was then taken upon the motion to suspend the rules, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 98, nays 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, John Appleton, Boeck, Bowie, Bragg, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Buell, Joseph Cable, Lewis D. Campbell, Chandler, Clingman, Cobb, Culom, Curtis, Daniel, John G. Davis, Doty, Durkee, Edgerton, Edmundson, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Gamble, Gentry, Goodrich, Grow, Hall, Hamilton, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Henn, Hibbard, Horsford, Houston, John W. Howe, Hunter, Jackson, Jenkins, James Johnson, John Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Landry, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, Mason, McDonald, McLanahan, McNair, McQueen, Millson, Miner, Molony, Henry D. Moore, Morehead, Murray, Nabers, Newton, Olds, Orr, Outlaw, Andrew Parker, Peaslee, Penn, Penniman, Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Rantoul, Robbins, Russell, Sackett, Schoolcraft, Scurry, Smart, Smith, Snow, Abraham P. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, St. Martin, Stratton, Tuck, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Watkins, and Woodward—98.

NAYS—Messrs. William Appleton, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Bartlett, Bennett, Bowne, Briggs, Brooks, Burrows, Chapman, Chastain, Clark, Dawson, Dean, Dockery, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Goodenow, Gorman, Grey, Hammond, Haven, Hendricks, Hillyer, Howard, Ingersoll, Andrew Johnson, George G. King, Letcher, Lockart, Mace, McMullin, Miller, Samuel W. Parker, Polk, Price, Riddle, Ross, Savage, Schermerhorn, Skelton, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stuart, Sutherland, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Alexander White, Wilcox, Williams, and Yates—60.

So the rules were not suspended.

Mr. HAVEN. I will say this to the House. Inasmuch as this subject of public printing has excited some attention in the public newspapers, and inasmuch as the House, by a vote already given just now, manifested a desire to know something upon the subject, I wish to show to the House, if there is any desire on their part to know, what the state of business is. I am ready and willing to tell them how the matter stands.

Mr. KING, of New York. I hope the committee will report.

Mr. ORR. Unless the gentleman will allow a resolution by way of correction to be introduced, I object.

Mr. POLK. I rise to a question of order. I ask what there is before the House connected with this subject?

The SPEAKER. Discussion is not in order, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. KING. Is not a report from the Printing Committee in order at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is, but there is no report proposed to be made. The gentleman from New York can make a report from the committee, but not a verbal one.

Mr. ORR. I believe there is nothing before the House.

Mr. HAVEN. Is it in order for me to move to reconsider the vote just taken to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. It is in order, but the proposition would not be debatable.

Mr. HAVEN. I can only say, I have no desire about this matter, if the House do not wish to hear. I am willing to disclose all that has been done.

Mr. KING. The House wishes to hear.

DUTY ON RAILROAD IRON.

Mr. ORR. I ask leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report on Tuesday, the 20th instant, at half past twelve o'clock, p. m., a bill in the words following, to wit:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the iron for the construction of all railroads in the United States, or the Territories thereof, may be imported free of all duty: Provided, nevertheless, That in all cases hereafter, whenever it is proposed to claim this exemption from duty in case of the importation of iron for such purposes, it shall be the duty of the person or persons importing the same, to give bond in such manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, conditioned to show that, within three years from the time of said importation, the said iron has been laid down for permanent use on some railroad; or in the event of failure to make it so appear, then the person or persons importing said iron to be required to pay double the rates of duty now required by law: Provided further, That in the event of its being made to appear, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the omission to lay down said rails has not occurred by reason of any fraudulent purpose to evade the payment of the prescribed rate of duty on such iron, that then it shall be his duty to give further and reasonable time for the bona fide application of said iron to the purposes of railroads.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all duties now due on account of the importation of iron for railroads be, and the same are hereby remitted: Provided however, That in all such cases the importation shall be in the name and for the use of some legally incorporated railroad company, or for a State or Territory of the United States.

Mr. ROBBINS objected.

Mr. ORR. I move to suspend the rules, and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to know of the Chair whether the resolution proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] is in order. The point I make upon it is this: that under the express standing rules of the House committees are to be called in a particular specified order for reports. This resolution proposes to change one of the standing rules of the House so far as to make it the duty of the committee, or enable it, to report at any time it pleases without a regular call of committees, and in violation of that law of the House.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is not to change the standing rules of the House, but to suspend the rules of the House, which stand in the way of the introduction of the measure proposed.

Mr. HOUSTON. That may be true, but I would like to know whether that is a mere suspension of rules, or whether it is not a proposition to change the rules? The rules say that committees shall report in a certain specified order, but—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] proposes that the rules shall be suspended for a particular purpose, which requires two thirds.

Mr. ORR. There is a precedent for it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no difficulty with regard to the rule.

Mr. POLK. Will a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union take precedence of the one now under consideration?

The SPEAKER. Such a motion would be in order.

Mr. POLK. I move, then, that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ORR. Can the Speaker entertain these two propositions at the same time?

The SPEAKER. Both are privileged questions, and they will be voted upon in the order in which they have been submitted.

Mr. ORR demanded the yeas and nays upon the proposition submitted by him; which were ordered.

The question was then taken and there were—yeas 55, nays 97; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Boeck, Bragg, Briggs, Albert G. Brown, Joseph Cable, Chapman, Clark, Clingman, John G. Davis, Doty, Eastman, Edmundson, Fitch, Freeman, Gentry, Gorman, Grey, Hall, Hendricks, Henn, Howard, Jackson, James Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, Landry, Lockart, Mace, Humphrey Marshall, McCorkle, McQueen, Molony, John Moore, Nabers, Orr, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Penniman, Rantoul, Scurry, Smart, Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Stone, St. Martin, Venable, Wallace, Watkins, Wilcox, Williams, Woodward, and Yates—55.

NAYS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Allison, John Appleton, William Appleton, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Bartlett, Bennett, Bowie, Bowne, Brenton, Brooks, Buell, Burrows, Chandler, Chastain, Cobb, Conger, Curtis, Daniel, Dawson, Dean, Dockery, Dunham, Durkee, Edgerton, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Goodenow, Goodrich, Grow, Hamilton, Hammond, Isham G. Harris, Haven, Hibbard, Hillyer, Horsford, Houston, John W. Howe, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Letcher, Mann, Martin, Mason, McDonald, McLanahan, McMullin, McNair, Meacham, Henry D. Moore, Murray, Newton, Andrew Parker, Peaslee, Perkins, Polk, Price, Riddle, Robbins, Ross, Russell, Sackett, Savage, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Scudder, David L. Seymour, Skelton, Stanley, Benjamin Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stratton, Stuart, Sutherland, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Tuck, Walbridge, Washburn, and Alexander White—97.

So the House refused to suspend the rules.

Mr. SMART obtained the floor.

Mr. POLK. I rise to a question of order. I ask the Chair if the motion I made to go into Committee of the Whole is not now first in order?

The SPEAKER. The motion could not be made during the pendency of the motion which was made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] to suspend the rules.

Mr. POLK. Having made the motion, I ask if I will not by proper courtesy be entitled to the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMART,] who is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SMART, by unanimous consent of the House, presented resolutions from the Legislature of the State of Maine adverse to the extension of patents of Woodworth's planing machine, and Parker's reacting water-wheel; which were referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GOODENOW, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions from the Legislature of the State of Maine in support of the memorial to Congress asking the assistance of the United States Government in behalf of the European and North American railway; a portion of which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and a portion to the Committee on Roads and Canals; and they were all ordered to be printed.

Mr. POLK moved to suspend the rules, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BARKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled "An act to extend the time for selecting the lands granted to the State of Wisconsin for saline purposes," which received the signature of the Speaker.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Polk] will withdraw his motion, and permit me to offer a report from the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. POLK. I do not withdraw my motion.

The question was then taken, and there being only forty-seven in the affirmative, the House refused to suspend the rules to go into committee.

COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I move that the rules be suspended, so as to allow the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] to make a verbal report from the Committee on Printing. I desire to know the facts in the case.

Mr. HOUSTON. If that report is to be made, I would rather see it in writing.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I move to amend that resolution.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to suspend the rules, to enable the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] to submit a motion, or for the purpose rather of authorizing the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] to make a verbal report from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HOUSTON. May I make an inquiry of the Chair? Is it not the privilege of the Committee on Printing to report whenever it sees fit, and at any time?

The SPEAKER. It is the privilege, under the rules of the House, for the Committee on Printing to make a report at any time.

Mr. BAYLY. I rise to a question of order. Can any committee of this House make a verbal report?

The SPEAKER. Not without a special order of the House. The Chair thinks it competent for the rules of the House to be suspended, so as to allow the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] to make a speech, or to make a verbal report from the committee.

Mr. STUART. If the rules of the House are suspended, according to parliamentary law, can a verbal report be made?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is competent to suspend the rules to allow the gentleman to make a speech—and a verbal report is but a speech.

Mr. WOODWARD. I wish to make a point of order, and the point I raise is this: not whether you cannot suspend the rules so as to authorize a report to be made, but whether, under a suspension of the rules, you can present a report which is not a report?

Mr. BAYLY. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STANTON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] took the floor from me, and propounded a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] withdraws his motion. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] must remember that it is not a debatable question, and he is not entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. The chair must recollect, that I was upon the floor, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] had no right to withdraw his motion, and take the floor from me. I should like to know, if the motion can be withdrawn when I am upon the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] upon the ground that he was not entitled to the floor, the question not being debatable.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is a question of fact, and I do not wish to submit a question of that sort to the House. I was upon the floor, recognized by the Chair, and propounded a question, and intended to propound additional questions, when the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] interrupted me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama will remember, that these questions can be propounded only by the courtesy of the House, and under the rules of the House, he cannot decide that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I move to suspend the rules of the House, so as to enable me to submit a report from the Committee on Roads and Canals, in regard to the construction of a canal around the Falls of the Ohio.

Mr. HAMILTON objected.

The question was then taken on Mr. STANTON's motion, and there being only thirty-five in the affirmative, the rules were not suspended.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. ROBBINS asked the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, (with the concurrence of the Senate,) That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives close the present session of Congress by an adjournment of their respective Houses on Monday, the fifth day of July next, at the hour of twelve o'clock, meridian.

Mr. CHANDLER objected.

Mr. ROBBINS moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to offer the resolution.

Mr. CLINGMAN demanded the yeas and nays on this motion; but only eighteen members rising, they were not ordered.

Mr. CLINGMAN called for tellers on the demand for the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken on Mr. ROBBINS's motion, and (two thirds not voting in the affirmative,) it was disagreed to.

BRANCH MINT IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. McCORKLE asked the unanimous consent of the House to enable the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill for the establishment of a branch mint at San Francisco, which that committee had been prepared to report for some time.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, objected.

Mr. McCORKLE moved a suspension of the rules.

And the yeas and nays being put, the House refused to suspend the rules, (two thirds not voting in the affirmative.)

REPORT FROM COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. GORMAN. As much anxiety has been manifested this morning on the subject of a report from the Committee on Printing, I will state to the House that I have commenced the preparation of a report, but I do it without law. I ask the House, however, to indulge me till to-morrow morning to write out the report, as I cannot do it here, and I will then present it to the House the first thing after the meeting of the House to-morrow.

[Loud cries from all parts of the Hall, of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

PRINTING OF THE CENSUS.

Mr. SMITH asked the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is unnecessary and inexpedient to print the census reports upon the plan as presented by the Secretary of the Interior.

Resolved, That, with a view to economy and public convenience, a committee of three be appointed, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the expediency of so condensing and arranging the said census reports that the same may be embraced in one volume, and to bring in a plan of condensation, and a bill to carry out the same.

Mr. DAWSON objected.

Mr. SMITH moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to introduce the resolutions; and on that motion he asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ORR demanded tellers on the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and Messrs. CHANDLER and FULLER of Maine were appointed.

And the question being put, the tellers reported 35 in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STANLY. Suppose the House adjourns now, will this matter come up in the morning hour to-morrow, or on Monday next?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide that question when it arises.

Mr. STANLY. In order to save time, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being put, the motion was disagreed to, on a division—yeas 64, noes 78.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurring on Mr. SMITH's motion to suspend the rules—

Mr. TUCK moved that the rules be suspended; and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that, as the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SMITH,] and the motion of the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. TUCK,] are both privileged motions, they must be taken in the order in which they were made. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama is of such a character that it must be put before a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union can intervene.

The question was then taken on Mr. SMITH's motion, and there were—yeas 78, nays 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Willis Allen, John Appleton, Averett, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Bocock, Bragg, Brewster, Buell, Joseph Cable, Chastain, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, John G. Davis, Dean, Doty, Eastman, Edmundson, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Gamble, Grow, Hall, Hamilton, Hammon, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hendricks, Houston, Howard, Ingersoll, Jackson, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, John Johnson, George W. Jones, J. G. Jones, Preston King, Lockhart, Mace, Humphrey Marshall, McDonald, McMullin, McQueen, Milson, Morehead, Murray, Nares, Olds, Orr, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Penslen, Pennington, Perkins, Phelps, Polk, Robbins, Russell, Sackett, Schoolcraft, David L. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Smith, Snow, Richard H. Stanton, Abraham P. Stevens, Stone, Stratton, George W. Thompson, Venable, Wallace, Watkins, and Woodward—78.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, William Appleton, Bartlett, Bennett, Bowie, Bowne, Briggs, Brooks, Burrows, E. Carington Cabell, Chandler, Chapman, Cullum, Dawson, Dockery, Durkee, Edgerton, Fowler, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Gentry, Goodnow, Goodrich, Gorman, Grey, Harper, Haven, Henn, Hibbard, Horsford, John W. Howe, Hunter, Robert W. Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George G. King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Landry, Mann, Martin, Mason, McCorkle, McLanahan, McNair, Meacham, Miller, Miner, Molony, Henry D. Moore, Newion, Andrew Parker, Porter, Price, Ross, Schermerhorn, Scurry, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Thaddeus Stevens, Stuart, Sutherland, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, Thurston, Tuck, Wallbridge, Walsh, Ward, Washburn, Wells, Alexander White, Wilcox, Williams, and Yates—77.

So (two thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

BILLS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. HIBBARD. There are many bills from the Senate on the Speaker's table, which it is highly important should be acted upon. A portion of them have lain there for more than two months. Such delay is a reproach to legislation. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House now proceed to dispose of such bills from the Senate on the Speaker's table as shall not be objected to, and shall not give rise to debate.

Mr. OUTLAW objected.

Mr. HIBBARD moved to suspend the rules, to enable him to offer the resolution; and on that motion he demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; and the question being put, the motion to suspend the rules was disagreed to, (two thirds not voting in the affirmative.)

Mr. HOUSTON. It is evident that we shall accomplish nothing by these motions to suspend the rules, and I therefore ask the House, by unanimous consent, to proceed to the call of committees for reports.

Mr. CABELL, of Florida, objected.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to suspend the rules, to enable me to move that there be a call of committees for reports. We ought to do something or other.

Mr. BENNETT. I ask the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw that motion, to enable me to submit a resolution which it is necessary should be passed. A new post route has been established in my district, and, by order of the Department, the mail is being carried on that route; but the Postmaster General has no authority to pay for carrying it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would gladly yield to the gentleman, but there are several gentlemen here who are making similar requests, and I must, therefore, decline to withdraw my motion.

Mr. OUTLAW moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON demanded the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

Mr. LETCHER called for tellers on the adjournment; and they were ordered.

Mr. OUTLAW withdrew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. FITCH renewed it.

Mr. CLARK demanded tellers; which were ordered, and Messrs. CHANDLER and FULLER were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—yeas 73, noes 36.

So the motion was carried in the affirmative, and The House adjourned till twelve o'clock to-morrow.

PETITIONS, &c.

The following petitions, memorials, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. MACE: A memorial from James Melhany, of Montgomery county, Indiana, asking for a grant of land to construct a railroad from Thorntown, Boone county, Indiana, to some suitable point on the Pacific ocean, in Oregon, via New Richmond, Attica, up Pine Creek, so as to pass north of Walnut Grove, Peoria, south to the Kansas river; also, to erect a monument on said road, at some suitable point, in the State of Illinois, to the memory of Christopher Columbus, five hundred feet high, surmounted with the Holy Bible.

By Mr. JONES, of Pennsylvania: The resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, in relation to the Woodworth patent.

Also, the resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, in relation to the canal around the Falls of the Ohio.

Also, the petition of citizens of Schuylkill county, for the increase of compensation to the deputy marshals for taking the census.

By Mr. MARTIN: The remonstrance of 100 inhabitants of Cattaraugus county, New York, against the renewal of the Woodworth patent.

By Mr. ROBBINS: The petition of Benjamin Sage, William M. Evans, and 34 other citizens of the county of Philadelphia, asking Congress to modify the bounty land act of September 28, 1850, so as to give each person intended to be benefited thereby, and to each seaman and marine who served in said war, not less than one hundred and sixty acres of land.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 13, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

EXTENSION OF THE CAPITOL.

Mr. HUNTER. I desire to ask the general consent of the Senate now, to permit the joint resolution in regard to the extension of the Capitol to be taken up, so that we may act upon the message of the House, rejecting one of the Senate's amendments. This matter ought to be decided at once, and I think we can decide it in a very few minutes, this morning. I hope it will be the general pleasure of the Senate to take it up, and I therefore make that motion.

The PRESIDENT. It is moved to take up the joint resolution authorizing the continuance of the work on the two wings of the Capitol, which has been returned from the House. If taken up, the question will be upon receding from the amendment made by the Senate, to which the House has disagreed.

Mr. BRADBURY. We were admonished by a gentleman yesterday that he should debate that joint resolution when it comes up. I therefore hope we will not take it up, but go on and finish the business which we commenced yesterday.

Mr. HUNTER. I only ask for a portion of the morning hour. I think we can get through with it in that time. I shall be willing, after one o'clock, to give way, if it is not disposed of then. I hope no objection will be made to that.

Mr. BRADBURY. If the Senator consents to give way at one o'clock, I withdraw my objection.

The motion to take up the joint resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The motion made by the Senator from Virginia is, that the Senate recede from their amendment, which has been rejected by the House.

Mr. BRODHEAD. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALE. Before the vote is taken, I want to state, for the information of the Senate, that I have prepared, agreeably to notice given a day or two since, a joint resolution, precisely to the same effect as the amendment which has been rejected by the House, with one single verbal alteration, which was suggested by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER,] when that amendment was before us, and which it would have required unanimous consent then to adopt. If we recede from our amendment, I have this joint resolution, which I will present on the first opportunity.

Mr. MANGUM. I very much hope that it will be the sense of the Senate to recede from its amendment. This work should be going on; and there is no probability that the House will ever agree to that amendment. All my information is derived from the newspapers, where I find that the vote was so overwhelming that it is impossible to entertain the suspicion for a moment that the House will recede from its disagreement. I hope we shall recede from the amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. I have occupied so much of the time of the Senate upon this question, that I shall trouble them but a short time now. But there are some considerations connected with this bill, or with the amendment now before us, which occur to me, and which I feel it my duty to present.

As has been said of some other bills that have been before the Senate, to speak against this is, indeed, in my opinion, speaking against a "foregone conclusion." It is one of that class of bills which always passes, and always will pass. I had no hope that anything I could say in opposition to it, from the beginning, would have had any influence towards defeating it. My object was, however, as it was my right, and, as I think, my duty, to put upon the record the opinions and views I entertain upon the subject, and let them go before the country—at least before that portion of it which I represent.

In the several contests which have marked the course of my life, I have always thought, and often said, it was exceedingly unwise and impolitic to "knock my head against a stone wall." Sir, the contest I have had with this bill has not tended to change this opinion. I have, indeed, in this instance, "knocked my head against a stone wall."

Mr. WELLER. Knock the wall down.

Mr. BORLAND. I wish I could. But I have been unable to knock it down with the poor means at my command upon this floor. But, although the strength of my head has not been sufficient to knock down these walls, I have no doubt whatever that, with no aid to the hands and arms which nature has given me, I have muscular power (though I am of a small and feeble person) to displace and remove every stone from the foundation of these two wings of the Capitol. This is my opinion, and there are others—men of high intelligence and experience—who agree with me. I mention it to indicate my opinion of this work as a piece of masonry, and especially as a foundation for buildings of such size as it is proposed to erect upon it.

But this view of the subject has been sufficiently presented here. It has availed nothing, and will avail nothing. There is something stronger than the stone walls behind the walls, against which such considerations never have, and never can avail. For the present, at least, I give it up. But I desire to say a few words upon the particular question now before the Senate. It is, whether we shall adhere to or recede from that provision we adopted in justice to the laboring man?

In the first stages of this measure before the two Houses of Congress, we heard much, and read much, about the poor laborer out of employment and starving—aye, sir, starving; and our galleries were filled with them for argument, to get up this bill, and hasten its passage. Yes, sir, this was the array of the advocates of the bill; while its opponents were denounced as enemies to the laboring man, withholding from the mouths of his starving wife and children the absolute necessities of subsistence. But, sir, how stands the matter now? Now that the appeal has been successful—now that the poor laborer has been made use of to serve a purpose—now that the bill has been taken up, and it is found that it can pass without the help of the poor laborer—he is forgotten, and cast aside—his wife may starve, his children may cry for bread, and these good friends of his are blind to his wants, and deaf to his claims; while we, who were once called his enemies and oppressors, are now denounced, on the other hand, for obstructing a great public work, because we maintain the claims of the same laboring man—claims whose justice, but three days ago, was acknowledged by the Senate. In this view, sir, the practical question before us is, shall we withhold this well-earned bread from the mouths of these poor men, in order to pour half a million of dollars into the already gorged pockets of those who, already rich, would multiply their gains by coining into money the toil, and sweat, and misery of these poor laboring men?

That is the question we have to decide; and I desire to put myself at least right in regard to it, and to let it be seen, upon the record of yeas and nays, where those gentlemen who were so considerate of the poor laboring man in the beginning, when something was to be gained by using them, and whose conduct, in contrast with ours, was held up to the country as such bright examples of propriety, and justice, and humanity, stand now, and where we stand. I want it to be seen who is for taking care of the laboring man, and who is not; who is for recognizing his claims upon the justice and humanity of Congress, and who is for repudiating those claims; who is for still further paying money into the pockets of speculators, and who is for withholding it when, in my opinion, there is no public necessity or propriety for its appropriation. Let the vote be taken, and let the people judge.

The proposition is to recede from the amendment to the joint resolution which provides payment for those laboring men, who have been brought from their homes and employment in other cities by promises of constant work, and kept here under promises and expectations held out to them that they would be provided for if they remained. And in support of the proposition, I understand it has been represented that these poor men have withdrawn all pretensions to this claim; that they are perfectly willing that this amendment should be stricken out of the bill, and the appropriation be made for continuing the work, without making them any allowance at all for the time they have been induced to remain here, and almost compelled to lose. I have good reason for saying that this is not so; that they have not withdrawn that claim, and never will, as, in my opinion, they never ought. To recede from the amendment, will not only not be in accordance with their wishes or their feelings, but in opposition to both, as it will be destructive of their hopes of relief. These superintendents of the work—those who have brought these poor men here, with false promises, and kept them here upon delusive expectations—these are the individuals who are now for casting off their dupes and their victims, and setting them adrift upon the world, without a dollar to pay the debts which they were compelled to contract to get bread for their own mouths and those of their wives and children. These are the individuals who are willing—nay, urge us—to recede from the amendment. No wonder. They have received their own compensation all the while, whether employed or not, and are to continue to receive it. They are therefore willing and desirous to remove all the obstacles out of the way of their own interest, no matter upon whom the hardship shall fall. No wonder, I repeat—no wonder! How characteristic of him who speculates upon the necessities of the laboring poor! Kindness of look and of voice, and loud professions of sympathy for want, until the poor dupe is converted into use! But the moment after he has been used, and is no longer useful for the particular end in view—and especially if he stands in the way of another end—he is repulsed with insult, cast aside in scorn, and, if occasion require, even trampled under foot.

Mr. President, I will read a communication I received this morning from a number of these poor men:

WASHINGTON, April 12, 1852.

SIR: The undersigned, stone-masons and laborers who have been induced to come to this city from various parts of the country for the purpose of obtaining work upon the extension of the Capitol; who have been induced to come here in compliance with the request of the Government, as contained in advertisements in the newspapers published in the city of New York and elsewhere; who, having obtained work during the last season, were further induced to bring on our families, or make arrangements to abide here permanently, and that at the expenditure in many instances, of all our available means; who have, in compliance with the above-mentioned reasons, and for want of due additional appropriations by Congress to carry on the work, been without employment since its suspension; who, in consequence of the loss of wages sustained by us on account of the refusal to give us employment, are now destitute among strangers, and without credit—have had the still further mortification to witness the failure in the lower House of Congress of the bill remunerating us for this loss of time. We are at a loss to know what course it further becomes us to pursue. Our only hope is that our friends—the friends of the laborer—who occupy positions of influence will lend us their aid.

We therefore appeal to you, and solicit your good offices in aid of justice and humanity.

Yours, most respectfully,

HON. SOLON BORLAND, United States Senate.

Many of these men I know are in a state of utter destitution. Some of them have had the very beds taken from under their wives and children, and sold in the market-place to purchase the means of living. During the suspension of the work, they have had to incur debts which they are now utterly unable to satisfy; and unless they obtain these means, they will be turned out of house and home, without money, without a change of clothes, and without food. This, sir, added to their own simple, modest, and to my heart, most touching letter, makes up my appeal to the Senate for justice and humanity to these poor men. Let it pass for what it may be worth. I have no more to say.

The question being taken on receding from the Senate's amendment, which provided for the payment of the laborers during the time they have been unemployed, it resulted—yeas 30, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Bell, Berrien, Bradbury, Clarke, Clements, Cooper, Davis, Dawson, Douglas, Felch, Fish, Geyer, Gwin, Hamlin, Hunter, King, Mangum, Miller, Morton, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Smith, Spruance, Stockton, Underwood, and Upham—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Borland, Brodhead, Cass, Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Hale, James, Jones of Iowa, Norris, Rusk, Sumner, Wade, Walker, and Weller—16.

So the Senate receded from its amendment.

Mr. HALE, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a joint resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the architect appointed by the President of the United States to superintend the work in the construction of the additions to the Capitol, be, and he is hereby authorized to examine the claims of the workmen to indemnity for the loss of their time during the suspension of the work upon said additions, for the want of an appropriation; and that the said architect allow to said workmen, respectively, as were suspended from labor during the pendency of the joint resolution making such appropriation, with the encouragement that upon said appropriation being made, their labor would again be required by the Government, and who intermediately had no opportunity of obtaining employment in the city of Washington, such reasonable indemnity for loss of wages for labor during the suspension of the work, as, under the circumstances of their respective cases, justice and equity may require; not exceeding, however, in any case, the average rate of the earnings of said workmen in the employment of the Government for a like preceding period of time.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a petition of Thomas G. Clinton, praying that the reasons which influenced the chief examiner of the Patent Office to grant E. S. Renwick a patent in 1850; for an invention identical with one for which a patent was refused William Wheeler in 1847 and 1848, be required of the Patent Office; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. HUNTER presented the petition of Susan Campbell, asking for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPER WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, it was Ordered, That the petition of Isaac Houston, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

REPORT FROM A STANDING COMMITTEE.

Mr. GWIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of Pursuer T. P. McBlair, asking to be allowed credit for certain payments to forward officers of the steamship Princeton, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

ST. GENEVIEVE PLANK ROAD.

The engrossed bill, to grant the right of way to the St. Genevieve, Iron Mountain, and Pilot Knob Plank Road Company, was read a third time and passed.

NON-INTERVENTION.

Mr. CLARKE. I move the postponement of all prior orders of business, that the joint resolutions, which I had some time since the honor to present, on the subject of non-intervention, and which were assigned for consideration to-day, and upon which the honorable Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] has the floor, may now be taken up.

Mr. CASS. That will place my colleague [Mr. FELCH] in an awkward position, for he got half through his speech yesterday, and yielded the floor for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BADGER. I have been in similar circumstances for two months.

Mr. CASS. I hope the Senator from North Carolina does not mean to intimate that that should be a precedent to us all, and that we should be so long hatching an egg as that. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRADBURY. I hope that this motion will not prevail. It will be recollected that the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. FELCH] has not concluded his speech, and it is my wish that we may go on with the bill that was under consideration yesterday, and sit till we get a final vote on it. Let us decide one question at a time.

Then the honorable Senator from Tennessee can get an opportunity to address the Senate. It is true, that some days ago this day was assigned to take up these resolutions on non-intervention; but the spoliation bill was made the special order at a much earlier period, and is entitled to priority.

Mr. CLARKE. I think there will be no inconvenience to the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. FELCH] if my motion prevails. The observations he has to make he has, probably, so perfectly at command, that he will have no difficulty in presenting them to-morrow as well as to-day. To-day was assigned for the consideration of these resolutions. The honorable Senator from Tennessee has had possession of the floor for some time, and has yielded it on several occasions. At this moment he is prepared to go on, and we are prepared to hear him. In consideration of these circumstances, I hope that an opportunity will be accorded to the honorable Senator to proceed at once. In that case he will get through early, and the consideration of these resolutions will not be again pressed on the Senate so as to interfere with other business. I trust that the Senate will accede to the request.

Mr. BRADBURY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BELL. I have certainly never witnessed an instance of this kind before. After the determination which has been manifested by so great a number of gentlemen to take up the French spoliation bill, it would be utterly discourteous in me to press any claims, which I may appear to have, to the attention of the Senate. I have, however, sat silent a long time. I was willing, in the first instance, that this subject should be postponed for ten days, in order that the apportionment bill, and the deficiencies bill, and one or two other important measures, should be taken up and disposed of, thinking that these bills might be disposed of in that time; but that not being done, I waited ten days longer. With any will or disposition to address the Senate on this question, it appears to me that personal respect for myself would require that I should not yield. The honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. BRADBURY] pressed me privately to yield. I told him that I was awkwardly situated; that I was in a ridiculous position if, thinking it of any importance that I should address the Senate on this subject, I should yield. The honorable Senator from Maine postponed the taking up of the French spoliation bill until yesterday, the very day before the day fixed for the consideration of the resolution of the Senator from Rhode Island. In regard to these non-intervention resolutions, and the remarks I had to make in regard to them, I referred it to the judgment of the Senate when they should be taken up for consideration, because I supposed that it would make no material difference to me when I addressed the Senate. I was as well prepared three weeks ago as I am now; but, after the manifestation of gentlemen in regard to taking up the French spoliation bill, I feel that I must yield; and, in doing so, I give my heartfelt thanks to the Senator from Rhode Island for his endeavors to call up this subject.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am satisfied that the Senator from Tennessee is mistaken in the vote which has just been taken on the call for the yeas and nays. My impression is, that in rising to sustain the call for the yeas and nays, the desire of Senators is, to assign the floor to the honorable Senator from Tennessee; because I do not believe that there is any Senator who will vote against a motion which is uniformly conceded as an act of courtesy. There is no Senator on this floor more uniformly courteous than the Senator from Tennessee. He has deferred making his remarks from day to day, until to-day—the day which the Senate assigned him for the purpose; and I really am astonished and surprised that my friend from Maine should have asked for the yeas and nays, on the motion to take up these resolutions.

Mr. WELLER. I am somewhat surprised at the ground upon which the honorable Senator from Maine places his opposition to taking up the non-intervention resolutions to-day. It will be recollected that on Thursday last, in order to accommodate the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. DOWNS,] I made a motion, which he was precluded from making, as he had voted in the minority, to reconsider a vote in the Senate con-curring in an amendment made as in Committee of the Whole on the apportionment bill, to enable the Senator from Louisiana to submit an amendment, with the understanding that the discussion upon that bill had closed. Yesterday, it came up in its regular order again. It was still unfinished business; but the Senator from Maine [Mr. BRADBURY] then insisted that the French spoliation bill should be taken up, notwithstanding the effect would be to postpone the apportionment bill. And now, after the apportionment bill has thus been driven over—I do not know how long—to-day, when the time has arrived—a time which was fixed ten days ago—for the consideration of the subject upon which the Senator from Tennessee has the floor, the Senator from Maine demands that we shall proceed with the French spoliation bill. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHIELDS] is right, when he suggests that I desire to record my vote against the proposition of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BRADBURY.]

Mr. BRADBURY. The honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHIELDS] remarked that he was surprised that I should insist on proceeding with the orders of the day. If the honorable Senator had attended to the course of the discussion, I think he would have withheld that expression of surprise. Yesterday was assigned for the consideration of the French spoliation bill, and the friends of that measure did not occupy the floor five minutes; the honorable Senator from Michigan took the floor against it; he had proceeded with his speech, but had not closed when the Senate adjourned, and was entitled to the floor to-day. His colleague [Mr. CASS] addressed the Senate, expressing the hope that the Senator might be permitted to conclude his remarks. It was under these circumstances, and in accordance with the wish expressed by the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CASS,] that his colleague might be permitted to conclude his speech commenced yesterday, on a subject which had been made the special order for to-day, that I desired the Senate to refuse a postponement for any other subject. It is under these circumstances that the honorable Senator from Illinois gives utterance to the expression of his surprise. It is now more than two months since the bill, to which I have alluded, was made the special order; but one bill after another is pressed on to take the precedence. It is for the Senate to do as it pleases. In appointing me chairman of the committee it placed the bill in some measure under my charge. It is a subject that my constituents have comparatively little interest in, and if those Senators, whose constituents are much more deeply interested in the passage of the measure, see fit to have it thrown over to the end of the session, I can make no further objection. I wish only to do my duty.

With regard to the honorable Senator from Tennessee, I would observe that it was from no discourtesy to him that I opposed the motion to postpone the special order. I know the uniform courtesy and kindness of that distinguished Senator, and there is no one to whom I would more cheerfully render any act of courtesy; but as his speech was to be made on a subject of no very pressing importance to the country at this moment, I hoped he would consent that the Senator from Michigan should conclude his remarks. If the French spoliation bill is postponed now, I do not know when it is to come up again.

Several SENATORS. To-morrow! To-morrow!

Mr. CASS. I fully accord with all that has been said by the Senator from Illinois in regard to the courtesy which is due to the Senator from Tennessee. No member of this body is more uniformly courteous than that Senator; and in expressing the hope that my colleague might be allowed to finish his remarks, I had not the most remote idea of exhibiting any discourtesy. However, I would simply remark that my colleague commenced his speech yesterday on the French spoliation bill, and gave way to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MANGUM] to adjourn, and he was entitled, on every principle of courtesy, and by uniform practice, to go on to-day.

The honorable Senator from North Carolina says that he gave way. So he did, voluntarily; but nobody would have stopped him. Is it, therefore, surprising that I should have risen to ask that my colleague should be allowed to go on with his speech? Such a thing as a refusal in an instance of this kind has never happened before.

I beg to assure the honorable Senator from Tennessee that it is not with the least discourteous feeling toward him that I have made this request; and, in taking my seat I will say, that my colleague most cheerfully gives way, and hopes that the Senator from Tennessee will go on with his remarks, which I have no doubt will afford us all a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. FELCH. I have not the control of the bill which was under discussion yesterday, and as the Senate very well understands, I have uniformly voted against taking it up. I commenced some remarks yesterday, however, in regard to it, and I certainly did desire to conclude them today. I am aware that it must be a dull speech upon a dull subject, and I wished to get it off my hands as soon as I could conveniently. But I most cheerfully yield, if it can be understood that I can proceed to-morrow and close my remarks.

Mr. BRADBURY. I will, with the consent of the Senate, withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Consent being given, the call was withdrawn.

Mr. BADGER. I was going to mention that I hope the Senator from Maine will have no hesitation, after what has been said by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FELCH], in giving my friend from Tennessee an opportunity to be heard to-day. And I was about to add, that I have given notice that on Thursday I should ask the Senate to take up a certain matter, to the consideration of which I have some claims upon the courtesy of the Senate; but rather than interfere with business which Senators are anxiously pressing upon the consideration of the Senate, if they yield now to the Senator from Tennessee, on Thursday I will waive any purpose I may have then to address the Senate.

The motion to postpone all previous orders, for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the joint resolutions relative to non-intervention, was then agreed to.

Mr. BELL then addressed the Senate for two hours and a half against the intervention doctrine. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I know that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FELCH] desires the floor to-morrow to continue his remarks upon the French spoliation bill; and that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BADGER] is waiting for a day to finish his speech, commenced some two months ago. I am willing to occupy any portion of the time of the Senate that it shall allot to me, in the course of a few days, on the subject which is now under discussion.

Several Senators suggested to-morrow week.

Mr. COOPER. It is suggested that to-morrow week will be a convenient day. I have no objection, if that be the pleasure of the Senate. I desire to submit my views on the question at some time, and I wish to do so at such time as will best suit the convenience of the Senate. I move to postpone the further consideration of these resolutions until to-morrow week.

Mr. HUNTER. I would suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the deficiency bill is pressing upon us. I must endeavor to get it up to-morrow or next day.

Mr. COOPER. My motion is to postpone the subject until to-morrow week.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope we shall get through the deficiency bill by that time; but, at all events, I am willing to agree to that day.

The motion was agreed to.

EXPEDITION TO JAPAN.

Mr. BORLAND. I desire to make a remark somewhat in the nature of a personal explanation of my own course with regard to the resolution of inquiry which I introduced some time since in relation to the expedition to Japan. I stated to the Senate the other morning, that I should call it up, and ask its consideration again. Since then, at the request of other Senators, I have agreed to let it lie, for the reason that a Senator proposes to introduce a similar resolution in Executive session, calling for the information to be communicated by the President to the Senate in Executive session. It is proper that I should say that I do not approve of such a proceeding, but as many who desire this information as much as I do, seem to think that will be the better course, I have agreed to it, not yielding, however, my opposition to all such proceedings in Executive session.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 13, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Mr. GOODENOW. I rise to a privileged question. The resolutions which I had the honor to introduce yesterday, from the Legislature of the State of Maine, are reported in the Journal as having been referred, in part, to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and in part to the Committee on Roads and Canals. I moved to refer them, in part, to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and in part to the Committee on Public Lands. I ask that the Journal may be corrected.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recollects perfectly well that the gentleman did ask to have them referred to two different committees.

Mr. GOODENOW. I ask that the Journal may be corrected, by inserting "the Committee on Public Lands," instead of "the Committee on Roads and Canals."

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made. The Journal was then approved.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the bill to enforce discipline in the Navy. The motion pending is to recommit to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, obtained the floor.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House, on yesterday, refused to suspend the rules, so as to enable the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BROWN] to introduce a resolution relative to the public printing.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair that motion is not in order. It not being in order to move to suspend the rules upon any day except Monday, the Chair thinks the action of the House in relation to such motions must be confined to that day.

Mr. STANTON. I did not suppose it was in order to suspend the rules, but I thought the motion to reconsider might be made now, so that it would come up as unfinished business on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that it has been the practice of the House not to allow motions to reconsider motions to suspend the rules. All action upon such a motion must be confined exclusively to the time at which the motion was made. The Chair, however, will consider the question of order, so that the gentleman may have all the benefit of it to which he is entitled.

Mr. STANTON. I wish merely to say that I voted upon this motion yesterday, as doubtless did a good many others, without knowing what the resolution was. If I had known, I should have voted differently.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Ohio, that upon examination he finds that the House, during the last session of Congress, decided that a motion to reconsider a motion to suspend the rules was not in order. The Speaker made that decision, and the House acquiesced. In conformity to that precedent, the Chair now decides that the gentleman's motion is not in order.

Mr. FREEMAN. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STANTON] to give way for a moment, in order to allow me to present certain resolutions from the Legislature of Mississippi.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. FREEMAN then, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolutions; which were severally disposed of as indicated below:

A memorial of the Legislature of Mississippi, asking an appropriation to remove a sand bar from the mouth of the Pascagoula river; referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

A memorial and resolution of the Legislature of Mississippi, asking a donation of the public lands to the New Orleans and Jackson Railroad; referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

A joint resolution of the State of Mississippi, asking a donation of the public lands to aid in the construction of the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad; referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER, by unanimous consent, presented a preamble and resolutions from the Legislature of Pennsylvania, requesting the Senators and Representatives from that State to use all proper means to have some action taken by Congress for the construction of a canal around the Falls of the Ohio river, at Louisville; which were referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to inquire of the Chair if the morning hour has commenced?

The SPEAKER. It has commenced.

Mr. FLORENCE, by unanimous consent, presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, instructing the Senators and requesting the Representatives from that State to use all honorable means to prevent any further extension by Congress of the Woodworth patent, for an improvement in the method of planing, &c.; which were referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of Pennsylvania in relation to constructing a canal around the falls of the Ohio river at Louisville; which were referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROBBINS, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions from the Legislature of Pennsylvania upon the same subject; which were referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a resolution in favor of the establishment of a naval depot at New Orleans, Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. TAYLOR. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. STANTON], to allow me to offer a bill, of which previous notice was given some weeks ago.

Mr. STANTON. I cannot give way for that purpose; I gave way for the resolutions to be introduced from State Legislatures, but I cannot for any other purpose, because it would consume too much of my time.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask the gentleman to permit me to introduce a memorial of one hundred and twenty-one members of the Ohio Legislature.

Mr. STANTON. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HUNTER then, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of members of the Ohio Legislature, in relation to the wire suspension bridge at Wheeling; which was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TAYLOR. I hope the gentleman will not object to my introducing my bill, and having it referred.

Mr. STANTON. There are a dozen gentlemen upon the floor asking the same privilege, and if I yield to one, I shall have to yield to them all.

DISCIPLINE IN THE NAVY.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, said: I would not press upon the consideration of the House, the bill which comes up this morning, if I were not impressed with the absolute necessity of some action upon the part of the House, to complete what the Senate has already done in reference to this matter.

When the subject was up one day last week, the House was addressed by the gentleman from Virginia, my colleague upon the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. BOGOCCK,] who gave so clear and distinct an exposition of all the questions involved in the bill, that it will be necessary for me to say but little in addition. There are, however, some things which fell from the lips of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] and also of the other gentleman from Virginia, who addressed the House upon this subject, [Mr. MILLSON,] which require some notice from me.

In the first place, it was stated by the gentleman from the Norfolk district of Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] that this bill was originally presented in the Senate in a different form, but that it had been amended in such a way by the Committee on Naval Affairs, that he supposed the Senate did not know what it was when it adopted these amendments as a substitute, but supposed they were adopting the original bill. Now, this is a very serious charge to make against so grave a body as the Senate of the United States. It amounts to nothing more nor less than that the Senate of the United States did not know what they were about, when they changed the whole form and substance of this bill, and sent it to us in its present form. The gentleman ought to do justice to that body. I learn that it is true, that this bill was originally introduced into the Senate as stated by the gentleman from Virginia, but it is equally true that, by the unanimous vote of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the Senate, one of the members of that committee was instructed to report the amendment, which gave the bill the form in which it was sent to this House. The object of the committee was, I am informed, to present the two plans distinctly before the Senate, in order that they might know exactly what they were about, and that they might then determine between them; not for the purpose of blinding their eyes, but for the purpose of opening them, and enabling them to know exactly what they were doing. It was for the purpose of presenting the subject clearly and unequivocally for their decision. This was done, and the bill comes here with all the force which follows from a deliberate investigation, and an intelligent decision upon the part of the Senate of the United States, if that be entitled to any consideration in this body.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] stated that he should be opposed, under any circumstances, to giving this high discretionary power to any single individual, and especially, he said, to the officers of the Navy of the United States, not appointed according to merit, but, as he said, occupying their positions by mere accident. Well, sir, if the officers of the Navy are promoted not according to merit, but by accident, it is not the fault of the Committee on Naval Affairs, nor is it the fault of the Senate or House of Representatives. The power of the President of the United States to promote officers, or to appoint them in that branch of the public service, or any other, cannot be controlled by either House of Congress, or by both; because it is a constitutional right of the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint such officers as he pleases. I know that the system has grown up. I know that it is the custom upon the part of the President to appoint officers in the Army and Navy by seniority. The country has felt the evil of this system for a long time. The Naval Committee of this House have made various attempts to correct it, but, sir, the corrective is entirely within the power of the President of the United States. He is not bound to appoint officers by seniority; he ought not to appoint them by seniority, and he does not so appoint them, altogether regardless of qualifications.

Mr. STUART, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STANTON. I will, of course.

Mr. STUART. Does the gentleman intend to lay down the principle that it is not within the power of Congress to establish by law the mode in which the officers shall be appointed?

Mr. STANTON. Certainly I do. Unless the gentleman can change the Constitution of the United States, which gives to the Executive that right, I do not see how he can contend for the proposition that it is in the power of Congress to control the appointment of officers on the part of the President. The Constitution says that—

"The President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

Mr. STUART. Now, I want to ask the gentleman if he intends to say that Congress may not by law define the mode of the selection, and that they are compelled to leave it to the discretion of the Executive entirely? Because if he means to say that, I differ with him.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Speaker, Congress has the power to vest the appointment of inferior officers in the President alone, or in the Courts, or in the heads of Departments. But Congress has not the right, by anything I can see in this Constitution, to prescribe whom the President shall appoint. Accordingly, the President has always exercised the power to appoint officers in the Army and Navy, by seniority, by merit, or altogether to disregard the whole corps in the service, and take others not before in the service. And I apprehend that, by the terms of the Constitution, it would not be in the power of the Congress of the United States to control the discretion of the President in his appointments to office. I believe, so far as I am concerned, that the officers in the Army and Navy of the United States ought to be appointed, partly upon the principle of merit, and partly upon the principle of seniority. I say it would not be proper altogether to disregard length of service, where this service had been faithful, and where the officers are capable and fit for the place. It would be unusual to disregard such length of service, and unjust to do so; at the same time, it would be equally unjust and injurious to the public service to disregard merit.

One of these gentlemen—the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART]—has spoken of a total revision of the code for the government of the Navy. I agree with him entirely; and I must admit that the measure now before the House is but a partial one, designed to meet a present exigency, but not going to the whole extent of the difficulty. I admit, and contend, as fully as he does, for the absolute necessity of a complete and entire revision of the code by which the naval service is governed. And this opinion is not new to myself, or to the Naval Committee; for during the last Congress I had the honor to present to this House a report, No. 35, in which this sentence is contained:

"With regard, however, to the naval laws, they are old, and have been the subject of complaint—well-founded complaint—for many years. The attention of Congress has frequently been invited to the subject. The 'rules and regulations' now in force by law for the government of the Navy are old, barbarous, savage, and cruel. Since they were enacted, every State in the Union has modified and altered, not only its laws, but its constitution."

And, sir, with that report, I was instructed by the Naval Committee to introduce a bill, which was presented and referred to the Committee of the Whole, and there it slept the sleep of death, as almost all the bills which have been introduced from the Naval Committee have, and I fear will continue to sleep, from the little interest manifested in the subject by the great mass of the members of this House. In that bill it was provided, "that 'it shall be the duty of the President to cause to be prepared a suitable code of laws for the Navy, and submit the same to Congress as soon as practicable, for such further action as may be required.'"

Now, sir, I am instructed again by the committee to report a bill containing a similar clause providing for a complete revision of the code of naval laws. The Naval Committee did not feel itself prepared—and I think I may say did not feel itself capable—of doing justice to a subject of this kind. It is a great subject—one of much interest—one requiring extensive knowledge, as well as experience, on the part of those who should undertake to prescribe a code of laws for the government of the Navy. How could any of us, who have never crossed the ocean, and who know nothing of the practical workings of these laws on board a ship, undertake to prepare such a code? Now, it is proper, and I conceive that it is the only proper mode, to call upon the President to present the views of the Navy Department, and of such officers as may be required, to give their advice in order that Congress may act on the subject with proper intelligence and discrimination, establishing a code worthy of the age in which we live, and worthy of a free, republican people.

And in this matter of promotion, so far as it is in the power of Congress to control it, the Naval Committee have repeatedly, since I have had the honor of being a member of it, presented bills for the purpose of accomplishing all that is in the power of Congress to accomplish towards that end; and I have now ready to be reported a bill which I think will be very effectual to the accomplishment of that object; not that we can control the discretion of the President in making his appointments, but we can enable the President, and require him, to get rid of all officers incapable of doing duty.

But, sir, to come down to the provisions of this particular bill. I have already said that it does not reach the whole code of naval laws; that it is partial, and therefore temporary in its character, and designed to meet a particular exigency which is pressing upon the country, and which, I think, must be met for the good of the service. But objections have been made to the particular provisions of this bill.

The first is, that this power is given to the commander of a ship, and is placed in his discretion without control; and the opposite proposition presented by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] is the establishment of a court-martial—a summary court-martial, as he calls it—to be convened on board of ship for the purpose of punishing these offenses. It will be necessary for me to add but little to what has been so well said by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOGOCCK,] I think that he has shown the insufficiency of the proposed system, its inapplicability to the purposes for which it was intended, as stated by the gentleman from the Norfolk district, [Mr. MILLSON,] It is true that this was first proposed by a board of officers; not, however, as gentlemen are probably aware, from choice, not because they ever would have selected that mode of enforcing discipline in the Navy from choice, but because they believed that the feeling which controls the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] probably would control both branches of Congress, and that they would not be able to obtain anything better.

Now, in addition to the objections stated by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOGOCCK,] I think but very little reflection is necessary to see that this is the worst system that can be devised—worst for the service, and worst for the sailor himself. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOGOCCK] has well depicted the bad consequence that would result from bringing up a sailor before a court, on board of a ship, and confronting him with his commanding officers, and permitting him to argue and dispute with them; for, unless you give him the right to defend himself, it is worth nothing.

But I say there is a still graver objection, and that goes to the advantage of the sailor, too. I say that this court-martial, on board of a ship, will be but a mockery. I say you cannot organize a court there which will do justice, as a court ought to do justice, upon the trial of a sailor. You will thereby divide the responsibility between the captain and two lieutenants; whereas, by the system proposed in this original bill, you leave the responsibility undivided in the hands of the captain. In the one case, you establish a court that is not responsible for its decisions, except as those decisions may be impeachable in the same manner in which the decisions of any other court are impeachable; but in the other case, you place the sole responsibility upon the captain, not as a court, but as a military commander, having the right to inflict punishment, to a certain extent, for offenses of a certain character. I say, that this would be better for the sailor, and he would be more likely to have justice administered with mercy, than by the decision of an irresponsible court of three officers, assembled in the cabin of a ship, or upon its deck, who would enter into such an investigation, as in all probability would be allowed upon such occasions.

Look at the circumstances of the case. What does a sailor know about defending himself? What does he know of the quirks and quibbles of the law? I wonder, sir, very much that these gentlemen did not also provide for an attorney on board a ship, to assist in the defense of the sailors, and tell them upon what points they might rest their defense, and to conduct and argue it for them.

But, sir, there is another objection to this system of court-martials on board a ship, and it is this: That on many of the public vessels you cannot get the officers required by this bill, on the terms of it, as presented by the gentleman from Virginia, because they are not upon board a ship; and then, in other instances, you will take all the officers, or nearly all the officers, on board from their duties; and, while they are trying the sailor in the captain's cabin, or on the quarter-deck, the ship will be in the hands of somebody else, and you thus give an opportunity for all the difficulties and dangers of mutiny and insubordination which this bill was intended to prevent, by taking the officers from that supervision which is indispensably necessary for the safety of the ship and the honor of the service.

It seems to me, sir, that the fundamental difficulty in the minds of gentlemen in this case, arises from the fact that they leave out of view the great and important principle that the Navy of the United States is a military establishment; that military discipline is necessary; and that you must sanction and clothe the commander of a military establishment, whether upon land or upon sea, with a certain degree of absolute power, which is indispensable. It has been so in all ages of the world, and is so now in all countries of the world. Sir, when this subject was up upon a former day, I attempted to call the attention of the House to the character of a ship-of-war. I then said, that one of our large ships—a ship-of-the-line—having on board something like one thousand men, would take the bone and sinew out of a town of ten thousand inhabitants, thus taking them away from all the ties of family and society, and crowding them together in one ship—one structure, and isolating them from all other society, on the broad and boundless sea. I said, sir, that independent of the military nature of the establishment, the ordinary principles of government could not be adopted upon such a vessel. Why, sir, look at the merchant service. A gentleman of this House, well acquainted with such matters, informed me, the other day, that even in the merchant service—not upon ships-of-war, but in the merchant service—there were such difficulties under the new law, of enforcing discipline, that the sailors were in the habit of using the lash upon each other. They take a delinquent sailor and flog him, thus carrying out the old system; and when they are prosecuted for it upon shore they deny it, and know nothing about it, so that it is impossible to convict the offenders. This shows, that in the merchant service, upon the seas, very strict discipline is absolutely necessary, and opposite to that which obtains, or can obtain, in civil society upon shore; but when you add the element, the military element, to this establishment; when you consider the necessity of military discipline for military purposes, the necessity becomes infinitely stronger.

Now, sir, I was not an advocate for flogging sailors with the lash. I think that mode of punishment was liable to great abuse, and was objectionable in its very nature; for it was calculated to degrade and disgrace the sailor, leaving upon him the mark which constituted the brand of his degradation. I have always understood, sir, that it was for this reason chiefly, if not entirely, that it was objected to; and the law was repealed by both Houses of Congress, not because the punishment was inflicted in a summary manner by the commander, but because of the character of the punishment, and its liability to abuse. Upon a former occasion, I said that it was liable to abuse, because, in the moment of passion, or anger, an officer might direct a sailor to be whipped, and after the punishment no reparation could be made. I contrasted that mode of punishment with the modes prescribed in this bill in which it is chiefly length of time which constitutes the severity of the punishment; and upon reflection, I think the mode of punishment prescribed in this bill is not liable to abuse in as great a degree as the mode formerly in use. But, sir, I never for a moment doubted the indispensable necessity of placing some mode of summary punishment in the hands of the commanding officer of a ship.

Now, sir, I will call the attention of the House for a few moments to the changes which I propose to make in this bill, for the purpose of meeting what I take to be the sense of the House. I do not know how far I have been able to ascertain the sense of this House, but my desire has been to conform this bill in all of its provisions to the prevailing sentiments of this body. I stated, when I first spoke upon this subject—although I did not enter fully into the matter, because I did not think it necessary to do so—that I thought the punishments provided in the Senate bill were of a very serious character, and that some of them were almost too severe, but that I relied upon the character of the officers of the Navy to deal justly and mercifully with the sailors under their command. I was disposed to present but few amendments to the bill at first, in order that it might pass as speedily as possible, for the benefit of that portion of the Navy then about to leave the United States. In the first place, sir, to meet one of the objections of the gentleman from Virginia, I have, in the amendments I propose, confined the punishments to any of those enumerated in this bill. I have reduced the length of time which the officer may prescribe as punishment in any one of the cases provided for in the bill. First, by discharge from the service with bad-conduct discharge, and of solitary confinement in irons, single or double, on bread and water, provided no such confinement shall exceed ten days. Thus, you will perceive, reducing the time from thirty to ten days. So, also, in solitary confinement, single or double-irons, I have reduced the time from thirty days to ten days. I have also reduced the time of confinement not exceeding three months to two months; also by providing that loss of pay shall not exceed one month: whereas in the original bill it was three months. Now, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] has made one of his strongest objections against what he considered, cruelty in reducing the rations of sailors, and confining them to a diet of bread and water. Now, sir, there are many offenses committed by sailors on board of ship which might be controlled by the—

Mr. MILLSON. The gentleman is mistaken; I did not object to the cruelty of the punishment, for the gentleman will find that my own substitute provides a similar punishment.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I certainly so understood the gentleman, or perhaps I may have confounded his remarks with those of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STEWART.]

Mr. BOCK. My colleague certainly did object to a man being confined in irons and put upon bread and water, at the same time.

Mr. MILLSON. That is what I objected to.

Mr. STANTON. I have often heard, and I am disposed to believe it is true, that there are many sailors in the Navy of the United States who would much prefer, if they had the option, taking twelve lashes with a colt or cat, to being deprived of their grog for a single week. Many of our sailors, sir, would submit to twelve lashes rather than be deprived of their tobacco; and I think, therefore, that one of the best modes of punishment is thus depriving them of, or reducing, their rations. But this infliction is well guarded by other provisions in the bill, so that it seems to me no one can take exception to it. The provision is as follows:

"Provided, That no sentence to solitary confinement shall be directed to be carried into execution until the surgeon or senior medical officer on board at the time, has examined the prisoner and certified that it can be done without serious injury to his health; and it shall be the duty of the commander to remit the whole, or any part of any sentence, the execution of which would, in the opinion of the said surgeon, or senior medical officer, produce such injury."

Now, sir, if the sailor is to be punished at all, surely there is no provision that can be more humane and merciful than this, that while under the infliction of the punishment, his health shall not suffer. I think, therefore, sir, upon the whole, that no objection can be taken to the severity of this punishment; and then the question comes to the single point, whether there shall be for these inferior offenses, requiring prompt and energetic correction, a court-martial organized upon board a ship under circumstances, when it must be manifest to everybody, that a fair and impartial inquiry cannot be given to the prisoner; when you divide the responsibility among those judges who are not responsible by impeachment; whereas, upon the other hand, you put the responsibility upon one man as commanding officer, upon his military honor and responsibility to the Government for any cruelty he may exercise towards the sailors.

I will here stop to repeat what I have already said, that I believe, on some occasions, the lash has been abused in the Navy. The cases are probably not frequent, but some may be shown in which it has been abused; and if anybody is responsible for the repeal of the law authorizing flogging in the Navy, it is those officers who have been guilty of abusing it. But the corrections were in the power of the Government; and so it is the duty of the Government to see that these punishments are not cruelly inflicted in the service, and there would be a better guarantee for due responsibility and the application of the proper correctives upon the principle of inflicting punishments at the discretion of the commander to this limited extent and for these particular purposes. I say, the responsibility would be greater, and the correctives more easily applied, than if you establish a court, which, in the nature of things, is irresponsible.

But the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STEWART] objects to the latter clause of this bill, the latter section, which provides an asylum for the sailor after serving twenty years; and he [Mr. STEWART] says that he is willing to raise the pay of the sailor, so as to get a better class of sailors. Now, sir, this bill virtually accomplishes that object; and it raises the pay of the sailor by giving him a bounty of three months' pay every two years, upon the condition that he has served faithfully and received a good-conduct discharge at the end of his period of service. It gives him the benefit of three months' pay, which is twelve and a half per cent. additional pay to the other already received. Well, now, sir, the additional inducement to the sailor is the clause which gives him half-pay for life in a naval hospital or asylum after he has served continuously for twenty years, with a good-conduct discharge at the termination of each period of his service. Now, I ask the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STEWART], if his proposition, simply to add four or six dollars to the pay of the sailor, without making it dependent on good or bad conduct, is the best? or, whether he would prefer to do it in the shape of a reward for good conduct? Which would be most effective in its operation upon the discipline of the Navy? It would be to give to the sailor for his good conduct a reward, and withhold it as a punishment for his bad conduct.

Mr. STUART. I would like to answer that inquiry upon this point. My object, as I stated, was this: to increase the pay to secure good men who are meritorious, and therefore would act meritoriously, and then there would be no necessity either for rewards or punishments. I insisted that if you would elevate the price to a standard sufficient to secure good men in the Navy, they could be as well obtained for that purpose as for any other business. That is true as a principle, and would be true in practice; and it would be far better economy than to spend your time, and that of your officers, and their pay, in beating and oppressing men who were unfit to be in the naval service. That was the point I made.

Mr. STANTON. I understand the substance of the gentleman's argument to be this: That by giving the sailors $16, or $18 per month, instead of $12, you will get rid of the necessity for punishment—that there will be no necessity either for reward or punishment in the Navy. Now, when the gentleman comes to the conclusion that human nature has become perfect—that sailors are all that they ought to be, then he may deprive the commanders of our vessels of all rights to control them—he may leave them to their own moral sense of what is right and what is wrong. But, sir, I apprehend no increase of pay will accomplish this great object. It can only be done by a system of rewards and punishments. I stated upon a former occasion, that the pay in your merchant service was from $16 to $18 per month, and the pay in the Navy $12 per month. Raise the pay of the Navy to $16, and you increase the cost of the present establishment from this cause alone $360,000 per annum. I would vote that in a moment—I would not hesitate to vote it if it would accomplish the object, but I should rather put it in the form of rewards and punishments, so it may be an incentive to accomplish the object. But how will you be able to discriminate between the good and bad sailor, except at the end of his term of service? Now, sir, that would be thirty-three and a third per cent. if it were $4, and fifty per cent. if it were $6, upon the present rate of pay of the sailors.

This bill provides for a bounty at the end of the term of service of three months' extra pay, which, as I have stated before, amounts to twelve and a half per cent. increase upon the pay for the two years. It is only to be paid in case of good conduct on the part of the sailor, and to be withheld in case of a bad-conduct discharge. Reward is one of the strongest motives you can present to a sailor for good conduct.

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. How much grog does the Government give each sailor per day?

Mr. STANTON. One gill of whisky—half a gill twice a day. I do not see the pertinence of the question, but I reply. In regard to the operation of the last section of this bill, which provides for the asylum and the half-pay for life, I have already spoken of the absolute impossibility of its being a charge upon the Government equal to the increase of the pay, if you should pay the sailor sixteen or eighteen dollars per month. I said—and I am sure the experience of every gentleman who knows anything upon the subject will bear me out in the declaration—that there is no man on the face of the globe who would be less willing to go into an asylum in a state of inactivity, to remain there doing nothing, enjoying this bounty, than the sailor, so long as he was able to do duty upon the sea. I have seen it suggested in some quarters that instead of giving him an asylum and half-pay for life, it would be better to give him the half-pay and let him go about his business. Now, sir, I object to that for this reason: that, then, a sailor who was competent to do duty—who was not old and worn out—might take his half-pay after twenty years service, and go about his business, perfectly capable of performing service. He might go on the merchant ships, and get his sixteen or eighteen dollars per month after he had served these twenty years in the Navy of the United States, and received his pay; but the bill proceeds upon the belief that a sailor who can make twelve dollars per month with the bounties and benefits to be enjoyed on board of a ship by his service—who is fond of the sea—who loves his ship better, perhaps, than he loves his wife—I say it proceeds upon the supposition—the belief—the well-founded conviction, this man will not remain inactive in an asylum so long as he is able to do duty upon the sea. Hence you will only have in your asylum those old decrepit sailors who have done faithful duty, and who have always received a good-conduct discharge. This is all I have to say in reference to the provisions of this bill.

Something was said, Mr. Speaker, upon a former day, when this subject was under discussion, in reference to the sailing of a portion of this celebrated Japan expedition. I was then reported to have said that the whole expedition, or the expedition, would sail during that week. I have already corrected that statement. I stated only that a portion of the expedition would sail, and I believe a portion of it has already sailed. My remark was quoted, and something has been said in the other end of the Capitol in reference to the objects of the expedition, and my name was used in connection with it. I have simply to say now to the House, that what may be the objects of this expedition I do not know. I have not felt it to be my duty to inquire; but I do know that there are objects of ample and sufficient importance in the Pacific ocean to justify the sending out of a much larger force. I suppose that the Government, in sending that force to the China seas, is doing so for a legitimate purpose, and not with a view of making war upon any unoffending people; but to protect our commerce—to protect our citizens, and to survey the channels and seas in which our commerce is engaged. These are the purposes, I suppose, for which the expedition has been sent out. But I will remark further, that if any portion of my friends in this House should expect to make any political capital by calling upon the President for the objects of that expedition, I think they would be apt to find themselves mistaken. Every one knows until the expedition sails the instructions will not be prepared. Commodore Perry himself, two weeks ago, told me that these instructions were not prepared, and that he did not know what they were. But I suppose whatever might be the intention of the Government, they would have the game in their own hands, and might reply what they please to any interrogatories which might be propounded from this or the other House as to the objects of this expedition. I think, as a party movement, nothing could be gained; and besides, I will say further, that I do not think that this Administration has shown itself to be very warlike, or much disposed to engage in what are usually termed Filibusterian expeditions. In reply to interrogatories which we might send with regard to the Japan expedition, I think they could relieve themselves from the suspicion of having any such design. I have a word more to say, and that is, that I hope this bill may be taken up and disposed of now; that it may be passed either in its original form, or in the form as presented by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] or in the form of a substitute which I present. It is absolutely indispensable, in my judgment, that something of this kind shall be done, and done speedily—immediately.

A good deal has been said in reference to the Naval Committee and its action upon this and other kindred subjects. I think I have shown, and that other members of the committee have shown, we have done our duty. We have done everything we could do with a view of bringing these subjects before the House to have them acted upon. I must confess I have been discouraged when I have seen this bill laid aside, day after day, for the purpose of making presidential speeches, and speeches having almost as little bearing upon the current business of the House. I have come to the conclusion there is very little hope of anything being done for the Navy. It is not my province—certainly it is not my intention—to presume to censure the House for anything it does. It is probably right, and the business to which they go generally when they leave this bill in the morning, may be vastly more important than it is; but, sir, I cannot agree with the House. I think this is a subject of very great importance. It is for the correction of a crying evil, on account of the existence of which we have had importunities from all quarters ever since the abolition of punishment by flogging. I think whatever may be the judgment of the House in reference to the bills presented for its consideration, it ought to decide upon them, and decide upon them speedily.

[A message was here received from the Senate by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., their Secretary, notifying the House that that body had receded from their amendment to the joint resolution authorizing a continuance of the work upon the two wings of the Capitol, rejected by the House. And that they had also passed several bills, in which he was directed to request the concurrence of the House.]

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. PRICE. Has the morning hour expired? The SPEAKER. It is within one minute of its expiration.

Mr. GORMAN. In obedience to a suggestion which I made yesterday, just before the adjournment, I will make a report from the Committee on Printing. I will ask permission to read it, as it is very short. It consists entirely of facts, without argument by the committee, pro or con. I will here observe to the House that I especially desire to make a remark, in addition to what is proposed in this written report, in regard to the public printing, and in regard to the pamphlet which has been laid upon our tables this morning by the public printer:

The Committee on Printing, which is charged by law with the duty of remedying any neglect or delay on the part of the contractor to do the public printing for the Thirty-second Congress, ask leave, for the information of the House, to report, that they have had the subject under consideration; and, after repeated conversations with the public printer, (Mr. Hamilton,) and after examining each piece of work or job, and after weighing the paper he furnished, and after a careful examination of the style and texture of the material, came unanimously to the conclusion that Mr. Hamilton had not fulfilled his contract. They, therefore, in the first place, made a pro rata deduction of ten per cent. from each bill as it was presented for payment. This deduction not having the effect to improve the work in the least, they rejected much of the work altogether. The committee, after having Mr. Hamilton before them, and notifying him distinctly of the intention of the committee, passed a resolution, which will be found to be in the exact language of the second section of the law of Congress, approved August 3d, 1846, as follows:

On motion by Mr. GORMAN,
“Resolved, That for so much of the public printing as may be deemed necessary by the committee to remedy any neglect or delay on the part of the contractor (Mr. Hamilton) to execute the work ordered by Congress, the persons doing the work, under the direction of this committee, be allowed the same price as contained in Mr. Rives's bid for printing for the Thirty-second Congress: Provided, That in no case shall pay be allowed for double composition.”

The committee proceeded to designate the persons with whom they would contract, if the terms proposed by the committee should be accepted by the said parties. Whereupon the following resolution was adopted, April 8:

“Resolved, That the committee enter into a contract with Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong to do so much of the printing ordered by the House of Representatives for the present Congress, as may be necessary to remedy any neglect or delay of the contractor, (A. B. Hamilton,) to execute the work ordered by this Congress; and, also, with Messrs. Gideon & Co., to do so much of the printing ordered by the Senate as may be necessary for the like purpose. Said contract to be on such terms as the committee and the contractors may agree upon as shall be just.”

The committee further directed Mr. GORMAN, by the following resolution, to confer with Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong and Gideon & Co., and get from them, in writing, their acceptance or non-acceptance of their proposition:

“Resolved, That Mr. GORMAN confer with Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong and Gideon & Co., and get from them, in writing, their acceptance or non-acceptance of the foregoing proposition.”

To which they reply as follows:

“WASHINGTON, April 13, 1852.
“SIR: We accept the offer of the joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, to do the printing of the House of Representatives upon the terms of the bid of Mr. John C. Rives for the printing of the present Congress, with the modification of an exemption from the deduction of sixty-nine per cent. on press work, on numbers exceeding 20,000. This deduction applies, practically, solely to the Patent Office Report, upon which, should we submit to it (as the committee are aware, assuming that the same number of copies are ordered the present as were ordered the last Congress) we should incur a heavy loss. When it is considered that the bid of Mr. Rives was designed to cover the census, and, taken as a whole, including the census, would have yielded a fair compensation, the committee will at once perceive the reasonableness of the modification we propose, inasmuch as the offer of the committee does not include the census.”

“Respectfully, DONELSON & ARMSTRONG.

“Hon. WILLIS A. GORMAN, Chairman.”

“We concur in the foregoing. GIDEON & Co.”

Your committee have now exhibited their proceedings fully to the eye of the House; they will say further, that they have not rescinded or abrogated the contract with Mr. Hamilton. They have supposed that they had no such power, but they have confined their action to the precise letter of the law defining their powers and duties. It is expected to hold Mr. Hamilton to a strict accountability on his bonds for any excess which the Government has to pay over the contract price of said Hamilton. The prices which your committee have agreed to give the persons with whom they propose to contract, are those stated in the public bid of John C. Rives for the printing to this Congress. This bid was made when he was competing with other bidders for this work, and is believed by the committee to be just and fair in view of all the present circumstances.

Your committee deem it appropriate to this occasion to say, that divers motions and propositions were made to give all this printing to Donelson & Armstrong, in view of the fact that they were the organs of the dominant party; but all were voted down, and generally by a tie vote. It was proposed to parcel it out in divers ways, and to divers persons, but all failed, until the names hereinbefore stated were inserted, and never was anything done until the imperative necessity in view of the interest of the country, and the advancement of legislation, compelled action of some sort.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. Speaker: In respect to the pamphlet laid upon our tables this morning, the honor of the committee demands that the House should indulge me in making a response to the statements made by Mr. Hamilton. Our individual honor requires this also. This man states that he has never had notice. The honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] upon that side of the House, and the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] associated with me, can rise in their places, and now state to this House, that that statement of his is willfully and deliberately false. Knowing it to be false, he ought to be branded for it. It is infamy enough to turn him out of his position, if it were possible for the House to do it. I state that he ought to be branded for it. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] whether that gentleman has not been before the committee upon different occasions? I now ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] if that gentleman has not been before that committee upon different occasions?

Mr. HAVEN. He has, sir.

Mr. STANTON. He has, sir.

Mr. GORMAN. I state to the House that I gave him notice myself, and he came before the committee in obedience to that notice. And here this man comes before the House and brands the committee as liars, for which he deserves to be turned out of his position. It is an insult to each member of the committee—an insult to the country, and an insult to this House of Representatives, for whom he is doing the work. He says, in this statement here, that he has performed his work, and that the only instance where he has failed is in the character of the material. We weighed the paper, and it fell short about ten pounds to the ream. The chairman of the committee [Mr. BORLAND] weighed it carefully with scales prepared for the purpose, and it fell far short of the contract price. There was not margin enough. The type, the impression, and the ink were all miserable, until the chairman of the committee in the Senate sent it back as rejected altogether, and they would not receive such work. In the next place, the President's message and accompanying documents ought to have been on your tables in forty days, and here are four months and more elapsed. In addition to that, the paper upon which he contracted to do your public printing, according to his bid and contract, cost more than all he gets from the Government, for his printing, type, press-work, ink, and everything else. Then, of course he cannot be expected to execute that contract, unless he has a millionaire at his back. I repeat, that the cost of the white paper, if he comply with his contract, will cost more than all he gets under his bid. Allow me, while here, to say, that the impression has gone before the country, that we have abrogated the contract of this gentleman, Mr. Hamilton. The impression has gone out, and it is whispered around this Hall, that we have elected a public printer by this committee; that we have assumed to appoint a printer for this House. We have got public printing upon our desks, ready to be handed over to the public printer, which we withheld, because we could not get it done according to the contract which you made with him. If we act as honorable men, can we give it to a man who, we know, has failed, in every essential particular, in complying with his contract? You say, in the law, that when he does so, we have a right to reject the work altogether. We are acting under a law, and not under a rule of this House. You have designated the Committee on Public Printing by law, and you have also designated their powers.

You cannot abrogate the powers of that committee except you repeal that law.

The law reads as follows:

"There shall be a committee consisting of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives."

I read from a joint resolution passed the 3d August, 1846. If you desire to see it, you will find it in miscellaneous document number thirty-three.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I wish to ask the gentleman one question. I cannot find that there has been any committee chosen by this House, and the law requires that they shall be chosen. I wish to know if there has been one chosen at all?

Mr. GORMAN. I will proceed with what I was about to say. I will read first a provision of the law in relation to this subject:

"A committee, consisting of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives, shall be chosen by their respective Houses, which shall constitute a Committee on Printing, which shall have power to adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect or delay on the part of the contractor to execute the work ordered by Congress, and to make a pro rata reduction in the compensation allowed, or to refuse the work altogether, should it be inferior to the standard; and in all cases, the contractor and his securities shall be responsible for any increased expenditure consequent upon the non-performance of the contract. The committee shall audit and pass upon all accounts for printing; but no bill shall be acted upon for work that is not actually executed and delivered, and which they may require to be properly authenticated."

We have only the power to do what? To remedy neglect to comply with the contract—to remedy any neglect in printing the documents in time. That is our business. We are sentinels placed upon the watch-tower to see that your contractor has done his duty, and to see that you get your public documents when you need them, and in due time. When the conviction forced itself upon us, that he had not done so, we attempted to parcel out the printing, so that it could be done properly. One gentleman proposed that it be done by Donelson & Armstrong. Another gentleman proposed to add the name of Mr. Towers, and so on, until almost everybody in this city was proposed. I frankly tell this House, that I have voted for two months against anybody having this printing but Donelson & Armstrong; and when I asked the honorable chairman what he proposed, and what he wanted, he responded "he wanted nothing." I found that something must be done. The public business must go on. I found that I must vote for somebody; and, finally, after two months' consultation, I voted for the Republic. I have since learned from a publication made in the Southern Press, that there was a secret smothered desired, never made known to the country, to have the Southern Press put in for a part of the spoils of power. When that issue was presented to me, I did not see proper to choose the Southern Press. I have been driven to do a thing to which I would have preferred almost anything else, and that is, to give the printing to a party organ of the other side. I am a party man, and I would not have consented to such a thing under any circumstances, if I could have avoided it, until the public necessity demanded that I should act in some way. When that imperative necessity arose, and forced itself upon me, I acted; and I am here ready to take any responsibility which may be devolved upon me. The Southern Press published this morning an article which would indicate to the country that they desire some of this public printing. I ask the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] who is associated with me, and the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] if they ever heard it suggested anywhere that the Southern Press wanted a part of the public printing? We never heard of that name as claiming, asking, or soliciting in any way a part of the public printing. A gentleman across the way says the National Era would like to have a little of this printing. Very likely; because we have some elements here very favorable to extreme opinions; but I shall not go into that matter, and I will not be driven by side-bar remarks into anything of that kind. I only wish to state to the House, in my own justification, that I have been driven to this vote by public necessity, and the imperative demand upon me to act in this way, or not to act at all. One of two things had to be done; the various shades of opinion on that committee forced me thus to act; every sort of proposition that I can now think of was made to facilitate the public printing, and, unfortunately, almost every vote tied. What was to be done? Could I justify myself in the committee, and not allow the President's message and the accompanying documents, and other official reports to be laid upon your table by a tie vote, from day to day, and then come in here and justify myself on the ground that, because I could not get it for my particular party friends, I should cast a tie vote till doomsday, so that you could not get any documents at all? I would like to know where there is a finger that would not have been pointed at me, with the rebuke written upon it that that was a degree of partisan attachment that is not to be tolerated when the interests of the country suffer by it? I did right; and I stand here to defend and justify myself under the circumstances. We do not intend to give any man more than the prices which have been stipulated in some of the public bids by the public bidders; and we intend to justify the prices which we intend to give by the prices which were made in public market—bids made to the country by the competitors for the public printing. If this House see proper, upon this occasion, to do anything in the premises—to give any direction to the committee, it shall be my pleasure, in respect to the House, and in respect to myself and my position, to do anything they may desire me to do; but I will not be charged by the press as having been connected with a coalition, for I never in my life saw Gideon or Co., until since this action of the committee took place.

Mr. BOCOCK. I find in the law "that the committee shall have power to take such measures as may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect or delay upon the part of the contractor to execute the work done by Congress." I wish to know if the committee has gone simply to the extent of making contracts with these gentlemen to do the work which has been already neglected or delayed by the public printer, or whether the committee have actually made a contract for the work hereafter to be done?

Mr. GORMAN. The public printer has not been dismissed. The law requires that if he fails to comply with his contract, that we shall let out the printing, and make the contractor, upon his bond, responsible. That is what we are going to do, if you leave the matter to us. We will give him an opportunity of doing all the work he can do under his contract, when he will do it according to that contract we will give it to some one else. Now, the gentleman asks me whether it is to be the printing already ordered, or that which is hereafter to be ordered. It is the printing which has been ordered. We do not look into the future. We will only order printing to Donelson & Armstrong, and Gideon & Co., of such work as comes to our hands by the order of this House, which the contractor will not do promptly according to his contract. There is a large portion of the public printing which has not been given into the hands of the public printer, because he has failed to comply with his contract. Then just so much as we find that he cannot execute according to his contract, just that much, and no more, shall we give to anybody else.

Mr. BOCOCK. Is it the intention of the committee to give the President's message into the hands of new printers, and to have all the types set up anew, and the whole work done over again, or will it remain in the hands of the public printer?

Mr. GORMAN. It will remain in the hands of the public printer, unless he shall fail to comply with his contract. If he fails to comply with his contract, in order to remedy his neglect, we may be compelled to take it out of the hands of the present public printer and give it to somebody else.

Mr. BOCOCK. Has not the public printer already set up the type for the whole message?

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. No, not for one third of it.

Mr. GORMAN. Not more than one third of it; and what he has done is a disgrace to the country. I say unhesitatingly, that there are not three gentlemen on this floor of any party who will look at the contract and then examine the character of the work that has been done, and of the materials that have been used, but who will say that it has fallen far, far below the contract in every essential particular.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, (interposing.) I see it stated in this circular which has been laid upon our desks, that all the copy the public printer has received for the current business he has executed the printing of, and that he is running through the press, at the rate of one hundred pages a day, the President's message and accompanying documents. Now, I want to know if that be true; and, if it is true, whether it is designed to throw all that aside and make a new contract for this same matter? I ask the gentleman to give me the information. I have looked at the volume of the President's message which has been already printed, and have compared it with the work of the same kind of last year, and I think it vastly superior.

Mr. GORMAN. The message last year was printed on paper weighing thirty-eight pounds to the ream, and this year's contract requires it to be printed on paper weighing fifty pounds to the ream.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, it is vastly superior.

Mr. GORMAN. It is very little, if any, superior, for the paper used weighs forty pounds to the ream. Mr. Hamilton shall have no injustice done him. Let me say to the House that the bills and reports and other papers that are laid upon our desks, are done very well, and done in such a manner that we have received that part of the work. We do not design to take from him any part that he is executing according to his contract. The first and fifth classes he has executed as well as need be, and, consequently, we have made no complaint. But it is the heavy work which he cannot do, and he must lose $50,000 if he undertakes to execute it.

Mr. BROOKS, (interrupting.) As I understand the contract with the public printer, the paper on which he was to print the President's message would cost thirteen or fourteen cents a pound, depending on the state of the paper market. The paper upon which he has printed the President's message can, some of it, be bought for eight cents per pound, and some of it for nine cents per pound; so that, in that respect, there has been a great variation from the contract.

Mr. GORMAN. In regard to the President's message, the printer would produce the impression by the paper which he has laid upon our desks, that he has had it all set up. Now, I understand that he has got five hundred pages of it set up, and that the whole of it will make two thousand pages.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] is right as to the price of the paper. You can buy paper such as that upon which the President's message has been printed for from eight and a half to nine and a half cents per pound, while the contract required it to be printed upon paper that would cost from fourteen and a half to sixteen cents per pound. You cannot make this man execute this contract under his bonds, for if he did it he would lose $50,000, and, let me tell you, his bonds only cover $20,000. There is one bond for $1,000, one for $2,000, one for $15,000, and, perhaps, another for $1,000.

I stated just now that there were five hundred pages of the President's message set up. That statement was made upon a memorandum handed to me by a gentleman who, I presume, knew all about the facts. There may, perhaps, be a few more pages set up.

Now, sir, I say to the House and to the country, there is our report, what do you want us to do? If I have the power, I shall attempt to carry out the law, and have the printing done at as cheap a rate as it possibly can be done at—at as cheap a rate as any printer in this country, who is responsible, and disposed honestly to comply with his contract—can undertake to do it at; and I will be responsible to the country, and my friends from Kentucky and New York, [Messrs. STANTON and HAVEN,] will be responsible to the country that it shall be so done. We intend to have the printing done upon paper weighing fifty pounds to the ream. Now, one thing more in conclusion. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has made the remark here, that this House has not chosen a Committee on Printing. Then, sir, I do declare to you that I most sincerely hope that the House, in choosing, will select somebody else but me; for of all the committees I have ever served on, either in the State Legislature or here, the Committee on Printing is the most burdensome and the most thankless. If the House will select some one whom they deem more competent than I am to fill this arduous post, they will relieve me of much of the labor which I have been expecting to perform here. We have to go into every little report, to calculate whether the prices are exactly right, and to sign every account before it goes to the Committee on Public Accounts. We have to inspect every item, and examine the weight and quality of the paper, and the character of the binding. With all these arduous duties attached to it, I do not envy the man who desires to be on that committee. This House, through its organ, the Speaker, saw proper to place me at the head of the Committee on Printing. I presume that in appointing that committee, the Speaker exercised no power that was not delegated to him by the rules.

Mr. DUNHAM. The Committee on Printing was appointed under a resolution of the House.

Mr. GORMAN. My friend behind me says that the committee was appointed in obedience to a resolution of the House, and I believe he is correct. If, then, the committee were appointed in obedience to a resolution of the House, I suppose the House chose them.

The SPEAKER, (interposing.) The rule in relation to the appointment of committees is in these words:

"All committees shall be appointed by the Speaker, unless otherwise specially directed by the House."

The Chair does not remember whether there was a special resolution passed in reference to the Committee on Printing, but he is of opinion that, under that rule, his right is very clear to appoint all the committees of this House.

Mr. DUNHAM. There was a resolution adopted expressly requiring the Speaker to appoint the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GORMAN. What do I ask this House to do? Why, I must tell them frankly, that there is not much I have to ask them to do. If the House will pass a resolution reiterating our powers and asking us to see to the public printing in good faith, I think that is all they can do, unless indeed they intend to pass a resolution themselves giving the public printing to some one, or to sanction the course of proceeding of the present contractor. Judge of your own course; but I see nothing that can be done, except to proceed in the manner in which the committee have proceeded.

Mr. HAVEN then obtained the floor.

[Mr. BARRERE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported back, as correctly enrolled, a joint resolution "to authorize the continuance of the work upon the two wings of the Capitol," and it received the signature of the Speaker.]

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from New York indulge the Chair for a single moment, until he responds to the question which seems to have been raised by the interrogatory of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. HAVEN. Certainly. I shall be happy to hear what the Chair has to say upon that point.

The SPEAKER. At the beginning of this session, on motion by Mr. GEORGE W. JONES, it was "ordered, that the Speaker be authorized to appoint the Committee on Printing."

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, (interposing.) I desire to ask the Speaker a question. The 20th of the joint rules of the two Houses is as follows:

"A committee, consisting of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives, shall be chosen by their respective Houses, which shall constitute a Committee on Printing," &c.

Now, that joint rule is copied from the act of Congress itself, and what I want to know is, could any resolution of this House repeal that law?

The SPEAKER. In reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the Chair thinks that this House has certainly, through its organ, appointed this committee in conformity to law. There can be no doubt about that.

Mr. STEVENS. There is a great deal of doubt about it, in my mind.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. The House chose its own way to choose the committee.

Mr. HAVEN. If it be true that there is no regularly-appointed Committee on Printing on the part of the House, why, then, I have nothing further to say, except that I should like, if the House takes away the appointment, to have them take away all the labor and difficulty that the committee have had to undergo.

The SPEAKER. For the more perfect understanding upon the subject of the appointment of the Committee on Printing, will the gentleman again allow the Chair to state the facts?

Mr. HAVEN. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution authorizes the two Houses to choose this joint committee. The House of Representatives passed a resolution authorizing their organ, the Speaker, to appoint the committee on its part. Even if that had not been done, the seventh rule of the House authorizes the Speaker to appoint the committee. But to remove all doubt about it, the House of Representatives, at the beginning of this session, ordered their Speaker to appoint the committee on their part. Such has been the practice of this body in every Congress since the joint resolution was adopted. The Chair hopes that every gentleman will understand the course of the Speaker, and that the Committee on Printing of this body is duly authorized to act under the joint resolution.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire to say one thing before stating some facts to the House. It has been questioned whether the Committee on Printing should not be entitled to vote in separate bodies; that is, that the three members appointed by the House shall be entitled to vote as one body, and the three members appointed by the Senate entitled to vote as a separate and independent body. In answer to that, let me call the attention of the House for a moment to the law which authorized the appointment of the committee. That law provides that "a committee, consisting of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives, shall be chosen by the respective Houses." The committee is to consist of three members from each House; and when you get the three members from each House, it is to constitute a committee of six, and is the committee provided for under the second section of the act under which this committee is appointed. Hence, I entertain not a doubt that the committee have been acting in strict accordance with the spirit of the second section of this act in that respect.

I now desire to say a few words in reference to Mr. Hamilton, and a portion of the public printing, in relation to which I, as one of the Committee on Printing, and which, I think, the whole six of the committee, are entirely satisfied. It is true, in reference to the light work, such as the calendars laid upon our tables, the bills, and the reports, or, at least, the short reports, that the work has been executed well enough; and I desire to do Mr. Hamilton the justice to say, that I believe it is the opinion of every member of the committee, as it is my individual opinion, that this species of work has been done better than it had been heretofore. I will remark, that the calendars in the early part of the session do not come under that suggestion; but after ten per cent. was deducted from his compensation on account of the inferiority of the material used, the printing of them was improved. Indeed, the only evidence I have seen of benefit resulting from that reduction was the very next day. I believe the calendars came upon our tables printed upon better paper. Gentlemen will recollect the old brown-looking paper that was laid upon our tables in the shape of these calendars at first; and when the change was made, it made such an impression that the honorable member from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] rose and called the attention of the House to the fact that we had a public printer who, at least in this respect, was disposed to do his work in a satisfactory manner.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York, for the information of the House, whether Mr. Hamilton did not stipulate expressly in his contract that this species of work should be done better than it had been done heretofore?

Mr. HAVEN. The contract is before the members of the House. The committee so understood it. But I am free to say, that, for one, I never expected it would come to the point to which it has come. If the work had come up to a reasonable approach to the contract, I should have been willing to have it go on; if it had come within five or ten per cent. of the contract, I should have considered it as a tight fit, and let it run, because I know this man took this work at a low price.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. The gentleman did not understand my question. I inquired if the contract did not expressly require Mr. Hamilton to furnish better paper than that heretofore used?

Mr. HAVEN. I think it does; but I cannot speak with certainty with regard to it. I desire to say to the House, that I believe it is the unanimous opinion of the committee, that Mr. Hamilton is competent to perform that portion of the work to which I have alluded, and that it is their wish that he should continue to perform it, if he does it in the manner in which he has done it heretofore. If it were to be taken from him, I should not be willing to give it to either of the men who have the residue of the printing. I should vote to give it to Mr. Towers or Mr. Rives; and neither of these gentlemen, in my opinion, could perform the work better than does Mr. Hamilton. The difficulty with him is this: It is in the heavy work, like the President's message and accompanying documents, which, as I understand, are to be two thousand pages, or more, like the Patent Office Report, and that of the Coast Survey, and one or two other works, that are of a magnitude that Mr. Hamilton is totally unable and incompetent to cope with.

I need not call the attention of the House to the fact, that more than one hundred and twenty days of the session are now gone. More than four months of the session are already gone; and does this House want any more evidence of the incompetency of this man to do this heavy work than the fact, that the only thing that has yet appeared upon the tables is the first part of the President's message and accompanying documents?

Mr. MARSHALL. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Have the Committee on Printing furnished the public printer with the documents to which he has referred?

Mr. HAVEN. I will answer the gentleman with pleasure. They have been furnished. The President's message and accompanying documents were furnished on the first days of the session.

Mr. POLK. Have they ever been furnished by the public printer?

Mr. HAVEN. Certainly not. Right here, before it escapes me, I desire to make this suggestion. Some three or four weeks after the President's message went into the hands of the public printer—Mr. Hamilton—we called him to our committee room and put him through a course of questioning, if I may be allowed the expression. We inquired of him particularly, why, up to that period, we had no visible evidence that he was able, or had been so, to perform his contract in reference to the President's message and accompanying documents. His answer was, "I have been delayed; I could have done it before, but I have been delayed because the Committee on Engraving have not determined in reference to the maps which are to go with this printing." "Well, Mr. Hamilton," said we, "suppose we relieve you from that delay, (the committee were rather under the impression that the work might have been done with the exception of the engraving,) in what time can you have the President's message completed?" He said he could have it in twenty days from that time. I inquired of Mr. Rives, and some other gentlemen, and they told me that, taking it from the beginning, it ought to be on the tables of the members in less than forty days. Well, sir, we relieved him at once upon the subject of engraving, which, as I said, was some two or three weeks after the commencement of the session. Since that time the only evidence we have had of his ability to perform this portion of the contract, is the first part of the President's message and accompanying documents, which was laid upon our tables some two weeks ago.

Now, let me call the attention of the House to the printed statement of Mr. Hamilton. I do not desire to say anything rash or hard of that gentleman. Nor do I say my colleague on the committee [Mr. GORMAN] has said anything of the kind. But I am bound to say so much as this: While I do Mr. Hamilton full credit for performing well that portion of the work to which I have before alluded, and while I am willing to continue that work to him, yet it is true, that if he undertakes to say that he has never received any notice or intimation of our intention in relation to this matter, or that he has never had any communication with the committee upon this subject, that he is wholly mistaken; and if his memory is a correct one, then he is intentionally mistaken. I cannot see how he can have forgotten; for, in addition to the interviews we have had with him in the committee room, we have reported to us from the chairman of the Committee on Printing in the other branch of the Capitol, (Colonel BORLAND,) that he had had various and continuous interviews with him. Indeed, I could not help thinking at the time when that gentleman was relating these interviews that the others upon the committee had very little reason to complain of the labor and trouble which devolved upon us, when ours was so little with that which the chairman [Mr. BORLAND] has been compelled to undergo for the purpose of getting this work along in some reasonable time.

I will now take up the points made by Mr. Hamilton in his printed memorial in their order. In the first place, he says:

"1. That all the bills and joint resolutions of both Houses of Congress are printed and delivered, and he holds receipts for the same."

I do not doubt that. They were printed to my satisfaction, and he has my consent to continue on to print them; and I look with confidence to his fulfilling the contract. But again he says:

"2. That all the reports of committees, except three adverse ones, are printed and delivered, and he holds receipts for the same."

I do not know whether that be true or not. But I have no particular complaint to make in regard to the reports; and I am willing he should continue to print them until I see some more flagrant violation of the contract.

"3. That the Journals of both Houses are ready for press, so far as he has copy placed in his hands, and all is in proof to the first days of April."

With the printing of the Journals I am satisfied. I think he has done it well; and I should not, in regard to this class, be willing, for one, to interfere. I do not think that any measure is necessary upon the part of the committee to remedy any neglect or delay in that particular. But I now come to the suggestions which have before been made in reference to the heavy work. He says:

"4. All executive documents, of every character, are complete, or partially so, so that they might be delivered in a short time, except some eight or ten, heretofore considered of no public importance."

It is to this point that I desire to call the particular attention of the House. Why, there are some eight or ten reports, of an executive character, which he has not touched at all, yet he says: "All executive documents of every character are complete, or partially so." Partially so! What does he mean by that? Is the President's message and accompanying documents complete—or partially so? They are not complete; but partially so; that is, he has printed one part, and laid it upon the tables of the members, in the style with which gentlemen are acquainted. Are the other reports "complete, or partially so?" While Colonel GORMAN was speaking, I asked the Clerk to show me the executive documents which had been sent to the printer, but not heard from. He said he could not do it exactly, but he gave me the list which I now hold in my hand, and gentlemen will see it is a pretty long one. All these documents have gone into that receptacle. I do not mean to say that it is correct in every particular, but I show it, in order to give gentlemen some idea of the truth of the statement made by Mr. Hamilton.

All I intend to say in reference to these executive documents, and this work of a heavy character, is, that it is my opinion, as a member of this House, that you may call from now until the time fixed upon by the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] to adjourn sine die, and you will effect nothing beyond what the printer says is now the fact, that "they are all complete, or partially so;" that is, he has taken them up and done something to them, but he cannot complete them.

Now, under this state of things, what could the committee do? They have had an embarrassing time of it. They came to a conclusion early, in reference to this matter; but of that I do not care to speak. Under these circumstances, it seemed the duty of the committee to adopt such measures as might be deemed necessary to remedy the delay upon the part of the contractor, in executing the work ordered by Congress. And what measures could they adopt? Could they go into Mr. Hamilton's printing office, and cause the type to be set up? No one will pretend it. Could they go into his office, or could any man go there, and set up his type? No man will pretend it. Could they go, with a strict hand, and take them away? That they could do. But of what service would that be? How would that remedy the neglect and delay? The only way by which to remedy the neglect and delay, as the committee understood it, was to take that portion of the work which this contractor could not perform, and give it to some one else, leaving him to do that portion which he could well do. Now, what could the committee do? They might go and take the manuscript away, but that would not remedy the neglect and delay. They must give it to somebody else to print. Now, to whom should they give it?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? I understand that they are to give it to those printers, at the price bid by Mr. Rives. Those printers agreed to accept it, declining, however, to make the discount of sixty-nine per cent., which Mr. Rives offered to make upon certain parts of the work. I ask why it was, if Mr. Rives was a bidder, and they were going to give it upon his terms, that they did not give it to him, he being the next lowest bidder?

Mr. HAVEN. If the gentleman had waited a moment, he would have understood that, and I will not undertake to answer him at this moment. Now, I ask, how was this committee to remedy the neglect and delay? It was to take it away. That was one part of their process. The other was to give it to some one else. Now, to whom should they give it? There was just as great a variety of opinion in the committee upon that subject as there were members of the committee. Some of them worked to get it into politics, and some to keep it out; and they tried it on in every way. I was disposed to give a good portion of the work to Mr. Towers—that is, the portion of the work which he wanted, which was the lighter work. I found that Mr. Hamilton, the contractor, did that work in a manner satisfactory to me, and I could not take it away from him. I would have been entirely willing to have given it to Mr. Rives, but he had a large contract from this House, in reference to the Congressional Globe; but the other members of the committee thought otherwise, and I am free to say that I agree with them, because I have always understood Mr. Rives to say that he did not choose to interfere with these printing contracts. The Congressional Globe, he has always told me, was an offspring of his own, and one to which he intended to devote all his attention. The committee did not think it best to give the work to him. But to whom should they give it? They gave it to the two whom they have selected. They could not agree upon any one else.

But here the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] inquires of me in reference to Mr. Rives's bid—whether his was the next lowest bid. I answer, in reference to that, that I cannot speak from a personal examination of the papers, but I can from a conversation with Mr. Rives upon the subject. And I understood from him, that the very next lowest bid was by a man who, the committee are informed, would not take the contract at all.

The next was by Mr. Towers. As I understood, Mr. Rives told me that Mr. Towers would not be able to perform the work without some aid; that he could make nothing out of it if he took it at his bid, but that he would be willing to aid him in reference to that; and, as I understand him, his [Mr. Rives] bid was the next lowest. Now, when the committee made up their minds that some course must be adopted to remedy this neglect and delay, they were desirous of having it remedied at as low a price as they could, giving anything like a remunerative price to the party who should do it. It seems to me, that by the common law of this House, and the common law of the country, that Mr. Rives is an oracle upon this subject; and it is well understood that his bid was a fair one.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman allow me a moment to ask him a question? Has not Mr. Rives a memorial pending before the Printing Committee, in which he makes reference to this bid for the public printing? and in which he says that he is the lowest bona fide bidder for the greatest portion of the printing for Congress, and having made ample provisions for it, &c., he claims, after Mr. Hamilton, to be the lowest bona fide bidder?

Mr. HAVEN. I desire to say to the House, that when I was chosen upon this committee the duties of it devolving upon me were those with which I was wholly unacquainted. I knew nothing about printing, practically, in any shape or form, and in governing my action upon this committee, I have endeavored to keep within the language of the law, and within its spirit and meaning. I have felt, for one, that the heavy portions of this work could not be done by Mr. Hamilton. We have had evidence of it in every way—every evidence that can be conveyed to the minds of men. Other portions of the work he can perform well, and it is performed to my satisfaction, and I desire that he should retain it.

Mr. SACKETT, (interrupting.) Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAVEN. Certainly.

Mr. SACKETT. Did the committee ascertain at what time the different portions of the executive document were delivered to the House during last session of the last Congress?

Mr. HAVEN. I cannot say. I have no knowledge upon that subject.

Mr. SACKETT. If it did not ascertain that, I desire to know whether the committee cannot, by referring to the records of the delivery of that document, furnish that information to the House.

Mr. HAVEN. I do not know anything upon the subject, but I presume that the message was delivered, last year, before Congress adjourned. There is no likelihood of getting it in that time this year.

Mr. SACKETT. It was delivered, as I understand, in three parts. The first part some time in March, the second some time in April, and the last not until June.

Mr. GORMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SACKETT] asks my colleague on the committee, [Mr. HAVEN], whether these documents were not furnished after the adjournment of the last Congress? Now, if the members of this House are willing to receive the kind of public printing which was delivered then, we are perfectly content.

Mr. SACKETT. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] will allow me to address one word to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN], I understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] announced that he had examined some part of the documents already printed, and that they were printed in a better style than this document, (holding up a printed document,) which is one that was printed last Congress. And I understand the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] to acquiesce in that statement.

Mr. GORMAN. I certainly do not acquiesce in that statement. The contract this year requires the paper to weigh fifty pounds to the ream. I so said; and if the gentleman had had his ears open, he would have heard it. The contract of last year required the printing to be done upon paper weighing only thirty-eight pounds. Now, if the paper on which the document this year is printed is of the same quality, or about as good as that of last year, the present contractor has failed in performing his contract by twelve pounds to the ream.

Mr. SACKETT. The gentleman misunderstood my question. It is not whether the contractor is directly complying with the contract, but the specific question, whether the document, as printed, is a document superior—as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] states—to the one I hold in my hand?

Mr. GORMAN. I answer, it is not equal. The type is far inferior.

Mr. HAVEN. There is but a suggestion or two further that I desire to make to this House. It has been asked of me, sitting in my seat, why the committee did not advertise, and by that means get bids again upon this subject? Well, I can only say upon that, that the committee did not regard that, when they came to act upon the subject, as one of the measures necessary for the purpose of remedying this neglect and delay. They would have gladly and willingly have adopted that course; but that it was calculated to take up a large portion of time, and would not secure propositions anywhere, except from this city, and they could have that communication with the printers here without that delay.

Now, the public printer seeks to convey the impression to the House, that the House has not kept its contract with him. Since this discussion arose this morning, and while the chairman of the committee on the part of the House was reading his report, I took measures to ascertain the amount which had been paid to the printer for his printing. Perhaps it may be of some consequence to the House to know the facts. There has been paid this year for printing, upon the part of the House, $4,527 72, and upon the part of the Senate $4,393 04. The deduction of ten per cent., which some gentleman has said to me was calculated to cripple his operations, and which has been withheld in consequence of the non-performance of his contract, amounts to $800, a little more or less, as the clerk of the committee informs me.

Mr. FLORENCE. May I be permitted to say a word?

Mr. HAVEN. Certainly.

Mr. FLORENCE. I apprehend, sir, that the reference to the crippling of the operations of the public printer, refers more particularly to the fact that three months ago—perhaps more than that—the Joint Committee on Printing of the two Houses intimated that the public printer was not competent to perform his work. Now, sir, I speak of my own knowledge, when I say that persons, paper-makers in another part of the country—in Philadelphia—wrote to me that, in consequence of the action of that joint committee, and if obstacles were to be thrown in the way of the public printer, and if the committee were to anticipate that he was not able to perform his work, that his credit would be destroyed, and they would not be willing to sell him paper upon credit.

Mr. HAVEN. I can only say, that in expressing my opinion here in reference to the heavy portion of this work, Mr. Hamilton is unable to perform it, I have no desire to cripple his resources. Whenever I have expressed any opinion upon that subject, here or elsewhere, I have expressed those which I honestly and sincerely entertain; and if that is calculated to cripple his resources, it is a misfortune which I cannot avoid. When I am called to speak upon these subjects, I speak what I think; still I am not aware that the committee, as such, have ever, outside of their room, expressed an opinion calculated to cripple the public printer, here or elsewhere. One word more, and I have done. The question has been raised as to the time, in previous sessions, when these documents have been delivered?

Mr. FLORENCE. May I be permitted to ask another question?

Mr. HAVEN. I will yield the floor in a moment. This public printer says, that the "President's message and documents are running through the press at the rate of one hundred pages a day." That may be true. I do not know to the contrary; but in what way is it running through at the rate of one hundred pages a day? Does he intend that this House shall understand that one hundred pages of new matter, not before set up, are set up and proof taken from it per day? If that is so, if he intends to be so understood, I desire to say to this House, that from all the information I can get, they are relying entirely upon a broken reed, if they rely upon that statement. At the rate of one hundred pages a day, this man would want but twenty days to dispose of this whole business. He has had now one hundred and thirty days, and the only evidence he has given of life upon this subject is—under the repeated goadings of this committee—the first part of the President's message and accompanying documents. It cannot be true. While I cannot speak from knowledge derived from going into the printing office, and looking at the facts, yet I can speak with great confidence from the results. They did not strike off one hundred pages per day, or twenty days would have disposed of that message.

Mr. DEAN. I rise to a question of order. Is there any proposition before the House for discussion?

The SPEAKER. There is no proposition pending which would authorize debate. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] rose and asked the indulgence of the House, which was extended to him. Ever since, the discussion has progressed alone by the courtesy of the House.

Mr. DEAN. I then object to further debate.

Mr. FLORENCE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit a motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is upon the floor.

Mr. FLORENCE. I understood the Speaker to say that there was nothing before the House, and I rose to submit a motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. DEAN,] to the left of the Chair, rose to a point of order, and is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DEAN. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the homestead bill.

Mr. FLORENCE. I trust that proposition will be voted down.

Mr. HAVEN. The gentleman from New York to my right yields the floor. When interrupted I had commenced to say that I had concluded the statement I was making. I intended to close what I had to state upon the subject, by moving the printing of the report which was read by the chairman of the Committee on Printing, [Mr. GORMAN.]

Mr. JOHN W. HOWE. What are the politics of the persons who have been selected?

Mr. HAVEN. There are now so many shades of politics that I cannot tell.

The SPEAKER. The motion to print is in order.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEAN. Does not the question now recur upon the motion I have submitted?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from New York to have withdrawn his motion at the request of his colleague.

Mr. DEAN. Not at all. My motion was not withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. That then being the condition of the case, the motion of the gentleman's colleague [Mr. HAVEN] to print is not in order.

Mr. DEAN. I yielded to my colleague only for explanation.

The SPEAKER. It is only to be wondered, in consequence of the confusion prevailing in the House, that more misunderstandings do not occur between the Chair and gentlemen upon the floor.

Mr. DEAN. I stated that I would only yield for explanation, my colleague having requested the floor only a moment. I do not withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state as he understands the matter. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEAN] rose in his place, cut off the debate by raising a question of order, and moved that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Chair then understood the gentleman from New York to withdraw that motion at the request of his colleague.

Mr. DEAN. I, however, did not.

The SPEAKER. His colleague, therefore, submitted a motion to print, upon which the Chair recognized the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN.] The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEAN] now states that he did not withdraw his motion to go into committee, and therefore the motion of his colleague [Mr. HAVEN] is not in order, nor is the gentleman from Mississippi entitled to the floor.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rise to what I suppose to be a privileged question; for I must acknowledge that I am not conversant with the rules of the House. It is this: The chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing submitted a report. His colleague upon the committee [Mr. HAVEN] had the consent of the House to review that report, and to make a statement of facts connected with the public printing. Before he resigned the floor the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEAN] rose in his place to a question of order, as to whether there was anything before the House, and whether discussion was in order. The Speaker decided there was nothing before the House, inasmuch as no motion had been submitted. The gentleman took his seat.

Mr. DEAN. I beg to say to the gentleman that he is mistaken. I have not taken my seat since.

Mr. FLORENCE. The gentleman from New York continued his remarks, and concluded by making a motion to print the report of the Committee on Printing. The gentleman from Missisissippi rose in his place, when he had concluded, and was recognized by the Chair—

THE SPEAKER. The decision of the Chair is simply this: He did not hear distinctly what was said by the gentleman from New York in reply to his colleague, who made a request of him to suspend his motion. The Chair was under the impression that the gentleman had withdrawn his motion. He affirms that he has not, and whatever has passed since was not in order. The question now is upon the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

MR. FLORENCE. Do I understand the Chair to decide that the gentleman from New York was out of order during the hour that he has been speaking upon the subject of the public printing?

THE SPEAKER. The Chair has made no such decision. He has not been called upon to decide that point, and, of course, shall make no decision in regard to it.

MR. DEAN. I insist upon my motion being put.

THE SPEAKER. Whatever has passed in the House has been by the courtesy of the Chair and the House. Since the gentleman from New York submits the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union, it being in order under the rules, the Chair is bound to put that proposition to the House.

The question was then taken upon the motion to suspend the rules, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and there were—ayes 78, noes 36; no quorum.

MR. ORR demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. CHANDLER and HAMILTON were appointed.

The question was again put, and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 38.

MR. CLINGMAN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

MR. FLORENCE. Before the yeas and nays are called, I desire to ask for information. If the House resolve to go into the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union on the special order, what will become of the report of the Committee on Printing?

THE SPEAKER. It will go on the Speaker's table.

MR. FLORENCE. And then, sir, how can it be reached?

THE SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether it could be reached by a simple motion in the morning.

MR. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. It can be reached by calling up the business upon the Speaker's table.

MR. FLORENCE. If the House refuses to go into the Committee of the Whole, it is subject to any action the House may choose to take upon it?

THE SPEAKER. That is so.

MR. FLORENCE. A majority of the House can recommit it to the committee, order it to be printed, or make any disposition of it they choose?

THE SPEAKER. Any disposition can be made of it a majority of the House chooses.

MR. STUART. I would ask the gentleman who has made the motion to go into committee to withdraw it until the motion can be made to print the report made by the Printing Committee. Then we can go into committee, and, as I understand it, it will be in order to take it up at any time.

MR. DEAN. I decline withdrawing my motion. [Cries of "Vote it down! Vote it down!"]

The question was again put, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 95, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Thomas H. Bayly, Bowie, Briggs, Chastain, Clark, Curtis, Dawson, Dean, Dunham, Eastman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Gorman, Grey, Hamilton, Hendricks, Hubbard, Hillyer, John W. Howe, Ingalls, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, George W. Jones, George S. King, Lockhart, Mason, McMullin, Menchen, Meade, Morehead, Murray, Nabers, Newton, Olds, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Polk, Price, Riddle, Ross, Russell, Savage, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Stanley, Fred. P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Abram P. Stevens, Stone, Stratton, Stuard, Sutherland, Wells, Williams, and Yates—53.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, John Appleton, William Appleton, Barrere, Bartlett, Bennett, Beacock, Bowne, Bragg, Brenton, Brooks, Albert G. Brown, Buell, Burrows, J. Cable, Lewis D. Campbell, Chandler, Chapman, Clingman, Cobb, Cottman, John G. Davis, Dimmick, Disney, Doty, Edgerton, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Freeman, Gable, Goodnow, Goodrich, Green, Grow, Hall, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Haven, Henn, Horsford, Houston, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, James Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Preston King, Kuhus, Kurtz, Landry, Letcher, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, McDonald, McLanahan, McNair, McQueen, Millson, Miner, Molony, Henry D. Moore, Orr, Outlaw, Andrew Parker, Pennington, Phelps, Porter, Powell, Rantoul, Robbins, Sackett, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Scudder, Scurry, Smart, Smith, Snow, Benjamin Stanton, Thaddeus Stevens, St. Martin, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, Thurston, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, and Woodward—95.

MR. BROWN. I desire to make some remarks to the House upon the subject, but before doing so, I move to print the report from the Committee on Printing.

MR. FLORENCE. May I ask the gentleman to give way for a moment, so that I may offer the following resolution?

Resolved, That the report of the Committee on Printing be referred back to that committee, and that the committee, whenever the public printer fails to do any printing ordered by the House according to his contract, be instructed to advertise, for ten days, for proposals to print each order in the manner prescribed by the printing contract, and to award the printing of each order of the House to the lowest responsible bidder.

MR. POLK. That is, that the public printer be required to tell us when he will print the President's message.

THE SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] yield for this purpose?

MR. BROWN. I yield for that purpose.

MR. KING, of New York. The resolution is in order.

MR. HOUSTON. It cannot repeal a law without being a joint resolution.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression, upon hearing the resolution read, that it is so connected with the public printing, that it will not be his business to decide it out of order.

MR. HOUSTON. I understand it to be decided out of order. Does the Chair receive it?

THE SPEAKER. The Chair stated, from hearing of the resolution, that he could not decide it out of order.

MR. HOUSTON. Then I wish to present a point of order in connection with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE.] The Joint Committee on Printing have acted under an existing law; and, if I understand the amendment, it proposes not only to change the law under which the committee acted by a simple resolution of this House, but it proposes to instruct a joint committee of the two Houses, by a mere resolution of one of the Houses creating that committee, to repeal a law by resolution; it must be a joint resolution, and a joint resolution will also be necessary to instruct a joint committee. In that way the sense of both Houses is obtained, and not otherwise.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair is very clearly of the opinion, that by the action of a single House a law could not be repealed.

MR. HOUSTON. That is the point I make.

THE SPEAKER. That is a point for the House to decide. If the House chooses to consider and debate it, it is not for the Chair to decide that they cannot do so.

MR. FLORENCE. The amendment is merely instructing the committee what to do, and I think the House are competent to do that.

MR. BAYLY. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] maintain that one House can instruct a joint committee?

MR. FLORENCE. I will then offer it as a joint resolution. I so modify it.

MR. BAYLY. Suppose this House refers it back, and the other does not, what action can that committee take upon it? It is a joint committee, and one House cannot instruct it.

MR. FLORENCE. I submit it as a joint resolution, and then that objection is obviated, I apprehend.

MR. KING, of New York. I suppose it is competent for the House to determine what we will do in the matter. The resolution is in order, whether it is in accordance with the joint resolution or not.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair decides that it is not competent for him to determine what the House will do, or ought to do, in reference to the repeal of laws or instructions to their committees.

MR. KING. Is the resolution decided to be in order?

THE SPEAKER. It is germane, and in order.

MR. BROWN. I do not intend to detain the House by anything like an elaborate speech upon the subject of the public printing. In the few remarks which I propose to submit, I shall endeavor to confine myself as nearly as possible to the subjects directly before us; nor should I have asked the indulgence of the House to say a word but for the agency which I have taken heretofore in this matter. When I heard that the Committee on Public Printing had done more than, by the explanation of the honorable chairman I am now induced to think they intended to do, I thought they had exceeded the authority given them by law, and that they had done that which this House ought not to sanction by its silence, much less by its express assent. With the explanation which the honorable chairman has given, I am satisfied the committee have intended to confine themselves to the letter of the law; but I am just as well satisfied that their action will lead to an abuse of the law. The Committee on Public Printing have a right, according to one construction of the statute of 1846, to take so much of the public printing from the present employee as he fails or refuses to execute. Under this authority we now learn from the chairman, that they propose to take from the public printer—what? The work which he has refused or failed to execute, and this alone? No, sir; for in the progress of his remarks the honorable chairman tells you that they have in their possession now a considerable quantity of work, which has never yet been submitted to the public printer. What brought the minds of the committee to the conclusion, that the printer would either fail or refuse to execute the work, when it had never been in his hands? Was it not straining a conclusion to determine that he had failed to execute, and would not execute, work which they had never intrusted to his care, and never asked him to execute? The honorable chairman of the committee says that the public printer has failed to execute some of the work heretofore intrusted to his care. But does the conclusion necessarily follow, that he will continue to fail; or that, having failed in one kind of printing, he would fail in all others?

Was it ever expected that the public printer could execute the printing of this House instantly upon its delivery to him? Has there been any extraordinary delay in the delivery of this work? According to my recollection, the public printing is about as forward, about as near to completion, as it usually is at this season of the year. We have the first part of the President's message, bound and laid upon our tables, one copy for each member; and what matters it whether the extra copies shall be printed this month, the next month, or three months hence? When was the last part of the President's message and accompanying documents printed during the long session of the last Congress? According to my recollection, we were getting along towards the dog-days before it was laid upon our tables. Was the then venerable and highly-respected public printer [Mr. Ritchie] hauled over the coals for a failure to perform his duty? Was Mr. Ritchie—against whom I have no word of complaint to utter here—held up to the country as a defaulter in the discharge of his duties? Ah! some gentleman answers, in a low tone, Yes. It is well the tone is low. No gentleman ought to answer yes, in a loud voice. The House knows what was the action taken upon that subject two years ago. At the close of the session of 1850, there was found to be, in one House of Congress, a large majority not only indisposed to call Mr. Ritchie to an account for any failure to comply with his contract, but actually disposed and determined to give him some sixty or seventy thousand dollars of the public money as extra compensation. Mr. Ritchie was paid every dollar that he claimed under his contract, and his friends were anxious to give him a great deal more. I never understood that he did the work any better, or any more rapidly than the contract called for; and yet there was a large party in this House ready to vote him sixty thousand dollars, or more, over and above what the contract called for; and it was only, according to my recollection, by parliamentary manoeuvring that the thing was prevented. You had two or three committees of conference upon the subject, and the subject was pressed upon our attention as no other subject was ever pressed upon us. And let me remind certain gentleman, who are enforcing a very rigid observance of the law against Mr. Hamilton, that the journals show them to have been more than liberal towards Mr. Ritchie. Now, sir, I desire to know why it is, in this land of laws, in this land of equality, and before this Democratic House of Representatives, this kind of distinction is made between one employee and another? I know nothing of Mr. Boyd Hamilton; I have never seen him. If I were to meet him to-day I should not know him from any other man in Christendom. I care not one single solitary farthing about him, but I do care for justice. I will not willingly make myself a party to a transaction so unjust as this. I will not say to one man, who wields a powerful party press, We will pay you the full amount of the bond, wink at your short-comings, and pay you sixty thousand dollars extra; and then to another, who has no press, no power, no influence, We will crush you, because you have not lived up to the very letter of the law.

Mr. GORMAN. I want the gentleman distinctly to avow whether he charges that as a motive operating upon the committee?

Mr. BROWN. Not at all.

Mr. GORMAN. Your words do.

Mr. BROWN. I disavow any personal application; but this I will say: If the House of Representatives shall perpetrate such an act of gross injustice, it will merit, and will assuredly receive, the reprobation of every just man in the nation. We hear continually that the contract system has proved a failure. I do not think so. The contract system has had no fair trial. There has been, what seemed to me, a determination from the beginning to bring this system into disrepute—never to give it fair play. Powerful parties, holding the most influential positions, have engaged in this work. The system has operated against their interest, and they have labored to break it down. Its triumph is not complete, but it has not failed. Let us see how the system has worked so far. Your first contractors were Wendell & Van Benthusen. Did they execute their contract? I understand they did. I am forced to that conclusion because there has been no suit entered upon their bond for a failure to execute their contract. Thus far the system worked well—at least it did not fail. You received the work and paid for it; and if it was not well done, it was because you did not require it to be well done. During the last Congress, the then venerable editor of the Union (Mr. Ritchie) had the contract. Did he execute it? I understand he did. It is my understanding that he executed it to the satisfaction of the Committee on Printing and the satisfaction of Congress. I so understand, because no suit has been instituted upon his bond for a failure to execute the contract. You again received the work and paid for it, and we shall presently see that certain gentlemen proposed to do a great deal more. Surely there could have been no failure, when you not only received the work and paid for it, but wanted to give large extra compensation. Then Mr. A. Boyd Hamilton has the contract for this session. The only specification, according to my present recollection, which the honorable chairman makes against him is, that a portion of the paper is some twelve pounds in the ream lighter than the contract requires. This I find Mr. Hamilton accounts for in the printed paper lying upon our tables. He says, that for a brief season during the past winter, on account of the closing of navigation, he was unable to get a better article of paper. The cold weather having suspended steamboat and railroad operations, he could not procure transportation.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I wish to make a statement, and it is this: I understand from the chairman of the Senate committee, or rather the late chairman of the Senate committee, that he has rejected nearly all the work sent to the Senate by the printer, and rejected it not solely for the reason that the paper was of an inferior article, but because the whole committee concurred in the idea that a great fraud had been practiced upon the Government if this paper should be received as the quality of paper which he has now furnished, it being one fifth less in value, than what he was required to furnish.

But there is another defect in the paper, to which the chairman of the House committee, and of the Senate committee, I understand, objected; and it is this: that the sheets of paper upon which the printing is done, are too small; that they have too little margin; that when the pages are folded together, and the edges clipped or cut, it leaves too little margin, and that in the books in which plates are to be placed, the plates are frequently disfigured and destroyed in consequence of the smallness of the sheets.

Nor is this all. The printing which has been sent to us, is so imperfect in consequence of defects in the manner in which the press-work is done, and defects in the quality of the ink that is used, that there are not half a dozen sheets in any one book that we have examined, that are perfect. They are full from the top line to the bottom of the page, with what printers call technically, "monks," and "friars," that is, here a white place, and here a black blotch. So that the work in every view in which it can be regarded, is inferior to what was agreed for under the contract.

Mr. FLORENCE. Did the gentleman submit any of this work to the House? I understood the chairman of the Committee on Printing [Mr. GORMAN] to say that there had been no documents except the President's message and accompanying documents, given to the public printer. His complaint was, that there had been no work done; but now the gentleman from Kentucky, a member of the Committee on Printing, rises in his place and says that these have been condemned. Where are they?

Mr. POLK. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if there are not thirty or forty Executive documents that have been furnished to the printer during the last three months, and that have not been printed yet?

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not know anything at all about that, for I am not a member of the Committee on Printing. I attend to the business of the committee to which I belong, and cannot answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. POLK. Then I say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he ought not to talk about things he knows nothing about.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rose for the purpose of being informed; and if the gentleman had had his ears open, he would have heard my question, and would not have made the remark he did.

Mr. POLK. I am sorry I did not hear the gentleman; but it is my misfortune, if my ears are not as long as his. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania misunderstood me, if he understood me as saying that no document but the President's message had gone into the hands of the printer. A great many documents have gone into his hands, but we have never seen anything of them since; when they get there, it is the last of them. A part of the President's message has, however, come to us, and it is to that that the gentleman from Kentucky alludes. If you look over the pages, you will find the "monks" and "friars," or, as I should call them, blotches of white and then blotches of black. They are really so insufferably bad that we could not receive them. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania is satisfied. I will produce a copy, and hand it to him.

Mr. BROWN, (resuming.) I was proceeding to inquire, when I was interrupted, whether it was true that the contract system had been fairly tried, and had proved a failure? I had shown that there was no evidence of its failure up to the commencement of this session of Congress, and I had stated that I believed there had been combinations to break it down. If it has failed, or shall hereafter fail, in the hands of Mr. Hamilton, is that conclusive that the system is wrong, and ought to be abandoned? That it must fail in his hands, under the policy that the committee propose to pursue towards him, is to my mind the most evident proposition on earth. If the committee suspends a job when it is half completed, takes other jobs from him entirely, and makes large deductions from time to time on the work which he has executed, who does not see that the man's credit must be broken down? If he was worth a quarter of a million of dollars, he could not execute the contract under such a policy as this.

But I do not mean to dwell upon this branch of the subject. I have said that, in my judgment, the system has not proved a failure. If it has failed at all at any time, or in any man's hands, it is because you have not given it a fair trial.

Mr. FREEMAN, (interrupting.) I did not understand the chairman of the committee to say that the contract had been abrogated, but only that they should employ others to carry out such parts of the contract as the contractor has failed to carry out. I do not understand that this is an attack upon the contract system, but only upon the manner in which this party has acted under his contract. Is not that the fact?

Mr. GORMAN. It is.

Mr. BROWN. If the committee take the printing from this man and hand it over to others, or if they refuse to deliver it over to him, what is it but an abandonment of the contract? Is not that a breaking up of the contract? Does not every man see that the result of this action on the part of the committee must be that the whole of the House printing will go to Donelson & Armstrong, and the whole of the Senate printing to Gideon & Co.? Mr. Boyd Hamilton will be left at the end of three weeks from to-day with not a penny's worth of work on hand. It is useless to say what the committee mean to do, or what is meant by this proceeding. The question is, what does their action inevitably lead to? If the work is taken from Hamilton by the committee, and their action is sanctioned by the House, there is an end of his contract; and with it we all see that the whole contract system will end. It cannot be otherwise.

The committee has notified us that they have ceased to send the work to Hamilton, and have made arrangements with other parties to do it. Is it not ridiculous, then, to say that they have not abrogated the contract? They have, to all intents and purposes, abrogated one contract and made another. It is stultifying ourselves to pretend that it is otherwise.

My reason for introducing a resolution in reference to this subject was this—and I had no other purpose to subserve—I wanted to arrest what I thought a dangerous proceeding. I knew the committee were acting without having made a report to the House. I did not pause to inquire whether they had authority to do all that they proposed. I looked only to the effect which their action was certain to produce. Mr. Hamilton says he has made an outlay of $50,000 in preparing himself to execute the printing of Congress. It is proposed summarily to take the contract from him—and by whom and in what manner, pray? Not by Congress—not by a committee of Congress, but by three members of the House and one member of the Senate; for, bear you in mind, this is not the act of a full committee. And this fragment of a committee are doing this without consulting Congress, and without reporting its proceedings. Now, let Congress sanction this act of the committee, and think you, sir, that this man will not come here at the next Congress and ask indemnity for his losses on this outlay? No man will question that. And what do you suppose he will prove? If he is half as smart in making proof as others have been, he will prove that he was executing the work as well as it had ever been done; that he was delivering it as fast as it had ever been delivered; that his contract was rudely and summarily snatched from him, his business broken up, his credit destroyed, and himself ruined. And instead of your getting the penalty of the bonds, he will present a claim for some $100,000 or more against you. Then, if a committee is appointed, as there will be, to investigate the subject, what evidence will there be on the record to show that you were justified in this proceeding? Take the contract from Mr. Hamilton, under these circumstances, if you will; but I ask you to leave upon the record the evidence which shall justify your action to those who are to come after you, and who will be charged with an investigation of Hamilton's claims. Do not go out of this contract and leave no trace behind to mark your exit. Before you sanction the acts of this committee, demand a report, a full report, one that will justify you before another Congress in dismissing Hamilton from his contract—for rest assured he will present his claim from year to year, and send it down to his children after him, from generation to generation. It will be presented time and again, until, finally, Congress will be brought to pass it. It is this result against which I now raise my warning voice.

If there is anything to justify this step on the part of Congress, let the committee report it. Let the House take the responsibility. Let us know where we stand. Let those who are to come after us have something with which to meet Mr. Hamilton, when he comes here by himself, or through his attorney or successors, to make a demand for damages on account of the breaking up of his contract.

We are told day after day in the newspapers and elsewhere, that the contract system has failed, and that Congress ought to abandon it. I am no friend of the system. I am not its friend, or its apologist. But it has not failed. Its success has been wonderful, considering the amount of opposition it has encountered. Does it not strike us all as being rather remarkable, that a member can take up one of these printed documents on his desk, direct it to some one in some remote corner of California or Oregon, put his frank upon it, call a page and send it to the post office of the House, and that it should then be taken up and carried from one point to another, and that too by contract, until finally it reaches its far off destination, and yet that this document thus borne from one part of the continent to another by contract, cannot be printed here, under the eye of Congress, by contract? Your Army and Navy can be supplied by contract; your troops on the distant frontier of Texas, California, and Oregon, can be furnished with supplies by contract; and yet you cannot print a book by contract. If these manuscripts belonged to a private individual, could he not get them printed by contract?—and would he not do it? Why is it, then, that we cannot do the same thing? I do not profess to know, but I will tell you what I think may be the cause. I do not say why it is we have failed, but I will tell you what I think has interfered with our success. There are party editors in the city of Washington—Whigs as well as Democrats—and there may be such a thing as this going on:

"If you'll tickle me, I'll tickle you."

If a member will vote large supplies to a party editor, and thus tickle him—and it applies not more to one party than the other—why, then, the editor speaks well of the member to his constituents, and thus tickles him in return; but before an excuse can be given for voting these supplies the contract system must be broken up. Besides, it may be possible that party men, after all, care more for the success of party editors than for the success of a system like this. And they may strive to bring the system into discredit and to destroy it in public favor, in order that party editors may come up and be elected public printers, or have contracts given to them, out of which they may realize large sums of money. I say these things may be. I do not say they are so. But these are reflections which force themselves on my mind. And when I can find no good reason why the contract system is failing, or is likely to fail—no reason why it is cried down—my mind dwells here; and I inquire of myself, whether it is not possible, that at the bottom of all the difficulty in executing this contract system, there does not lie some hidden and secret causes like these? If these be the causes of failure, let them be removed. Let us fling defiance in the teeth of those who would use the National Treasury to purchase favor. Let members stand on their merits, and editors, like other men, work for what they get, and the contract system will triumph.

I do not say the contract system is the best; I only say it has not had a fair trial, and we have no reason to conclude that it has failed. If I had my own way, or if my suggestions are worth anything to the House, I would say, that above all other modes, I should prefer to have the public printer elected, and that it should be required of him, by law, that he should have no connection with any party press, Whig or Democratic, during his service; but that he should be what his vocation indicated him to be—the public printer, and nothing else. If I had my own way, I should prefer to have the work executed by a public printer who should be well paid. But of all the schemes that I have ever seen or heard of, this last one of the Committee on Printing, is to me the most objectionable—objectionable in many points of view. I do not like these combinations between Whigs and Democrats. I do not say there has been a combination or coalition for bad purposes, because I will not charge my honorable friend from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] with entering into combinations; but it will strike the mind of this country as a coalition; and however well intended, its effects upon the Democratic party must be most disastrous. Talk about the Massachusetts coalition! Why, sir, the honorable chairman of the committee ought to have retained the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RANTOUL], to defend this business. He is a capital defender of coalitions, as he has given us good reason to know. [Laughter.]

This whole thing looks to me, and I fear it will strike the country, as very much like a combination or coalition between the Whigs and Democrats, or rather between the organs of the two parties, to control the Government printing, keep the game in their own hands, and pocket the profits. I do not say that it is so, but it occurs to me that it looks that way, and that the country will so regard it.

Mr. GORMAN. I want to put a friendly question to the gentleman from Mississippi. I ask that gentleman whether the present coalition suits him?

Mr. BROWN. It does not.

Mr. GORMAN. I understand it does not. Would the Southern Press suit him?

Mr. BROWN. It would not.

Mr. GORMAN. I am inclined to come to the same conclusion in relation to my friend from Mississippi that he does in relation to myself. He suspects me of forming a coalition with the organs of the Whig and Democratic parties. I suspect him of doing precisely the same thing with the Southern Press. He suspects me, therefore, of exactly what I suspect him; so, if he kills my dog, I will kill his cat in the same way. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. Let me say to my friend from Indiana, that he was never more mistaken. I have at no time sought, directly nor indirectly, to give any part of the public printing to the Southern Press. And what is more, if it were left to me to direct the whole subject, I would not give one dollar of it to any party editor.

Mr. VENABLE. Wouldn't you give it to the National Era? [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. About as soon as to some others.

Mr. POLK. I ask the gentleman if he would not vote to give it to the Southern Press?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir. I have already stated, and I believe it to be true, that it is wrong in principle to give the public patronage to party editors at all. It destroys that independence and boldness which should belong alike to editors and Representatives; it begets a sort of paralyzing sympathy between the recipient of a favor and the giver of it, which stands palpably in the way of a fair, upright, equitable, and honest administration of political justice.

Mr. RANTOUL. The suggestion which the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN], has thrown out, that I might be employed to defend this coalition, places me in a rather unpleasant situation; and, therefore, I beg leave to say, in advance, that I shall decline entirely to undertake any such task upon any conditions whatever. A coalition which is founded in principle, I can defend; but one which looks entirely to the division of the spoils, seems to me to be entirely indefensible. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. Well, I have only said that if a coalition should be completed, better counsel could not be found to defend it.

Mr. GORMAN. I congratulate the gentleman upon his new coalition.

Mr. BROWN. If my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Printing, will look over the vote of yesterday upon this subject, he will find some reason to congratulate himself upon another coalition. My recollection is, that he was found in very strange company on that occasion. If he will but turn to his friend over the way from New York, [Mr. HAVEN], he will find in him a coadjutor with whom he struck hands in making this bargain.

Mr. GORMAN. I was congratulating the gentleman upon his coalition with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RANTOUL].

Mr. BROWN. Upon the great issues which unite us as Democrats, we work together. And on these issues, I believe there is not a more trustworthy member of the party on this floor than the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RANTOUL]. Those are the issues upon which the gentleman from Massachusetts and myself unite. Upon other issues, there is no bond of sympathy between us. The bond which unites us is political only; and the points of affinity are those which unite the gentleman from Indiana and myself, and indeed all Democrats. But my friend from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN], and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN], seem to me to be united, and to have formed a coalition to obtain the spoils. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, although I listened with the most profound attention, as I always do, to the remarks of my friend from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN], I am at a loss to know why it became necessary to employ two party organs to aid in the public printing? I cannot understand why somebody else could not have done it just as well. There were other printing establishments here. There was the Towers's establishment. There was Mr. Rives's establishment; and there were others. But I understood the committee voted down all these establishments; they even voted down Donelson & Armstrong, as my friend [Mr. GORMAN] says. And in order to secure to them a part of the work the right hand of fellowship was extended by him to his Whig co-laborers, they agreeing to divide it between the two great party organs, the Union and the Republic. I ask my friend [Mr. GORMAN] if he did not vote against Rives, and against Towers, and against others.

Mr. GORMAN. I did!

Mr. BROWN. Exactly; and other members of the committee voted against Donelson & Armstrong, and in this way no conclusion was arrived at, until at last the two Whigs on the Committee obtained their own terms, and got half the job for the Republic. It seems to me that if my friend from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN], and my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON], who was a member of that committee, had gone with the other members of the committee for Mr. Rives, there would have been no difficulty.

Mr. ORR. Will my friend from Mississippi yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. BROWN. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. ORR. I move, then, that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was put and agreed to; and

The House adjourned till twelve o'clock tomorrow.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Also, the petition of John B. King, of McDonald county, Missouri, praying additional compensation for services in taking the census of McDonald county in 1850.

By Mr. GOODENOW: The memorial of Pamela A. S. Dearborn, widow of the late Lieutenant Colonel Greenleaf Dearborn, of the seventh regiment United States Infantry, praying for relief.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 14, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

SALINE LANDS IN WISCONSIN.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FORNEY, its Clerk, announcing that its Speaker had signed an enrolled bill to extend the time for selecting lands granted to the State of Wisconsin for saline purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also signed it.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. GWIN presented a petition of importing merchants of San Francisco, praying the remission of duties on merchandise stored in the Government warehouses in that city, and injured or destroyed by a land-slide; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of assistant marshals for taking the Seventh Census in Ohio, praying additional compensation; which was ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. SEWARD. I am requested by Ebenezer G. Atwater, to present his petition to the Senate, in which he states that, in the month of May, 1851, when the President of the United States, with several members of his Cabinet, were traveling through the State of New York, he was engaged to fire a salute, and that, in performing that act of duty, as a courtesy on the part of the citizens, he lost both his arms and one eye; and he has come here, and now presents a petition to the Senate, asking them to afford him some relief in his destitute and deplorable condition. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions. It was so referred.

Mr. DAVIS presented a petition of Benjamin F. Hallett, Rufus Choate, John C. Park, and about one hundred other citizens, members of the bar in Boston, praying that the salary of the United States district judge for that district may be increased; which was ordered to be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. CLARKE presented the petition of John Potter Secord, and seventy other inhabitants of Coventry, Rhode Island, praying the establishment of a mail route from Washington Village to Rice City; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WALKER presented a petition of citizens of De Witt county, Illinois, praying that one hundred and sixty acres of land may be granted to citizens of the United States upon becoming actual settlers; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a remonstrance from citizens of Plymouth county, Massachusetts, against the restoration of flogging in the Navy. The person through whose agency this petition was signed, states, in a letter, that he is convinced, after thirty years' service in the Navy, that flogging is not necessary to preserve discipline, and that this would be particularly the case if the grog rations were abolished. I move the reference of the remonstrance to the Committee on Naval Affairs. It was so referred.

Mr. GEYER presented a petition of the legal representatives of Jacques Clamorgan, praying the confirmation of a grant of land made to said Clamorgan by the Spanish authorities in 1797; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented additional evidence in the case of William Money; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SMITH presented a petition of citizens of Norwalk, Connecticut, praying an extension of Woodworth's patent for a planing machine; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

TONNAGE ON GOODS ENTERING CUBA, OR PORTO RICO.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to report to the Senate, such information as he may be able to furnish: First, in regard to the character and amount of discriminating duties exacted on the tonnage of the United States entering the ports of Cuba or Porto Rico, in the dominions of Spain, at the time and also subsequent to the passage of the act of Congress approved July 13th, 1832; and second, the character and amount of similar discriminating duties exacted at the time of the passage, and subsequent thereto, of the act of Congress approved June 30th, 1834.

PUBLIC LANDS IN OHIO.

Mr. CHASE. I wish to ask a favor of the Senate this morning. I have never before made such a request, and I hope they will indulge me at this time. A bill granting the unsold residue of the public lands in Ohio, which, at the present time, are reduced to only two hundred thousand acres, by the process of sales, which has been going on more than sixty years, stands second upon the Calendar. I am obliged to leave Washington for a few days; and unless the bill is taken up now, it cannot receive the action of the House. But, desirous as I am to take it up, I pledge myself that, if it takes over half an hour, I will consent to lay it upon the table, and submit to the inconvenience. I therefore move to postpone the previous orders, with the view of taking up that bill.

Mr. UPHAM. I hope we shall go through with the morning business. Reports from committees have not yet been called for.

Several SENATORS. Let us take up the bill.

Mr. MANGUM. I hope we will not take it up. I have a resolution which I wish to introduce.

Mr. DAVIS. And I have another.

The PRESIDENT. Neither reports nor resolutions have been called for. The motion is to postpone all other business, to take up the bill named by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MANGUM. I hope we will proceed with the regular order of business.

Mr. CHASE. I am sure the honorable Senator from North Carolina could not have heard the appeal which I made.

Mr. MANGUM. I did not.

Mr. CHASE. I am obliged, in consequence of peculiar circumstances, to leave Washington for a few days, and unless this bill is acted upon now, it cannot receive the action of the House. It stands the second on the Calendar, and was introduced at the very commencement of the session. If, however, the consideration of it will consume more than half an hour, I pledge myself to let it lie on the table, as I am unwilling to interfere with other bills.

The motion to postpone was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of the bill to grant to the State of Ohio the unsold and unappropriated public lands remaining in that State, which was reported from the Committee on Public Lands, with various amendments. It enacts that all the lands remaining unsold and unappropriated in the State of Ohio, after March 31, 1852, shall be granted to the State, provided that the grant shall not affect any pre-emption or other individual right, or include any land within the Virginia military district; and provided, also, that fifty-five cents per acre shall be paid to the United States, for the use of certain Indians, for reserved lands, which, by treaty stipulations, are required to be paid in part to them. It enacts, also, that on the passage of the act, the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall close the current land business in the State, and on or before July 31, 1852, transfer to the Governor of the State, or such person as he shall designate, all the archives relating to lands within the State, now in the district land offices there.

Mr. CHASE. I hope the amendments of the committee will be agreed to.

Mr. DAWSON. I wish to ask a question for information. The reservations of Indian lands are put down at fifty-five cents per acre. Has the General Government the right of fixing the price of lands reserved for Indians under treaty? For if it is not in their power to dispose of the lands at that price, you will have an application to pay out of the Treasury the amount they could have obtained for these very lands.

Mr. CHASE. The answer to that question is very short. The matter was very carefully considered by the Committee on Public Lands. The Government is bound to account to the Indians for the proceeds of these lands at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, less seventy cents allowed charges. If, then, the State of Ohio pays to the United States the sum of fifty-five cents per acre, the Treasury will receive the whole amount which the Government is bound to pay to the Indians.

Mr. DAWSON. Then these lands, which may be worth one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, reserved to the Indians, which could have been disposed of if thrown into the market, we are to give conditionally to the State of Ohio, upon the payment of fifty-five cents per acre by that State for the lands, thereby taking from the lands which are reserved to the Indians, and giving seventy cents to the acre of their value to the State of Ohio.

Mr. CHASE. The Senator does not understand the point. The lands are not reserved to the Indians; they belong to the United States. The United States is bound to account to the Indians at the rate of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, reserving seventy cents per acre for charges incident to sales of the lands. There will remain, then, fifty-five cents per acre, in the event they be sold, which would go to the Indians. But, instead of waiting for a long period until they are sold, the State of Ohio is at once to pay into the Treasury fifty-five cents per acre, so that the Indians can get it without further delay. The lands have been offered for sale, and are subject to private entry.

Mr. DAWSON. My position is this: If the lands, which were reserved to the Indians, had been in the market up to this time—I presume they were good lands—they could have gone at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre; and if they were now in a condition to be taken up by any person, I presume one dollar and twenty-five cents would be paid for them.

Mr. CHASE. They have been offered for sale, within ten or twenty years past. They are not good lands, and therefore they are not taken up. They are refuse lands.

Mr. DAWSON. The Government will not lose a dollar, I suppose?

Mr. CHASE. Not a cent.

Mr. DAWSON. And has your State the payment of the costs incurred in the disposition of the lands?

Mr. CHASE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWSON. And you say the fifty-five cents per acre belong to the Indians?

Mr. CHASE. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWSON. And that you propose to pay them? Perhaps it will not be $1 25. The committee may have looked into the matter more carefully than I have.

Mr. HUNTER. I understand this bill proposes to give the lands in the State of Ohio, which have not been sold, to that State. I should like to know how much land it is proposed to give?

Mr. CHASE. If the Senator will allow the amendments to be acted upon, I will answer his question very briefly.

Mr. HUNTER. Very well.

The amendments were agreed to.

*Mr. CHASE. The bill, now under consideration, Mr. President, is one of considerable importance to the people of Ohio. It grants to the State the unsold residue of the public lands within her limits, except that portion lying within the Virginia Military District, which cannot be ceded without the consent of Virginia. The quantity of land granted is not large; but it is large enough to make the grant desirable to the State. Nor is the land of much value; but it is of much greater value to the State than to the General Government. The principal object of the measure is to terminate Federal ownership within the limits of the State; and I think the time has arrived when all will agree, that so far as Ohio is concerned, the proprietorship of the General Government should come to an end.

I ask the attention of Senators to a brief statement of facts which will exhibit clearly the merits of the bill.

The quantity of land, unsold in Ohio, on the 30th of September last, was only 216,070 acres. The quantity sold by the General Government in Ohio, up to that time, had been 12,616,909 acres. Besides these large sales there had been granted to the States of Connecticut and Virginia, as inducements to the cessions made by them to the United States, 7,376,769 acres; and to companies and individuals, mostly in large tracts and for resale, 1,485,564 acres; and to satisfy claims for military purposes, 1,564,997 acres. The aggregate quantity of lands for which the people of Ohio have had or have yet to pay the Government or its grantees, is, therefore, 23,046,484 acres. There have been reserved for Indians and salines, 40,547. There remain, as I have stated, only 216,070 acres unsold. It follows, therefore, that the whole amount contributed by the United States, as the proprietor of this immense domain, to its improvement and preparation for sale, is only 2,273,859 acres. This includes all the grants for schools, colleges, religious purposes, and internal improvements.

The amount of money paid by the people of Ohio—the individual citizens of Ohio—into the Treasury of the United States for the privilege of occupying and tilling the soil, is $20,853,694. The sums paid to the grantees of the Government for lands granted to States, companies, and individuals not included in the ordinary sales, estimating these lands at the minimum only, amount to $13,036,968. The vast aggregate swells to $33,890,664. Make every deduction from this sum which any fair consideration can suggest; exclude the value of the grants to individuals—such as the grants to John Cleves Symmes and the Ohio company, and the grants for military services—and still the amount paid by the people of Ohio to this Government and its grantees, for the soil on which they live, and from which they draw, by honest toil, the means of life, will greatly exceed $30,000,000.

The history of the world does not afford another instance of the original ownership of wild lands being acquired by the inhabitants of any State or country at such a price.

I will now state somewhat more particularly the grants made to Ohio for education, internal improvements, and other purposes, and compare their amount with similar grants made to other States.

The grants made to Ohio, are these:

For schools, colleges, &c. . . . 727,528 acres.
For internal improvements. . . 1,243,001 "
For swamp lands. . . . . 303,329 "

In all. . . . . 2,273,858 "

The Senate will observe that I have included every grant of every kind made to the State. The sections sixteen, for the use of schools—all the canal lands—all the swamp lands—are included; and the total is nearly 500,000 acres less than the single grant to the State of Illinois in aid of her Central Railroad, at the first session of the last Congress.

But I invite attention to the grants made to other States, a little more in detail.

There have been granted to the State of Indiana:

For schools, colleges, &c. . . . 673,357 acres.
For internal improvements. . . 1,609,861 "
For public buildings. . . . . 2,560 "
For swamp lands. . . . . 981,682 "

Making an aggregate of. . . 3,267,460 "

The grants to Indiana exceed the grants to Ohio by nearly 1,000,000 of acres.

There have been granted to Illinois—

For schools, colleges, &c. . . . 1,001,795 acres.
For internal improvements. . . 500,000 "
For public buildings. . . . . 2,560 "
For swamp lands. . . . . 1,833,412 "
For Central Railroad. . . . . 2,700,000 "

Making an aggregate of. . . 6,036,767 "

The quantity granted to the Central Railroad is not precisely ascertained. It is set down in the official tables at 2,246,400 acres; but these figures are certainly much below the real quantity. In the debate on the Iowa land bill, Senators who sustained the Illinois grant, stated the quantity to be from 2,500,000 to 2,700,000; and I have reason to believe the largest quantity is not outside the truth. It appears, then, that the grants to Illinois exceed the grants to Ohio by more than 3,700,000 acres.

There have been granted to Missouri—

For schools, colleges, &c. . . . 1,222,179 acres.
For internal improvements. . . 500,000 "
For public buildings. . . . . 2,560 "
For swamp lands. . . . . 1,517,287 "

Making an aggregate of. . . 3,244,206 "

The grants to Missouri fall short of the grants to Illinois by 2,750,000 acres; but exceed the grants to Ohio by nearly 1,000,000 of acres.

There have been granted to Iowa—

For schools, colleges, &c. . . . 951,224 acres.
For internal improvements. . . 825,078 "
For public buildings. . . . . 3,480 "
For swamp lands. . . . . 33,813 "
Add Des Moines lands claimed, say. . . . . 900,000 "

Making an aggregate of. . . 2,713,595 "

The grants to Iowa, the youngest of the land States, exceed the grants to Ohio, the oldest, except Tennessee, nearly 500,000 acres, while they fall short of the grants to Illinois by 2,250,000 acres.

I will not extend this comparison. I will merely add, that Alabama alone, of all the land States, has not received grants largely exceeding the quantity granted to Ohio; that Alabama has received nearly as much, and that there remains in that State 15,426,566 acres undisposed of, of which I, for one, am ready to grant her enough, at any time, to make her equal, in this respect, to the most favored State. I will hand to the reporter a statement prepared early in this session at the General Land Office, at my instance, of the condition of the public lands up to the 30th of September last, by which any one, so disposed, can test the accuracy of the statements I make.*

I make no complaint of our sister States. I do not regret that they have received much because Ohio has received comparatively little. I rejoice rather in the liberality which has been exhibited towards them, and congratulate them on their prosperity, promoted and stimulated by the wise and just beneficence of the National Government. May it increase more and more, and continue forever.

In truth, Mr. President, this prosperity, though promoted and stimulated, as I have just said, by the beneficence of the Government, is due, in a far greater measure, to individual energy and individual intelligence, assured of protection in their freest and fullest development by the strength of our American Union and the spirit of our American institutions, and operating either directly or through voluntary associations and the State Governments. Of this great benefit, Ohio has partaken no less than her sister States. Unannoyed by external aggression, except for a short period during the second war with England, undisturbed by internal commotion, she has strenuously urged her upward way, without pause, for sixty-five years. For fifteen years, while a part of the Northwestern Territory, she shared the fostering care of the National Government. Admitted into the Union as a sovereign State in 1802, she cheerfully submitted to the condition imposed upon her, that the national domain within her limits should be reserved to the United States, as property exempt from taxation, to be sold and applied in discharge of the national indebtedness. And it was not till the debt of the Revolution had been fully paid, and the debt of the war of 1812 had been reduced to an inconsiderable amount, that Ohio ever applied for any grant of lands in aid of any of her works of internal improvement. Unassisted, her people bought their farms, felled the forest, built their log cabins, reared their school-houses, constructed their churches. Unassisted, they joined the lake to the river by the Ohio canal, and thus completed the first internal waterway from the Atlantic ocean to the Gulf of Mexico.

Almost unassisted, this people, energetic and intelligent, extended their system of canals, making, among others, a second canal from the river to the lake; covered the surface of the State with a network of turnpikes and railways; improved their watercourses; constructed their public edifices, among which they point as their chief glory to the various asylums for those children of sorrow, the deaf, the dumb, the blind, and the insane.

I say almost unassisted. Ohio alone, of all the land States, except Tennessee, received no aid in the construction of her public buildings. Ohio, less than any other State, except Alabama, and less than Alabama if regard be had to the proportion of population or of unsold lands, has participated in the grants for internal improvements. While she has received less, she has, as I have already stated, paid more to the Government and the grantees of the Government than any other State. She has, besides, borne her full proportion of the indirect taxation of the tariff, and contributes, at this moment, nearly one tenth of the national revenue.

I submit to the Senate that an irresistible case has been made out for the grant of the residue of public lands in Ohio to the State. If anything were wanting, I might urge, in addition, the precedent of the grant to Tennessee in 1846. In that year, Congress terminated Federal ownership in that State, by the act "to surrender to the State of Tennessee all title the United States have to lands in Tennessee, south and west of the line commonly called the Congressional Reservation Line." Indeed the act went further than this. It released to the State the proceeds of lands already sold.

But the case of Ohio is even yet stronger. Had she received as much more than her sister States as she has received less; were there no direct precedent as the case of Tennessee to be pleaded; there would still remain adequate, nay, controlling reasons for the grant.

Sixty-five years have elapsed since the commencement of the sales of public lands within the limits of Ohio—more than the period of two generations of men. The unsold residue has probably been in market for the average period of a quarter of a century. It does not, indeed, deserve the name of residue. It is a mere residuum. It very little exceeds in quantity two hundred thousand acres. It is less than one hundredth part the original domain. The cost to the General Government, of the land office in the State, during the last year, exceeded $5,000; and now that land warrants have been made assignable and receivable for all lands, and must, therefore, hereafter constitute the chief, if not the sole currency in which payments will be made for the public domain, it is not probable that the receipts at these offices will defray their cost. The unsold residue, therefore, however valuable it may be to the State, is not worth keeping to the Government.

Besides, no statesman who has ever discussed the subject of the public domain has ever suggested that the United States shall hold on to the lands with unrelaxing gripe, until the sale of the last acre and the payment of the last dollar and a quarter. On the contrary, all have concurred in the opinion, that at the proper time the land States should be relieved from the disparagement of their proper sovereignty by national ownership of untaxed and untaxable lands within their limits, by cessions of the unsold residue. It was the opinion of a distinguished Senator from Missouri, not now a member of this body, [Mr. Benton] that these cessions should in all cases be made upon the reduction of the quantity in any State to 500,000 acres. I concur in this opinion. Indeed I should be better pleased with an earlier termination of Federal ownership. But, whatever may be thought as to the proper time, no one will question the propriety of such a cession at some time, and no one will doubt, I think, that in the case of Ohio, at least, that time has come.

I forbear to enlarge upon these considerations. I know the desire of the Senate to proceed to other business, and I cheerfully submit this case of Ohio, believing it to be impregnable, to the liberality, to the wisdom, and, above all, to the justice of my fellow Senators.

Mr. HUNTER. It is not so much the amount proposed to be given by ceding these lands to the State of Ohio to which I object, as that it seems to me that the bill proposes to establish a new principle; in other words, to give to the State of Ohio two hundred and sixteen thousand acres of land. It is true, sir, that this land has been exposed for sale for twenty or thirty years at $1 25 per acre; but it never has been offered for a less price. Now, I should be willing to graduate these lands according to the term of years during which they have been in market. I believe that I would even go further. I would allow the State to come in as pre-emptor, for I believe that it would be a very desirable thing to terminate the ownership of this land by the Government of the United States; but I am afraid of beginning this principle, which appears to be involved in this bill.

The Senator from Ohio admonishes me that he is anxious to obtain a vote on the bill, and I will therefore do no more than merely state that I have objections—that I cannot vote for the bill as it is, but that I would be willing to dispose of these lands in the manner I have indicated.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and the several amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to say a single word, without meaning to delay the action of the Senate on this bill. These lands have been so long in market that it is obvious they are mere refuse lands, as has been stated by the Senator from Ohio—the refuse of all the lands that have heretofore been sold in that State. I recollect very well, when I was at the head of the Land Office, it appeared to me that it would be very expensive to the Government to keep up the necessary machinery merely for the sale of lands of this kind; and it was felt by all that there was a time when a State should have control of all the lands within its limits. I will merely state further, that these lands are of no use to the General Government, of no profit, of no advantage; but, on the contrary, that the Government will have to keep up this machinery at great expense, without any prospect of these lands being sold even so as to pay expenses. I trust, therefore, that there will be no opposition to this bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I would like to know of the Senator from Ohio, if he has it in his power to answer the question, what the sales of these lands have been during the last year and the preceding year, within the State of Ohio?

Mr. CHASE. I cannot state precisely what the amount is. I know that the expenses of the two land offices within the State of Ohio were $5,000 for the past year; the amount of land sold last year, I suppose to be of slight importance. No inference can be made from it as to the amount likely to be sold next year. The Senator knows we have made land warrants assignable, and that they will be received in payment for public lands hereafter. My opinion is, that the sales for the next year will not pay the expenses. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. Shields] was on the committee which reported this bill, and has given it his examination.

Mr. DAWSON. I wish to state one or two reasons why I cannot vote for this bill. In the first place, we are now about to establish a precedent, that will be followed by all the other States that have a public domain within their limits; and it is at once settling the question of the graduation of the price of the public lands. We are determining not to reduce the price below $1 25 per acre, and that all the lands which cannot be sold at that price, shall be given to the several States in which they lie.

Now, my position is this: If the public lands belong to the State, the proceeds go into the Treasury; and, if not worth $1 25 per acre, put them down to fifty cents an acre, and let that go into the Treasury. It is but fair and right. I prefer a system of graduation to this system decidedly; for I am confident that, if we establish this precedent to-day, it will be followed, year after year, in all those States that have public lands, until the remnant of the lands go to those States. And I submit now, whether it is not better to have some general regulation by which all these remnants of land may be disposed of? I am willing to vote that they should be placed at fifty cents in the State of Ohio, and that, in the language of the Senator from Virginia, the State should have the right of preemption.

I feel rather disposed to go into the argument at once, for this reason: that I consider that we shall establish a precedent to-day, if we pass this bill; that it will be followed up, and we cannot avoid it. The question comes up under such very peculiar circumstances; the Senator from Ohio is, unfortunately, obliged to leave the city, which I regret very much; and he begins by stating his position, endeavors to enlist our sympathies, and calls on us to establish an important principle without any discussion. These circumstances, which surround us to-day, will not be known to the next Congress; and the States of Indiana and Illinois may come up, and ask us to act towards them on the principles which have guided us with respect to Ohio; and how shall we be able to deny them? Michigan will, very possibly, come in under very favorable auspices—perhaps the head of the Government may come from that State, and may recommend such a course. Illinois may, perchance, occupy the same position, under the same auspices.

Mr. CHASE. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him for a moment, I will state that the precedent has already been set. It is now too late to require that. The only question is, whether the same justice which has been extended to Tennessee shall be accorded to Ohio? I have in my hands the act by which the lands were surrendered to the State of Tennessee some years ago. It has this title:

"An act to surrender to the State of Tennessee all title the United States have to lands in Tennessee, south and west of the line commonly called the Congressional Reservation line."

And the act not only provides for the surrender of the lands to Tennessee which were within her limits, but it goes further, and provides that the State of Tennessee may retain the proceeds of the lands already sold. The precedent is already set.

Mr. DAWSON. I was going on to say, that the State of Alabama will be presenting her claim to this particular kind of favor, and probably under the same auspices. But I am called upon at once to see the influence of a precedent already made, under circumstances quite different. The Senator from Ohio will understand, that the lands in Tennessee were reduced to twenty-five cents per acre, before the release was made to that State; and it was said they could not be sold for twelve and a half cents per acre. Those lands were given to Tennessee for purposes of education within the State, and not given to the State, except for the prescribed purpose.

Have we not asked this body already to give to the various States of the Union a very small portion, a few thousand acres, of the public domain for purposes of education and internal improvement? and yet it is denied, while it is proposed that the State of Ohio shall take this land; and they refuse to let it lie in market another year, to see if it can be sold for fifty cents per acre. If it is not disposed of in five years, I would be willing to let it go to the State. No, sir; the object is to establish a precedent now, to lay down a position in which all the new States will combine to take all these lands. Hence it is that I cannot lend my aid to such a proceeding. I think it is unjust on the part of the new States to make such a demand on the old States; for it is, I think, violating the rights of the old States, which we ought not to allow, if we can prevent it. But out of respect to the feelings of the Senator from Ohio, I will say no more on the subject.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not feel quite prepared to vote for this bill without a little more information on the point which I suggested. My inquiry is, as these lands are represented by the Senator from Illinois, and the Senator from Ohio, to be refuse lands, and of no value, what have been the practical operations of the Government for some time past, in regard to sales in the State of Ohio? That seems to me to be a pertinent matter to be understood, prior to voting for this bill. I am not prepared to turn to documents to show the facts up to the present time; but I have been able to cast my eye on a document lying here, and I find that on the first of January, 1849, there were rising of eight hundred thousand acres of land unsold in the State of Ohio. I understand the honorable Senator from Ohio to state that there are two hundred thousand acres remaining. From this it appears that there have been large sales within these few years, and I shall be glad to know what has been the progress during the last year, in order that I may be able to judge whether these are refuse lands or not; or whether there is any demand for them. If these lands are of no value, as has been stated, then I think you make out a case similar to that of the State of Tennessee, and I will vote to give the State of Ohio these lands—such state of things being made out; but I have a strong impression upon my mind that that state of things does not exist in Ohio, and I am not prepared to vote for the bill till I know precisely what is the state of the facts.

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, and resulted—yeas 28, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Borland, Cass, Chase, Clemens, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Downs, Felch, Geyer, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, James, Jones of Iowa, King, Mallory, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Smith, Stockton, Sumner, Wade, and Walker—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Badger, Berrien, Bradbury, Brodhead, Clarke, Davis, Dawson, Hunter, Mangum, Norris, Spruance, Underwood, and Upham—13.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

COMPENSATION TO WORKMEN.

Mr. HALE. I move to suspend all previous orders, with a view to take up a resolution which I offered yesterday, providing for the payment of the workmen employed on the wings of the Capitol.

Several SENATORS. No! no! no! no!

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I should like to know who has the floor? If I have it, I desire to be heard, and I wish that other gentlemen would be kind enough to wait until I get through.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALE. I merely wish to say, that if the Senate will indulge me by taking up this resolution, I have an amendment prepared which I think will meet with the concurrence of most Senators. It was suggested to me by the architect of the Capitol, and involves but a small sum, not exceeding $12,000, which will do justice to the workmen. If Senators will agree to take it up, I promise them not to occupy any time upon it at all, but will only ask that we proceed at once to take a vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It will not pass without discussion. It will take up time.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope we shall proceed with the regular order of business. I have been ready, since Monday last, to call up the deficiency bill, and there is a pressing necessity that it should be called up; but I give way to the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Felch,] who is half through with a speech which he has commenced, and is entitled to the floor. Unless he is permitted to go on to-day, we shall be unable to get up the deficiency bill to-morrow, as he will not have had an opportunity to conclude his remarks.

Mr. RUSK. I shall vote against taking up the resolution proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire now, for I trust we shall go on with the unfinished business which is before us. I voted yesterday against receding from the amendment adopted in the Senate, in order to avoid further discussion; and if I am not mistaken, the Senator from New Hampshire voted to recede.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is mistaken; I voted against it.

Mr. RUSK. I saw then what would be the difficulty if we abandoned it, that it would be a fruitful source of further discussion. I hope that hereafter, when we have any matter before us which we can dispose of without splitting it in two, we shall vote against everything of that kind.

Mr. HALE. I consider that this proposition will fail, unless it is taken up now. If Senators are determined not to do anything on the subject, they will refuse to consider this resolution at this time; otherwise I hope they will take it up. I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. HUNTER. I would inquire if a majority can suspend the regular order, or whether the rules of the Senate do not require unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT. It requires only the vote of a majority, and not the unanimous consent, to take up any order.

Mr. BORLAND. I hope that the Senate will take up the measure of the Senator from New Hampshire. I feared when we receded, yesterday, from our amendment to the House resolution, that it was an abandonment, or, rather, a final rejection, of the claims that these laborers have put up—very properly, I think—for this compensation; but if there is a chance to give them any relief, I think that an effort ought to be made, and that there is no better time for it than now. I am unwilling that they should be kept any longer in suspense. If we mean to recognize their claims at all—as we all fully understand the question, and as there is no necessity for any further debate—I cannot conceive why we should not proceed at once, at least to relieve them from suspense.

Mr. BADGER. I am in favor of this joint resolution, but I hope that it will not be taken up now.

Mr. HALE. Then it will never be taken up.

Mr. BADGER. It will give rise to debate, and do injustice to the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. Felch,] who is entitled to the floor, and should be permitted to go on with his remarks to-day.

Mr. CASS. I shall vote for the resolution, if its being taken up does not prevent my colleague [Mr. Felch] from going on with his speech. If it occupies the time of the Senate, so as to prevent him from going on, I shall vote against it. He is entitled to the floor by every rule of courtesy, and should be allowed to proceed.

Mr. HALE. I understood that the Senator from Michigan would not occupy the time of the Senate for more than an hour. If this resolution is taken up and occupies more than an hour I will myself move to lay it on the table.

Mr. CASS. It will then be too late in the day. No person wants to commence a speech at almost three o'clock. The Senator from New Hampshire is meting out to my colleague a measure which he would not like to receive himself.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw it, although it is so difficult for me to obtain the floor that I despair of ever getting it again. [Laughter.]

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. BADGER. I move to postpone all previous special orders, with the view to take up the French spoliation bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate accordingly resumed the consideration of the bill to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of the claims of American citizens for spoiliations committed by the French prior to 1800.

Mr. FELCH spoke for over an hour and a half in continuation of his speech commenced on Monday, in opposition to the bill. His remarks will be published hereafter.]

Mr. DOWNS. I desire to have an Executive session, and I move therefore to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow. In making this motion, I will state that I have no disposition to address the Senate upon the subject.

Mr. CLARKE. I wish the honorable Senator would waive that motion for a moment, and allow me to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to present a memorial.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. HALE temporarily occupying the chair.) The subject before the Senate must first be disposed of.

Mr. BRADBURY. I hope the honorable Senator from Rhode Island will withdraw that request, and leave this bill in its present position. He can present his memorial to-morrow, in the morning hour.

Mr. CLARKE. That will make no difference as to the disposition of this subject.

Mr. BRADBURY. It will be no longer the order of the day.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the bill will be disposed of, for to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to take up the deficiency bill.

Mr. DOWNS. I wish to get an Executive session. If it can be obtained without a postponement of this bill, I would take that mode.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This subject must be disposed of.

The motion to postpone was not agreed to.

Mr. BRADBURY. The honorable Senator from North Carolina made an appeal to me that he may be permitted to occupy the floor for a few moments, on a matter personal to himself, without any postponement of the subject. By general consent, I hope that privilege will be accorded to the honorable Senator.

Mr. MANGUM. I made the application referred to by the honorable Senator from Maine. I did desire, that by the courtesy of the Senate, it would extend to me the privilege of being heard for some ten or fifteen minutes, upon a matter which might be dove-tailed in as a sort of parenthesis in the discussion of the French spoliation bill. But it is a matter that pertains more particularly to myself; and it is asking a very large favor of this body for one so very humble to be allowed that length of time. I hope that in the morning the Senate will have the courtesy to extend to me the favor of occupying its attention. I believe this is the first time in my life, after a service of many years, that I have asked such a favor.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the Senator proceed now?

Mr. MANGUM. I would prefer to go on to-morrow morning; and, therefore, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 14, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. L. F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the report of the Committee on Printing, upon which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] has the floor.

Mr. SIBLEY. I desire the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution, which I ask may be read for information.

It was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency—first, of reporting a bill to allow the settlers on the public lands in Minnesota Territory, who have settled on school sections previous to the survey, to enter such lands upon payment of the minimum price; and secondly, of permitting the Territory aforesaid to select other lands, of equal value, in lieu thereof.

There was no objection, and the resolution was received and adopted.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. FLORENCE. If my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown,] who is entitled to the floor, will permit me to place the resolution I had the honor to offer yesterday in a better position before the House, I will be very much obliged to him.

Mr. BROWN. I do not know what the gentleman wants.

Mr. FLORENCE. I will inform the gentleman. I offered yesterday, during the confusion, a resolution. It now appears by the rules of the House that a joint resolution was necessary—

Mr. BROWN. Before the gentleman progresses with his resolution, I desire to inquire of the Speaker how much time I have left?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands from the gentleman who occupied the chair when the House adjourned, that the gentleman has twenty minutes.

Mr. FLORENCE. I will occupy but a minute of the gentleman's time.

Mr. BROWN. I hope the gentleman will be as brief as possible.

Mr. FLORENCE. That joint resolution, offered amidst the confusion of the debate yesterday, was not read, as the rule requires, a first and second time, and it is a matter of doubt whether it is properly before the House. I now desire to withdraw that resolution. It will leave the proposition to print before the House, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] occupies the floor upon that motion. I will then move to recommit the report to the Committee on Printing, with instructions to report the following bill, which I ask to have read.

Mr. BROWN. I cannot spare the time for reading all those papers.

Mr. HAVEN. I rise to a privileged question. Not, however, to occupy the gentleman's time.

Since I have taken my seat this morning my attention has been called to a report of the remarks which I made yesterday, which I now desire to put right, as it may do some injustice to Mr. Towers and Mr. Rives. I am reported as saying:

"The next was by Mr. Towers. As I understood, Mr. Rives told me that Mr. Towers would not be able to perform the work without some aid; that he could make nothing out of it if he took it at his bid, but that he would be willing to aid him in reference to that; and, as I understand him, his [Mr. Rives] bid was the next lowest."

There is a slight inaccuracy in this. I learn from Mr. Towers that his bid for this fourth class of printing, which includes these extra numbers, was a better bid for the bidder than that of Mr. Rives; that is, it was not so low as Mr. Rives's bid. Mr. Towers informs me that his was a fair business bid, at a low price, but upon which he could make something. I have made this explanation at the request of these gentlemen.

Mr. FLORENCE. I wish to submit my bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] to withdraw his resolution of yesterday, and to signify his purpose to offer another one.

Mr. FLORENCE. That will answer.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. Before I enter upon the subject which was under consideration at the time of adjournment yesterday, I desire to correct an impression which I ascertain to have made a lodgement upon the minds of some gentlemen, whose opinion I prize very highly. And that is, that I have been actuated in my course by some feeling of personal hostility to the parties engaged by the committee to execute the public printing. I desire to say, once for all, that I distinctly disavow any such feeling. My personal relations with all the gentlemen, (or with all of them that I know,) are of a friendly character, and I know of no reason why they should not so continue. I owe them no thanks for past favors, and no grudge for past injuries. Occupying such a position, I can deal out to each one, and to all of them, equal and exact justice.

It seems to me, that in the action of the committee upon this subject of printing, there has been no bona fide effort to employ any one to execute the work, except Donelson & Armstrong. With the majority of the committee on the part of the House of Representatives, this appears clearly to have been the case. It seems that no other establishment was thought of, in connection with this printing, or was treated as worthy to receive it, except the Union establishment. With the majority, it was Donelson & Armstrong at the beginning—it was Donelson & Armstrong through its whole progress—it was Donelson & Armstrong at the conclusion.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman from Mississippi allow me to say a word?

Mr. BROWN. If I am at all mistaken, I want to be corrected—

Mr. STANTON. The remark the gentleman has just made does not apply to me. I attempted, at an early part of this struggle, to get this work divided out to Donelson & Armstrong and John T. Towers, and offered a resolution to that effect. I did so for this reason: because there was a necessity, at the time, of doing something. I thought those gentlemen were prepared to do the work, and I proposed to the committee to give to them such work as the public printer could not, or would not, do.

Mr. BROWN. Still I find, from the explanation of my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] that he insisted upon having Donelson & Armstrong in the contract somewhere. Now, sir, while these gentlemen [Messrs. STANTON and GORMAN] were indulging their predilections for their friends, it seems they never thought of indulging other gentlemen to the same extent. They, it seems, had their likes for Donelson & Armstrong, and their dislikes for other printers and editors, and it was all right that they should indulge them. But if other people indulge their likes and dislikes, then these gentlemen think it is all wrong. They think it very odd that other gentlemen should refuse to give up their opposition to Donelson & Armstrong; but they seem at no time to have been willing to yield their position in favor of these gentlemen. These facts being true, I say there does not seem to have been a bona fide single purpose of procuring the public work to be done in the speediest manner, and by those who would do it the cheapest and best. But there seems to have been but one purpose, running throughout the whole proceedings, from the beginning to the end, and that was to favor the printing establishment of Donelson & Armstrong. That I object to. I do not object to those particular individuals. What I object to is this: that the committee did not go to work in good faith to obtain the printing upon the best terms, but that they made the public interest secondary to the private interest of the Union establishment. Their position appears to have been, that unless Donelson & Armstrong could be included in the contract, they would make no contract. This, in my judgment, was wrong. Why not contract with other parties, if they would do the work as speedily and as cheaply? Why did the committee, from the beginning to the end, insist, without special reference to the speedy completion of the work, that this particular establishment should be included in whatever contract was made? It was the duty of the committee to have given the contractor every reasonable indulgence, and if he failed or refused to do the work, to have reported that failure to Congress; and if they put the work in other hands they ought to have employed the man who would do it the quickest, cheapest and best.

The honorable gentleman, the chairman of that committee, [Mr. GORMAN,] in the course of a colloquy yesterday, endeavored to impress upon the minds of this House, and so far as his printed speech could do it, upon the minds of the country, that there was something like an understanding between gentlemen entertaining extreme views; or, in other words, between what is called the Southern ultras and Northern Free-Soilers. An intimation was more than once made in the progress of the debate that there was something like a coalition between these extremes, and that by agreement they were acting in concert upon this question. No such thing is true of me. I repudiate any such insinuation, come from what quarter it may. I act here solely and alone, upon my own responsibility, never asking, never inquiring, and never caring whether any other man North or South is or is not acting with me.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] intimates that he will expose these understandings. For me, he is quite at liberty to begin. But before he puts my friends or myself on trial, I would advise him to try his hand on his associate, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON.] He is a capital subject to practice on. I shall expect to hear him say, "RICHARD STANTON, slaveholder and pro-slavery Democratic Representative from the slaveholding State of Kentucky, stand up and answer to this House, by what warrant you were found in an unholy coalition with TRUMAN SMITH, Free-Soiler and Abolition Whig Senator from Connecticut, voting to divide the public printing between the Union and the Republic?" It would be an interesting trial, and I should watch its progress with great interest. Let the gentleman settle accounts like this between his colleagues on the committee before he charges coalition upon others. It seems there is no account taken of coalitionists like theirs. But if persons occupying such extreme positions as the gentleman from Massachusetts and myself are found opposing a bargain made by others holding quite as extreme positions as we do, we hear a great outcry about Coalition! Coalition! If the bargain was made by a coalition, it may be opposed in the same way. If there was nothing wrong in the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] and TRUMAN SMITH acting together in making the bargain, there can be nothing wrong in the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANDOLPH] and myself acting together in opposing it. If I am found acting with gentlemen entertaining extreme views against the contract, it will be found that it was made by gentlemen holding opinions just as extreme.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, (interrupting.) If the gentleman from Mississippi will allow me, I will tell him the result. We succeeded in bringing over a Connecticut Whig Senator and Abolitionist to the support of a compromise press.

Mr. BROWN. Yes, sir; and when he came over he brought with him a Whig paper which has heaped more abuse upon the Democratic majority of this House than all the presses from Maine to Louisiana. Its columns teem from day to day with abuse of members of this House whose Democracy has never been questioned—Northern men and Southern men. When you talk about your Free-Soil ally from the North going for a compromise press, let me remind you, that he carried you over to the Whig press, and that one, the most vindictive of them all. The country will inquire how this was brought about; how, with an overwhelming Democratic majority in this House, and an equally effective Democratic majority in the Senate, you have not been able to choose a Democratic printer? Why it was that the Republic was fastened upon us? Why has this coalition been formed? These are the questions that will be asked. And the answer will be, that Donelson & Armstrong might be provided for. That is the whole secret of the matter—that is the nest in which the coalition was hatched.

Mr. POLK, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman from Mississippi allow me to propound a question to him?

Mr. BROWN. Simply a question.

Mr. POLK. Will you vote to elect the compromise Union press to be public printer?

Mr. BROWN. I will not vote to elect any newspaper editor public printer. I said so yesterday.

Mr. KING. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. POLK. I see the coalition is now formed. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. KING,] a Free-Soiler, says I am out of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. I beg not to be interrupted by a side-bar colloquy.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Mississippi to yield the floor to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK.]

Mr. BROWN. I did for a question, but not for a colloquy. Now, let us see, sir, to what strange reasons gentlemen of this committee are driven in justification of their course. The honorable gentleman who sits before me [Mr. HAVEN] says that he objected to Mr. Rives's doing this work, he already had a large and important job from the Government. How many important and profitable jobs has the Republic under the Government? Who does not know that the Republic newspaper is fattened and made sleek by the pap it receives from the Executive Departments? All this the gentleman takes no account of. It was his sow that was drinking the swill, and he never thought it worth his while to change it.

If this printing had to be divided out, why was not mere justice observed in the division? Why should the committee have confined themselves exclusively to the Union and Republic? Why take two newspapers, occupying extreme positions, and turn all others out? Why not take in the "old fogies" of the Intelligencer? Why were they, like Nebuchadnezzar, turned out to grass? I do not see any reason why they should not have had a share. They are for the compromise. Was it because they had not been peculiarly abusive of the Democratic party, and of the Democratic members of this House? I must confess, sir, if I had to elect between Donelson & Armstrong and the Intelligencer, on the one hand, and Donelson & Armstrong and the Republic, on the other, I would take the Intelligencer by large odds.

I ask the attention of those gentlemen to what I am about to say. What are we to understand by this procedure? My friend from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN,] on yesterday, when he came to allude to the Southern Press, to which he evidently thought I was much attached, and in whose service I was laboring, (and in all of which he was very much mistaken,) became almost frantic. His manner was excited, and he became a little denunciatory for a gentleman of his amiable temper. [Laughter.] Why was this? Why was it thought necessary thus to denounce the Southern Press. That paper, as is well known, reflects the sentiments of a large number of the Southern Democrats. Are we to understand in its exclusion, and the bitter denunciations which follow the mention of its name, that such portion of the Democracy as sympathize in the sentiments uttered through its columns, are also to be proscribed, excluded, and denounced? Is this what we are to understand? And if we are, where is this proscription to stop? If Southern Democrats, who sympathize with the sentiments uttered through the columns of the Southern Press, are to be proscribed before the election, what is to be their position after the election? These are matters, sir, to be reflected upon.

Now, I am free to say to you, Mr. Speaker, to the House, and to the country, that my vote and my course in the presidential canvass are not to be controlled by your action upon this subject. But I am not authorized to say that your action may not control the votes of hundreds and thousands of others in the South. If you shall indicate to them, that because certain newspapers and gentlemen have defended what they believe to be the rights of the Southern States, they are therefore to be proscribed, they will probably feel it to be due to their own dignity and self-respect to proscribe you in return. Lightly as gentlemen may think of it, this view of the subject may be found worthy of consideration. There are in the States of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi alone, one hundred thousand State-Rights men. Proscribe them, proscribe the organ that more nearly than any other in this city reflects their views, and do it because of those views, and I tell you, I will not be accountable for the manner in which they will dispose of their votes. They may not ask favors at your hands for themselves or for any one else, but they may feel it to be due to their own self-respect to resent an insult—to resent proscription. I will not undertake to say what they will do. I am not authorized, as I have said before, to state what their future action will be; but I do feel authorized, in a friendly way, to say that you should be cautious how you act. You may endanger the success of your presidential candidate. You may endanger a matter infinitely more important to me than the public printing. You may endanger the patronage of the President, and the distribution of the $50,000,000. A little caution and a little good temper, properly exercised, and a slight sprinkle of justice and common sense, may save a deal of trouble by and by. It is one thing to give up that which is one's due voluntarily, and it is another thing to have it snatched away, and that in so rude a manner as to give offense. I repeat again that I do not want any part of this printing for any friend of mine on earth. But I should not like to be told that certain parties could not have it because they were my friends. And I think it likely this may be the feeling of a great many Southern people.

I do not care, sir, to pursue this discussion. I have said about all that I care to say, and if I go further, I may say that which had better be left unsaid. The concluding portion of my remarks, I throw out only as a friendly warning to my political brethren here. They can receive them in a friendly spirit or not. I want it to be understood, and it is all I have to say, that when proscription commences for opinion's sake, there can be proscription upon one side as well as upon the other. I offer the following resolution. It is not my own, and does not fully meet my approbation. A friend has handed it to me, with a request that I should offer it. I do so in compliance with his request:

Resolved, That the report of the Committee on Printing be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report upon the whole subject, and to recommend for the adoption of Congress such a system for the execution of the public printing as they may deem most expedient, and that they especially take into consideration the plan for a printing bureau, for the execution of the work under the supervision of a Government officer."

Mr. BROWN. The Judiciary Committee had been selected, because in taking this contract, if it must be taken, out of the hands of Hamilton, and disposing of it otherwise, legal questions must necessarily arise, which it will be better to have passed upon by the Judiciary Committee than any other. I have done, sir.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to amend the instructions by adding thereto the words, "and that they especially take into consideration the following plan for a printing office:"

A BILL to establish a public printing office, and to provide for the appointment of a superintendent of public printing.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a superintendent of the public printing, who shall be a practical printer, of education and experience in the business of printing, the term of whose office shall be four years, unless sooner removed by the President, or by joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives; who shall receive an annual compensation for his services of $3,000, and give bond to the United States in the sum of $10,000, with sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, for the faithful performance of the duties of his office.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said superintendent shall take charge of and be responsible for all original or other matter directed by the proper authority to be printed, and cause the same to be promptly executed, as required, and shall return it in good order to the officer from whom it was received, as may be required by such officer; and it shall be his duty to purchase of A. Boyd Hamilton, for the United States, his printing establishment in the city of Washington, now used by him as the public printer, at such price and upon such terms as they may agree; such agreement to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, not exceeding $—; and also to purchase for the United States, as the same may be required, at the usual and at reasonable prices, such presses, type, and other printing materials as may be necessary for the execution of all the printing required at the seat of Government, by or for the use of either of the Executive Departments of Government, or by either or both Houses of Congress; to employ, at the usual and proper wages, such foremen, compositors, pressmen, proof-readers, and other persons, as he shall deem indispensably necessary for the accurate, speedy, economical, and faithful execution of the public printing, and to discharge either of them for incompetency or other sufficient cause, to be stated by him on the records of the office; to purchase by contract, after due notice for sealed proposals, of the lowest and best bidder, and according to the quality of the samples to be exhibited by him, all such paper as may be necessary for said printing; and to render an account annually to each House of Congress, (or oftener if required by either House,) of all his expenditures for the purposes aforesaid.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall also be the duty of the said superintendent to pay, on the first day of every month, all bills for the purchase of materials for the use of the said office, and all wages due to the persons employed in and about said establishment for their labor during the preceding week; and for that purpose he shall be authorized to draw monthly from the Treasury of the United States all such sums of money as may be required therefor, to be ascertained by a statement thereof to be made by him, and presented to and approved by the Secretary of the Interior; and on such approval he shall be authorized to receive the said sum from the Treasury.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said superintendent shall appoint a practical bookbinder, possessing a thorough knowledge of the business, who shall receive $1,000 a year for his services. And the said bookbinder may, with the approbation of the superintendent, employ such bookbinders and other persons as may be indispensably necessary to a neat, prompt, and economical execution of the folding, stitching, and binding, that may be directed by law, or by the order of either House of Congress, or be necessary to secure together the several sheets of which a document may consist; the wages of such bookbinders and other persons to be regulated by those paid for similar services in other binderies in the United States, and be paid by the said superintendent; and the said superintendent shall have the power to discharge the said binders and other persons whenever the public interest shall require, and he shall purchase all the materials required for said binding in the same manner as is heretofore directed for the purchase of paper.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all printing directed by law, or by either of the Executive Departments of the General Government in pursuance of law, or such as may be necessary to the execution of law, and all other printing directed by the Senate or House of Representatives, or both, and all folding, stitching, and binding required for the same, or directed by law, shall be executed at the said public printing office, and in the manner required; but no private printing or binding of any description whatsoever, or for any person or persons whatsoever, shall be received at or executed in the said office; and any infraction of this prohibition, by any person belonging to either of said offices, shall be deemed and acted upon as a good cause for the removal of such person so offending from public employment.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That for the regulation and government of the persons, business, expenditures, and every other object or matter connected with the said public printing office, rules shall be prepared by the said superintendent, the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, which, when confirmed and approved by the Committees on Printing of both Houses of Congress, shall be binding, and shall be observed and enforced by the said superintendent.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the resolution entitled "Joint resolution directing the manner of procuring the printing for the two Houses of Congress," approved August 3, 1876, shall be and the same is hereby rescinded.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the said superintendent shall not be the editor, proprietor, or publisher of any newspaper, pamphlet, magazine, periodical or printed paper of any sort, nor in any way concerned or interested therein, or connected therewith. He shall only employ in said offices skillful, practical, industrious, and sober workmen, to be selected by him on his own responsibility, with a view to their qualifications only; and the said superintendent, before entering upon the duties of his office, shall take an oath before a judge of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, which oath shall be filed in said court, that he is in no way interested in any such newspaper, magazine, or periodical aforesaid, and will not become interested therein during the term for which he shall have been appointed; and if at any time he shall become so interested, the said office shall thereupon become vacant, and the person so offending shall be incapable of holding the said office hereafter; and if it shall appear that he was so interested, either at the time of his appointment, or at any time thereafter, he shall be prosecuted before the said court, and on conviction, punished for wilful perjury.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the Committee on Printing, whenever the public printer fails to do any printing ordered by the House according to his contract, be instructed to advertise, for ten days, for proposals to print each order in the manner prescribed by the printing contract, and to award the printing of each order of the House to the lowest responsible bidder.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraw his motion made yesterday to recommit the bill?

Mr. FLORENCE. I do, if the proposition I have submitted will then be in order.

The SPEAKER. It will be in order.

Mr. FLORENCE. Then I withdraw my motion to recommit, and submit the proposition to amend the instructions moved by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN.]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is it in order to amend a resolution by a bill for an act of Congress?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor, and proposes to amend the instructions to the Judiciary Committee, that they consider specially the propriety of reporting the bill indicated by him.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. They are instructed in the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi, to take into consideration the establishment of a Government bureau.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Pennsylvania as proposing to add these words: "That the said committee shall consider specially the propriety of adopting and reporting the particular bill."

Mr. FLORENCE. Yes, sir, if it is in order.

The SPEAKER. It is in order, in the opinion of the Chair. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to address the House?

Mr. FLORENCE. I do, sir.

The proposition to amend was then read.

Mr. STANLY. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to ask him a question. I desire to know, sir, if this bill, or the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi, makes any provision for the printing of the present session of Congress until that bill shall be enacted into a law?

Mr. FLORENCE. The last section directs the Committee on Public Printing to contract with any person, after ten days' advertisement, for the work that the public printer fails to execute. It is the same as the resolution which the gentleman will find reported in the Globe of this morning, and which I offered yesterday.

Mr. STANLY. Of course, that does not operate until this law is enacted.

Mr. FLORENCE. There is not any provision for the purpose suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] for I take it for granted that the public printer is able—if he is permitted to do so—to complete the work for which he has contracted; at least, such is his declaration.

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to detain the House for a very long time in reference to a subject so fruitful, and the cause of so much agitation, as the public printing has been for the last quarter of a century. I desire only to go briefly through the history, as I best can, from a recollection of the circumstances and facts, of the many ungenerous attacks that have been made upon the gentleman now holding the contract, and to assume the position, which, to my mind, is incontrovertible, that this is the reason why he is not able to perform his work, and the sole cause of the present difficulty in relation to it. But before I proceed with that, I desire to say that I do not agree with my friend from Mississippi, that the contract system ever can be perfected. I do not believe that it is susceptible of any improvement. My acquaintance with the plan, method, or mode by which contracts for all the supplies of the Government are generally entered into, justifies me in this conclusion.

Now, sir, every gentleman who is engaged in commercial or any other of the various mercantile pursuits, or who has ever had an opportunity of contracting with the Government, is acquainted with the plan which it is very generally understood is adopted. Why, sir, I can take up any newspaper in which the proposals are published for contracts with the Government, and show the manner in which they are given out. If any gentleman here has a copy of the Republic with him of this morning, I will be much obliged to him for it, and I will give a sort of illustration, as I understand it, how contracts are obtained at low prices.

For instance, Mr. Speaker, here is an advertisement for small stores, issued by the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing. Well, sir, those gentlemen who are familiar with the subject of taking contracts, may perhaps (I do not wish to asperse anybody) have a friend at court—one of the clerks in the Department, perhaps—who knows the exact quantity of articles that are required, and who informs the bidder for the supplies that so many of one article is required, and so many of another; and the consequence is, that the gentleman making the proposal agrees to supply a certain article, of which very few are wanted, at a very low price.

For instance, here are shaving-boxes, shaving-brushes, scrubbing-brushes, shoe-brushes, down to beeswax. There is a large number of shaving-boxes, shaving-brushes, scrubbing-brushes, and shoe-brushes wanted, in all probability, but a very little beeswax, and the consequence is, that the contractor puts down beeswax at a very low price, and all the other articles—the shaving-brushes, and so on—at a high price. This course is adopted with respect to every article, and the consequence is, that a general average price is made, and the man who offers to supply beeswax for nothing, gets the contract. So it is, it is but fair to presume, with printing. I had a conversation with a gentleman this morning, who had offered to contract for the public printing—

Mr. POLK. Let us have his name, if you please.

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not think it at all necessary to give his name.

Mr. POLK. If the gentleman intends to make a proposition to the House, we should know the name of the person with whom he had this conversation.

Mr. FLORENCE. I merely intend to state the nature of the conversation.

Mr. POLK. If any man intends to make a tangible proposition, we should know the name of the person with whom he conversed.

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not intend to do any such thing, but I merely wish to state the conversation I had with him this morning, which was quite accidental. As, however, there is no secret to divulge, I presume I may, without impropriety, or a violation of confidence reposed in me, mention the gentleman's name; and to gratify the honorable member from Tennessee, [Mr. Polk,] I will do so. I have, therefore, no hesitation in informing the gentleman and the House that the name of the gentleman to whom I have alluded is JOHN C. RIVES. He told me, if I understood him correctly, that he had, in his proposal for the printing, offered to supply the "yawls" and "gun-boats," as he called them, for nothing; but that he intended to be reasonably paid for the "seventy-fours" that he furnished to the Government. But let me explain this more fully. The gentleman of whom I speak, said that he had offered, in his contract, to give to the House the list of yeas and nays, the calendar, the bills, all of which he represented, in his peculiarly facetious manner, to be the "gun-boats" and "yawls," for nothing; but that the "seventy-fours," consisting of the public documents, out of which, as I understand it, the profit was to be made, he intended to supply at a pretty good price, to liberally compensate him for the responsibility so assumed. That, sir, is the practical working of the whole contract system, and for this reason I am not in favor of it; because I do not believe that the public good is thereby promoted, or is the work perfected as it ought to be; nor do I believe, sir, that it is of any advantage to the Government, so far as excellence of workmanship or expedition is concerned. At the time that the bill which I have had the honor to submit to the House was presented—or nearly the same bill, because there are only one or two sections added to it—I took pains to inform myself, as far as I could, of the opinions of various gentlemen engaged in the printing business. The Printers' Union of Philadelphia, composed of from five hundred to six hundred very intelligent gentlemen, at my request—I do not, however, egotistically state this fact—appointed a committee for the purpose of considering the bill offered by Mr. Doty to this House, and after full investigation of the matter before them, the committee reported the following resolution, which was adopted with marked unanimity, as will be seen, by the laudable and praiseworthy association, who have united to mutually promote the interests of "the craft," of which they are worthy and exemplary members. I will read their proceedings, so far as action has been had upon the subject of the establishment of a National Printing Office:

"At a recent meeting of the Printers' Union, of Philadelphia, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That we recommend the immediate passage of the bill now before Congress, (introduced by Mr. Doty,) for the establishment of a public printing office, believing it to be the commencement of that progressive reform which will, eventually, secure to the toiling millions their due position in society, and a fair compensation for labor in every useful occupation. M. C. BROWN, President.

"Extract from Minutes.

"JOS. M. WOLFF, Secretary."

This, sir, is the deliberately-considered opinion of the Printers' Union of Philadelphia, and I believe it to be a disinterested one, because I cannot suppose that a single one of these gentlemen could ever have expected, or is, indeed, looking forward with any reasonable degree of hope to occupy a position, for which all or any of them are eminently qualified, in the national printing office. But if he did, sir, there is an assurance that he would render a full equivalent for any compensation the Government might be called upon to give him; and hence, the position the gentleman would occupy in his industrial or professional relation to the Government, would be equal, as he would render a full and fair equivalent in labor for all he might receive, in the shape of pecuniary compensation from the National Treasury. I repeat that I regard this, sir, as a perfectly disinterested opinion, given from the practical knowledge, or the practical anticipations of the working of such an establishment, and the advantage which would be derived from it to the Government.

It has been said, that Mr. Hamilton is not able to execute his contract; I stated at the commencement of my remarks, which I beg to repeat, that, in my humble opinion, the opposition made against him brought about this result. I stated that, sir, and it is my opinion that such is the fact. About the time, or soon after this contract was made—with which every gentleman is familiar—it was spread broad-cast over the land, that the price for which Mr. Hamilton had contracted to do this work—to perform the public printing—would result, inevitably, in his ruin; and that it would be impossible for him to accomplish it. It was then further said, sir, that no responsible person would consent to become surety for him; and I believe—and if I am not correct in my recollection, I hope to be corrected by some gentleman upon the floor of this House—I believe the heretofore unsullied character of his securities was grossly assailed, their responsibility doubted, and, indeed, I am informed that such declarations were given general currency to in one or more of the papers of Washington city. They were alleged to be "men of straw," to use the language applied to them; and it was said that there was no responsibility either in the public printer or in his sureties. Now a word to as that, sir. One of these gentlemen to whom I have referred, in his relation as surety for the public printer, is a constituent of mine, who I have the honor to represent on the floor of this House. I refer particularly to Mr. William Badger, and I assert here before this House and before the nation, that there is not a more responsible gentleman than he is, so far, at least, as he has entered security, and I have no hesitation in declaring it to be my belief that his means are quite ample enough to justify him for entering into the responsibility which he has assumed. I repeat, sir, then, I believe his resources are quite ample, and I further say that he is worthy of the consideration of this House, and that it is a libel upon that gentleman; it is an assault upon him which I cannot permit to pass by unnoticed, without saying as much as I have said in relation to him.

Mr. STANLY. Mr. Badger is a responsible surety, you say?

Mr. FLORENCE. I do, sir. He is a responsible surety. He is not "a man of straw." I have good reason to know that, for he voted for me and helped to send me here. [Laughter.]

The name of another of these gentlemen is Mr. Louis Pelouze, who resides in Philadelphia, and who supplies most of the types that are used upon the different newspapers in the city of Philadelphia, throughout the State of Pennsylvania, and perhaps for those published here. This gentleman is possessed of a very large establishment, and I take it for granted that he is entirely competent for the amount for which he has assumed the responsibility, and hence, I do not consider that he is "a man of straw." But, sir, sufficient for the purpose is it that I have said as much as I have in vindication of Mr. Badger and Mr. Pelouze. I believe them—I verily believe them to be entirely competent for the performance of the obligation they have assumed, at least in becoming sureties for the execution of the contract entered into by Mr. Hamilton.

During the third week of this session, the subject of the public printing was introduced into this House. It was alleged then, because it was anticipated I suppose, that the public printer was not competent to fulfill either the letter or spirit of his contract. Well, now, if gentlemen will go back with me, they will recollect that during or about that time all of us were frozen up here in Washington—communication by means of the railroad or by the river Potomac with the East was interrupted. It was said and urged, as a forcible reason why the appropriation should be made for the extension of the wings of the Capitol, that a large number of the working men engaged upon that work were frozen up here and were suffering, because they were deprived of the proceeds of their labor. The Susquehanna river, for a long time, was filled with ice. I recollect perfectly well that I remained in Washington about two months, because I did not feel it safe to trust myself in crossing the Susquehanna.

Mr. POLK. I suppose, good men being scarce, the gentleman took care of himself.

Mr. FLORENCE. Yes, sir, I did. To resume: Consequently the supplies he had contracted for failed to reach him. I suppose the contractor with him failed to fulfill his agreement, as almost all contractors do, unfortunately. He contracted for the paper, he contracted for other material—all else that was required for the adequate establishment of his printing office, all of which was prevented from being transmitted over the roads or by the river to Washington. I understand that the public printer adduced that as a reason why he failed in the immediate performance of the work which was intrusted to him at that time. I understand him to say that a large lot of paper which had been sent in a vessel from the East, or from New York, or Philadelphia, was frozen up in the Potomac river. It is not material for my purpose to specify particularly from whence it came. The fact alleged by the public printer I believe to be true. While the public printer could not control the elements—while the winter was the most severe we have experienced for a series of years, and it could not have been anticipated that this interruption would have occurred—it was at least some excuse why the work had not progressed beyond the point which it had at that time. For that reason the Committee on Public Printing should have extended some generosity to him. However, the chairman of the Committee on Public Printing—and a most energetic and devoted chairman he is—declared—and he is to be commended for his candor—that his object was to give the printing to a party press—that his object was to give the printing to Donelson & Armstrong, and that it became the Democratic majority of this House to support their organ. Well, Mr. Speaker, I know by experience the disadvantage resulting from a want of support to the organ of a party. So far as that matter is concerned, if it could be legitimately given, I sympathize most deeply with the gentlemen. I have myself paid for the privilege of printing a Democratic newspaper. I am a victim—a martyr, perhaps, in the field of Democratic newspaper enterprise. [Laughter.] Well, sir, to accomplish the purpose in view, I am forced to conclude, was only to be brought about by breaking down A. Boyd Hamilton, the public printer, so as to enable the committee or the House to give the printing to Donelson & Armstrong. Now, while I was very willing—perhaps I even participated somewhat in the desire to do so, or perhaps I did not, it is not material either way, to permanently establish a Democratic organ, and to practically sympathize with them, by voting "material aid" to Donelson & Armstrong, I was not willing to consent that one Democrat should be broken down to elevate and build up another.

A VOICE. That is the point.

Mr. FLORENCE. Mr. Hamilton happened to be a constituent of mine. He happened to be for a long time connected with the Democratic press of Philadelphia city. I could not understand, and I so declared upon the floor of this House, the policy of giving the public printing to a Democrat with a newspaper, to the exclusion and destruction pecuniarily—for that would have been the inevitable result—of a Democrat without a newspaper. Ruin would stare the latter in the face. For the life of me, with all the investigation I have been enabled to give the matter since—with all the labor I have bestowed upon it—although four months have transpired—I cannot see how this discrimination can be justified. A. Boyd Hamilton, it is said, is not competent to perform his contract. I venture the assertion, notwithstanding the declaration made in the House yesterday, in relation to the monk and friar work, that his work will bear comparison with any public work heretofore done by contract; or in any other manner, in the city of Washington. I have, accidentally, before me a report, known as "Foster & Whitney's Report;" I open it at the two hundred and forty-first page, and venture the assertion here, because I have had some experience, that the printing, typography, paper, and general appearance of the work—there is an absence of monks and friars, (printers' technical phrases,) and all other strange gentlemen—will compare with any other printing previously done for the Government.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the gentleman say whether the document he holds in his hands complies with the contract, or not?

Mr. FLORENCE. I cannot say.

Mr. GORMAN. Do you not know that it does not?

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not, sir.

Mr. GORMAN. I hold in my hand the specimen which was attached to the contract. The paper upon which that document is printed is inferior to it by ten pounds.

Mr. FLORENCE. That assertion only sustains me in the declaration I made in the beginning, that it is good enough for all practical purposes. If it does not come up to the contract, it only argues the greater necessity for the establishment of a national printing office. Then there will be a certainty of the Government having good work and it promptly executed. I took from a shelf, under my desk, this morning, a book which bore upon its title page the imprint of Wendell & Van Benthuyssen. It is not my purpose—indeed, it would be ungentle—to reflect upon those gentlemen. I do not intend to find any fault with their work. It did not strike me as being as well executed as this, (holding up in his hand a document published by A. Boyd Hamilton,) nor quite as clean. That much I will say. This is better work than that previously executed for the Government; but still, not coming up to the contract entered into by Mr. Hamilton, it argues the necessity of Congress and the country protecting itself against any future dereliction, by taking the matter into their own hands, by establishing a national printing office, and by that means prevent the eternal squabble that occurs at every session of Congress, upon the subject of the public printing.

It was asserted, as I understood yesterday, that most of the paper was deficient about ten per cent. in weight.

Mr. GORMAN. It is more than that. We deducted ten per cent.

Mr. FLORENCE. I understand, however, that some of it is overweighed. At all events, the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] said that such of the work as had been executed well, the Committee on Printing did not intend to take away from the contractor—consisting of bills, yeas and nays, calendars, &c. How much of the work does that class constitute? Four fifths?

Mr. GORMAN. The first and the fifth class constitute about one tenth.

Mr. FLORENCE. By my conversation with Mr. Rives this morning, I took it for granted that the "yaws" and "gun-boats" were a small proportion, and the "seventy-fours" were a much larger number.

Mr. ORR. I desire to make a remark, in the shape of an inquiry, so that the chairman of the Committee on Printing, or some other member of that committee, will be able to answer it. It is proposed by the report submitted by the Committee on Printing, to give the House printing to Donelson & Armstrong, and the Senate printing to Gideon & Co. They also state, that they have proposed to give to Donelson & Armstrong and Gideon & Co., the printing at the rates of Mr. Rives's bid at the last session. I hold an abstract of all the biddings before me. There were some ten bidders for the public work. The aggregate amount of all the work to be performed by Mr. Rives's bid reaches the sum of $196,000. Mr. Hamilton agreed to do it, and he has the contract, for $87,000. And I find amongst the bidders, that Gideon & Co.—one of the parties who is to receive one half of the work—

Mr. GORMAN. I do not want the gentleman to get into any further errors. It is not Gideon & Co. of the Republic office.

Mr. ORR. Very well. It serves my purpose as well. I thank the gentleman for the correction. I thought it was the same company. I find the name of Jacob Gideon, and I supposed it was the same. I stand corrected. Mr. Rives's bid—I recur to that—makes a larger aggregate than the bid of any other one of the list, with one exception. The bid of Flinn amounts to $226,000. The bid of Rives amounts to $196,000, and there are eight bidders below this point. One of the bids amounts to $108,000; another to $148,000; another to $128,000; another to $133,000; another to $127,000, and another to $168,000. The latter bid from Messrs. Towers, of this city. They are practical printers; have an office here; are known to be men of capabilities in their profession; able and responsible, and who are willing to take this contract now at their original bid. Their bid was $30,000 less than Mr. Rives's. Now, the question I desire to propound is, why should the contract be assigned to Gideon & Co. and Donelson & Armstrong at Rives's bid, when there were eight bidders lower than Rives? and when Towers will do the same work at $30,000 less than the price which the Printing Committee are to pay the proprietors of the Union and Republic? and why should the committee give the work to a Whig and Democratic editor at Rives's bid, who was a bona fide bidder, without first tendering it to Rives?

Mr. GORMAN. Rives deducts sixty-nine per cent.

Mr. ORR. Mr. Rives proposed to deduct a certain amount, but it does not reduce the amount I stated his bid to be—$196,000 is the net amount of his bid after making the deduction the gentleman speaks of. Here is a report which was made out by the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House upon the subject of the biddings. The aggregate net amount of Mr. Rives's bid is $196,000. Rives concedes himself that Towers's bid was $30,000 under his. Another point to which I desire to call particular attention is this: The communication addressed by Donelson & Armstrong and by Gideon & Co., in which they say they will accept the proposition of the committee with one qualification, is calculated, it seems to me, to involve the committee and the House in an expenditure much larger than they might imagine. They say that for the extra numbers beyond 20,000, where Rives proposed to take off sixty-nine per cent. for the press-work, they must be allowed to retain that sixty-nine per cent.; that applies to the Patent Office report; 100,000 copies will probably be ordered by the House, and 60,000 by the Senate, making in all 160,000. I undertake to say if the committee determine to strike a contract with Donelson & Armstrong at their prices, that the increased cost of the Patent Office report alone under that contract will be $60,000 greater than it would be even under Rives's bid; so it really, if that is to be conceded, swells up the aggregate of Rives's bid to $256,000, and makes the Government pay the enormous sum of $169,000 more than A. Boyd Hamilton undertook the same work for. When my friend from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] shall take the floor, and reply to these matters, I hope he will give the House a satisfactory exposition of these interrogatories which I have thrown out.

With the indulgence of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE], I will make another remark. I indorse fully the sentiment expressed by my honorable friend from Mississippi [Mr. BROWN] as to the Southern Press, which is said to be, and is perhaps truly, the organ of a portion of the Democratic party of this House; and I would vote, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BROWN] stated, against the Southern Press, because I believe whenever a newspaper is unable to support itself at the seat of Government or elsewhere without relying upon the public Treasury, and without bounties from the Government, it ought to go by the board. I am, therefore, opposed to giving this printing to any partisan editor to sustain partisans. I sustain therefore the remark made by my friend from Mississippi [Mr. BROWN] upon that point. As to the Executive printing which the Southern Press was entitled to last summer and fall, I think that the Cabinet treated that paper most illegally, and I would have no objections to seeing it get such printing as by general law it was entitled to by having a greater number of subscribers than other papers here. There is a general law providing for certain printing from the Departments to be done in the newspaper having the largest circulation, and the Southern Press was justly entitled to it in that way. If I was the editor of that paper, I would sue out a writ of mandamus, and compel the officers to comply with the law, in conformity with their oaths. Having said this much, and returning my thanks to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] for his kindness, I yield the floor.

Mr. GORMAN. I pledge myself now to the House to show that Towers's bid, taking into consideration Mr. Rives's deduction of sixty-nine per cent., is $15,000 more than Rives's bid. I pledge my word of honor to show that, upon the very next bid, Towers never made a single solitary cent of deduction, and Rives made sixty-nine per cent.

Mr. ORR. Let me correct my friend, as he was beginning to correct me before I fell into an error. Let me correct him before he falls into one. I have conversed with both of these parties within the last twenty-four hours. Towers's statement was, that he was willing to do the work; and Rives's statement was, that Towers could not do the work at the price he bid; but at the prices which he (Rives) bid for it, he would be able to make something handsome. That is the statement of Mr. Rives.

Mr. GORMAN. If Rives got the census, he would. That is his statement; and it is the statement before this House, and upon the paper presented to you, and referred to the Committee on Printing. I now state that Rives's bid is $196,000, Flinn's $225,000, and Farnham's $186,000, for two classes, when Rives's bid is only $196,000 for five classes. The gentleman could just as well state that as to have stated the balance.

Mr. FLORENCE resumed. I hold in my hand a little paper which, no doubt, has been placed upon the desks of all the members, which contains the aggregate amount of the bids for all the classes of public printing for the Thirty-second Congress. If gentlemen will refer to this little piece of paper, they will be able to inform themselves of the comparative amount for which each of these bidders offered to do the public work. I will read it:

Aggregate amount of gross bids for all the Classes of the Public Printing for the Thirty-second Congress.

Bidders.	Bills.	Reports.	Journal.	Ex. Docs.	Mis. Docs.
Baptiste .....	$4,136	$13,855	$3,183	$106,651	$8,611

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I think there is an error in the statement, for it makes Rives's bid for the Executive documents over $207,000, while the official reports of this House show that it is only $152,000. You give him more for the Executive documents than he offered to do the whole work.

Mr. FLORENCE. That is not an error. According to the official report of the bids it will be found that this amount is correct. By reference to table No. 4, of the report—class 4, the Executive documents—it will be seen that the gross bid of Mr. Rives is $207,675. The amount to which the gentleman refers, is the amount of Mr. Rives's net bid, after deducting some $54,979 to cover the sixty-nine per cent. reduction on all documents of which more than twenty thousand copies shall be ordered.

If there is any errors in the statement I have read, the Committee on Public Printing may now have an opportunity to correct them. I do not desire to state to this House anything which is not the fact. I happened accidentally to see this. I took it for granted that it was submitted here "semi-officially," and that it was printed correctly, or I would not have presented it to the House. All I desire to do, is to present to the consideration of the House the facts of the case, that members of Congress may vote intelligently upon the subject, which has claimed so much of their time and attention during the present session.

Mr. GORMAN. How did you get this statement?

Mr. FLORENCE. It was lying upon the desk. I have run through this table, and it has required so much time that I will give up the figures, and talk of facts, if figures are not facts. I wish only to make a few remarks, and then "get out of the way" for other gentlemen who have an anxiety to address the House upon the subject of the public printing, the system of awarding contracts, or, which is more important, and above and beyond either in merit, the mode of securing promptness and excellence in Government printing, by the establishment of a national printing office.

The following is the official report of the net bids, which gentlemen can contrast with what I have just read, and see which is right and which is wrong:

From the foregoing statement it appears that A. Boyd Hamilton is the lowest bidder in each of the classes of the printing for the Thirty-second Congress.

I here submit, although the truth of the statement is denied by my friend from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN,] the chairman of the Committee on Printing. But to the statement. Let Hamilton be heard in his own defense:

PUBLIC PRINTING.—Notice has been given to the House of Representatives that the following resolution, which was freely circulated yesterday, will be offered this morning, April 13, 1852:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing enter into a contract with Donelson & Armstrong to do so much of the printing ordered by the House of Representatives for the present Congress as may be necessary to remedy any neglect or delay of the contractor, A. Boyd Hamilton, to execute the work ordered by this Congress, and also with Gideon & Co., to do so much of the printing ordered by the Senate as may be necessary for the like purpose, such contracts to be on such terms as the said committee and the contractors may agree upon and shall be just.

The contractor has never received notice from the Committee on Printing that he has "neglected or delayed" any of the work intrusted to him. He cannot, therefore, more satisfactorily refute the allegation than by the following statement:

I. That all the bills and joint resolutions of both Houses of Congress are printed and delivered; and he holds receipts for the same.

II. That all the reports of committees, except three adverse ones, are printed and delivered; and he holds receipts for the same.

III. That the Journals of both Houses are ready for press so far as he has copy placed in his hands, and all is in proof to the first days of April.

IV. All Executive documents, of every character, are complete, or partially so, so that they might be delivered in a short time, except some eight or ten, heretofore considered of no public importance.

V. All the current work in this class is delivered, and the contractor holds receipts for the same.

The President's message and documents are running through the press at the rate of one hundred pages a day. This work will make a volume of over two thousand pages; and, to give an idea of its relative bulk, the contractor begs to say, that the following table will explain to the members of both Houses its magnitude:

Comparison of the extent of the printing of the President's message and documents for the last twelve years.

Date.	No. of pages.	No. of extra copies ordered.	Printers.
1840—1841..	541	-	Blair & Rives.
1842—1843..	767	10,000	Gales & Seaton.
1844—1845..	702	3,500	Blair & Rives.

1846—1847..	1,618	25,000	Contract.
1849—1850..	1,789	20,000	Contract.
1852—	over 2,000	25,000	Contract.

In addition, the regular number of copies are now greater than ever; and maps and plates, unknown to the early messages, are introduced.

1842-'3.—Gales & Seaton, printers, the number of extra pages printed were..... 7,670,000
In 1852.—The extra pages will be about..... 500,000,000

The contractor has invested more than $50,000 to fulfill his contract; he has the best and only establishment in this city for the prompt execution of the work; he has one hundred operatives in his employment, practical and experienced persons, and he is fully prepared at all points to execute the public printing; he made his bids in good faith, at low rates; he has not met with the consideration due to one who professes, through his economy and labor, to work cheaply for the public—on the contrary, he has encountered an opposition as unjust and ungenerous as ruinous. The very economy of his bids has been alleged as a crime. His means have been slandered, and his credit impaired.

In the earliest days of this session, a motion was made to take from his contract the printing of the census, for the avowed purpose of patronizing a party press. This measure failing, the same object is now sought in another form, by the union of elements otherwise hostile, that thus, out of the ruins of the contractor, Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong on the one hand, and Messrs. Gideon & Co. on the other, may be enriched.

The contractors respectfully begs to call the particular attention of Congress to the fact, that if the contemplated procedure prevails, his work is to be let out to the new contractors at prices greatly advanced; and that, under a strict construction of the law, this excess would have to be charged to the contractor and his sureties. This fact is studiously kept out of view. The contractor protests against his being made the means of enriching any gentlemen. While it is right that Congress should consult its predilections in bestowing patronage out of its own legitimate means, every just mind will recoil from the deliberate attempt to construct the necessary patronage out of the ruins of innocent individuals.

In other respects, also, the contractor has just cause of complaint.

His only alleged deficiency has been that, when navigation was closed and his heaviest paper could not be forwarded for the early printing, some of it slightly varied from the standard. For this an oppressive remedy was applied by withholding ten per cent. of all his accounts; not ten per cent. on the price of paper alone, but also on that for his printing and other work; and, in many cases, he has been charged this deduction on the work of others.

Again, after presenting, and with much labor getting his accounts approved, often losing days in the effort to get a single signature, harassed, and his time squandered, by innumerable vexatious delays, he has in the end encountered an empty Treasury, by the exhaustion of the contingent fund of both Senate and House, and has thus been driven for many weeks to cash his admitted accounts, by sale at usurious rates, in order to obtain money to pay for labor in his office, and obtain material to perform other parts of his contract.

The contractor respectfully submits that there is a mutuality in every contract. The party who does his work is entitled to his pay, and the party who does not so pay, breaks faith. If, in this case, the contractor had in truth "neglected or delayed" work, he might well have been excused by the "neglect and delay" in the performance of this dependent and cardinal covenant.

The contractor respectfully represents that he is fully prepared and anxious to fulfill his contract. He asks but justice and fair play. The contractor has had no notice of the action of the committee, if a committee has been duly chosen by the House, as provided by law; nor notified of any alleged default; no opportunity for explanation or argument has been afforded, and he has first learned their action by its publicity in the House. The veriest criminal is informed, at a right, of his alleged offense. He is entitled to a hearing and counsel. But in this case, it is sought to sweep away the vested rights of a contract without notice, hearing, or specification.

The contractor respectfully appeals to the justice of the House, and solicits their protection from a course of procedure so repugnant to the institutions and spirit of the country.

A. BOYD HAMILTON.

WASHINGTON, April 13, 1852.

I repeat, sir, by Hamilton's statement I find that he has invested over $50,000 to enable him to fulfill this contract. I know that he has in his employment as good compositors and practical printers as there are in the country. I have the honor of an intimate acquaintance with a number of those gentlemen, and I conceive that it is slandering them to allege, as was alleged here yesterday, that this work has not been done as it should be. I have before me evidences to the contrary, and I feel it to be my duty to say here, upon this floor, that I believe—indeed, sir, I know—the gentlemen employed by Mr. Hamilton, are, in point of skill, ability, and intelligence, in the pursuit of their profession, quite as competent to the entire and faithful performance of the duties of their vocation as any practical printers in the Union. I speak, sir, from a personal knowledge of these gentlemen. Many of them—perhaps the greater proportion—are residents of the county of Philadelphia, which locality of our good and patriotic "old Keystone" State I have the honor to represent upon the floor of this House. Some of them—the majority I am inclined to believe—are constituents of mine, although temporarily residing here. I am proud of their acquaintance. I esteem them highly, without reference to their party-political bias. Indeed, sir, I am proud of all of my constituency. They are an honest, intelligent, thrifty, and industrious class of citizens.

I may ambitiously say, in the language of a distinguished statesman, now deceased—the eccentric but eloquent John Randolph—"that such constituents no man ever had." I desire to represent all of them faithfully upon this floor. My only ambition is, to perform my duty as a faithful public servant in their cause and behalf, in the councils of the nation. Their interest is my interest. While I have the honor and privilege of raising my voice, or of occupying a seat in this House, my best efforts will be directed to promote the "greatest good of the greatest number" of those I represent, and of the people generally; so that, when I am called upon to give up the honorable trust confided to me, I may hear, on all hands, from all classes and parties of those I represent—indeed, sir, from all, "without distinction of party,"—for I hold it to be the duty of a Representative implicitly to "obey the will of his constituents,"—that I may hear, sir, the welcome, the soul-inspiring, the labor-rewarding shout of the masses at my home, when I shall again appear before them, of "Well done, good and faithful servant." I seek for, I aspire to, no other or higher honor than this.

But, sir, I ask pardon for this digression from the subject under discussion. To resume, Mr.

Now, a word or two more, and I will conclude. It seems to me that, in justice to the contractor, so long as he executes the printing within any reasonable time, he should at least have an opportunity of saving himself from inevitable ruin. I find, by this statement, which was laid upon our desks yesterday, and which, to complete the record—for it will occupy too much of my time to read it—

Speaker. There are more than a hundred operatives at present employed in the public printing office. Take this work from the contractor, turn these one hundred men into the street, ruin the contractor, if you will, but for what purpose? To get the work better done? What assurance have you of it? Have you any assurance that if you give the work to the gentlemen who have been named by the Committee on Printing, it will be better done or sooner done than it would be by the public printer? Have the Joint Committee on Printing, in the contract they have made with these gentlemen, fixed the time within which documents shall be furnished to the House? If they have not—if no such assurance has been given, what are we to gain? What is the country to gain? What is to be accomplished by turning A. Boyd Hamilton into the street, and closing up his printing office?

I have myself ascertained, from personal observation, or rather investigation, that the public printer has press power equal to 1,500,000 pages per day, and that he is now putting an additional press into operation. This proves to my mind that he intends to do the work, and that he bid for it in good faith. I consider the opposition to his continuance in the performance of the work to be almost, if not quite, persecution. It has impaired his credit; it has prevented him from operating as effectually and efficiently as he would have done; and hence has retarded him in the desirable accomplishment of a more speedy and faithful performance of his contract. This is a reasonable and a fair conclusion. I asserted yesterday, upon this floor, and I now repeat it, that a paper manufacturer in Philadelphia, induced no doubt by the fact that there had been a doubt thrown in the early part of the session, upon the capability of the public printer to fulfill his contract, had written to me to know what situation the public printing was in, and whether Hamilton's credit was good, based, beyond a question, upon his contract for the performance of the public printing. This gentleman was willing to sell paper to Hamilton upon a fair credit, if he was assured that he would proceed to fulfill his contract, and that he would be continued in the execution of the public work by the House. Well, sir, if gentlemen are not to have credit who offer to do the public work, and if the contract system is to be continued, you build up a privileged class in this community, and in this nation, that I am not willing to sustain by my vote in this House. It will require, as was said by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN,] yesterday, a millionaire to come here, and submit a contract for the public printing.

Mr. POLK. Who is he?

Mr. FLORENCE. I do not know. But the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] said yesterday, if I understood him, that a man ought not to attempt to do the public printing, unless he had capital; that a man could not pretend to do it upon reasonable business credit.

Mr. GORMAN. Unless he had capital, I said.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, a millionaire has some capital.

Mr. GORMAN. I said that the public printer could not perform his contract and pay the losses he would incur under it unless he had a millionaire at his back.

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, sir, it requires credit—reasonable business, commercial credit. I do not accuse the members of the Committee on Printing—God forbid that I should!—of any improper motives; but the fact stares us in the face, that, from the first moment this contract was entered into up to this very hour, there seems to have been a systematic detraction of the public printer; he, and indeed the nation having heard it universally, proclaimed that he was unable to perform his contract, notwithstanding every fact is adduced to the contrary.

I have not time, however much I may have the inclination, to follow the subject further. My time, I regret to say, is nearly out, or I would refer more at length to the advantages to the country which, I conceive, would be obtained by the establishment of a national printing office. It would elevate and dignify the industrial labor of the nation; it would insure to those who toil—the “toiling millions,” sir, in the language of the resolution of the Printers’ Union, which I have read to the House—their true position in society, and a fair compensation for labor in every useful occupation. This is the “good time coming,” which I desire may soon arrive. I am, I am free to acknowledge it, in favor of that kind of legislation which will promote the happiness of the masses of society, especially of the working class. But I am admonished, sir, that I have but a moment longer. I hope, earnestly hope, the subject of a national printing office may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that they will, at an early day,—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. POLK. I am very sorry to interrupt the gentleman from Pennsylvania in the progress of remarks so interesting to himself, and I presume to the House also. It is not my purpose or object to discuss the question of public printing. I do not desire, nor will I so far forget my allegiance to Democracy—my allegiance to principle—as to follow or answer the argument which was illegitimately used this morning by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] when he warned us that men have a power in the South, and that they will exercise that power, to control the Democratic party. Sir, when he comes here to tell the Democratic party, in whose soul, I believe, virtue dwells—when he comes to tell us that his party in the South will exercise a controlling influence, I say to him that he may form a Union party with the Free-Soilers. I say to him, and to other gentlemen, that I have been a Democrat as long as they have. If they intend—coming either from the North or the South, I care not which—to exercise an influence which will destroy the Democratic party; if they intend to perform such an outrage as that upon the party, I want them to proclaim it like men, and I shall be ready, as I am at this moment, to uphold the pillars of the Constitution, and to denounce those that prowl upon the outskirts of the camp, be they who they may. I have endeavored to be conciliatory; I have endeavored to harmonize our party, as far as any expression of sentiment upon my part could do it; but do not ask me to fraternize, to coalesce, and to sympathize with men who stand ready to stab the party, and bring about its dissolution. When the gentleman from Mississippi makes this threat upon us, he must understand that there is a ponderous arm in the party, that is for the safety of the nation, and that that ponderous arm will be found to battle against him.

But I am diverging into a discussion of matters that, I suppose, ought to be discussed in caucus, and I shall therefore abandon them; I do not consider it proper to introduce any of these irritating questions into Congress.

But about this question of public printing—is there a member here—and I will pause for a reply—is there a single member here, even the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE,] in whose peculiar keeping Mr. Hamilton seems to have placed himself—

Mr. FLORENCE. Oh no, not at all, sir.

Mr. POLK. If the gentleman is not his keeper, I am glad of it, because I think he would be very badly taken care of.

Mr. FLORENCE. I only desire that the House should arrive at a proper conclusion, and that the public printing should be properly executed. I have no especial partiality for Mr. Hamilton. I only wish that he may have justice done him—nothing more. This is the reason why, almost without conversation with Mr. Hamilton, I have entered into this debate—indeed, I may say, into his defense. I do not, however, assume to be his defender. I am for the establishment of a national printing office.

Mr. POLK. Is that a public document which you hold in your hand, or is it the work of the public printer?

Mr. FLORENCE. By accident, I have this sacred book [the Bible] in my hand, having brought it to my seat from the Speaker's table, this morning, for perusal. I think it would be very much better if some of us would consult it more than we do. If it would not be improper, I might, perhaps, read to the House a passage from it that would be pertinent to this occasion.

Mr. POLK. I would say to the gentleman, in the language of Scripture, “Go and sin no more.” [Laughter.]

Mr. FLORENCE. Let me, in all candor, sincerity, and humility inform the gentleman—and I do so with a full knowledge of my accountability to the “Giver of all good,” that exalted Being who holds the destinies of our great Republic “in the hollow of his hands”—that I never sit down to the perusal of this sacred book but with pleasure, nor rise from it but with profit and advantage. My friendly advice to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] is, “Go thou and do likewise.”

Mr. POLK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi, in answer to a remark made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RANTOUL,] said: “Upon the great issues which unite us as Democrats, we work together.” Now, I wish to know if the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BROWN] stands this hour, shoulder to shoulder, with a man from Massachusetts who would steal our negroes if he had a chance? I say this, and take the full responsibility that follows it. I wish to know of the gentleman from Mississippi whether this be true? The gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me to say that his opinions are upon the records of the country, as proclaimed in his speeches, and he will therefore allow me to put the question to the gentleman from Mississippi, whether he to-day stands side by side with the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BROWN. I said yesterday, and I repeat it to-day, that upon the old issues of the Democratic party, I do recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts; but I need not answer the gentleman when he asks me whether I coalesce with that gentleman upon the question of slavery. He knows very well, without asking, and without my answering, that I do not.

Mr. POLK. The gentleman says he does not coalesce with the gentleman from Massachusetts upon the question of slavery. Why, sir, those two gentlemen are found voting together in this House upon questions which agitate the harmony, and, if you choose, the power of the Democratic party.

Mr. RANTOUL. I wish to interrupt the gentleman, not because I think it necessary upon my own account to notice the remarks he has made, but because it is right that the House should be informed upon this historical fact relating to the position of parties and members upon this floor. I therefore ask the gentleman to produce the record upon which he founds his charge against me.

Mr. POLK. What are my charges?

Mr. RANTOUL. I understood the gentleman to say that I stood upon the record in a peculiar position, of which I am not at all conscious.

Mr. POLK. I will answer the gentleman's interrogatories plainly. If he claims to be a Democrat, I claim to act not in the same fold, not in the same party with the gentleman. I say to him, that I understand he was elected to this House as a Free-Soiler; and I believe that any gentleman who would prostitute himself to such a miserable sympathy with Abolitionists, would steal a negro.

Mr. RANTOUL. The last remark of the gentleman I shall not notice; but that preceding it, which I suppose he stated as a matter of fact, I think I ought to notice. The gentleman says he understands I come here elected as a Free-Soiler by the Free-Soil party, if I understand his words. Now, sir, I come here nominated unanimously by the old line Democratic party of my district in the fullest caucus that has been held for many years for the purpose of making a nomination. I come here unanimously nominated, in the first place, by a convention composed of delegates from the different towns; and in the second place, unanimously by a mass convention to which every Democrat in the district was invited. I desire, in the next place, to say, that I have never accepted the nomination of a Free-Soil party in my life; but have kept strictly within the old Democratic organization. The Free-Soil party have voted for me, and I am proud to receive their votes.

Mr. POLK. Oh, yes; I do not doubt that.

Mr. DUNHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. POLK. I cannot yield further.

Mr. RANTOUL. I desire to say further; first, particularly to the gentleman from Tennessee, and next, to any other gentleman who may choose to assume the same position with him, that he does not desire to hold fellowship with me upon this floor as a Democrat, that it is a matter for his own option entirely. It is not a matter for me to decide whether he and I shall act in the same political party, or continue on board the same political ship. If he decides that we shall not remain together, it is for him to step out of the party whenever he shall please; for I shall certainly not step out of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. POLK. I imagine the gentleman will not be allowed that privilege; for they will order him out.

Mr. FOWLER. I rise to a question of order. [Laughter.] I am extremely sorry to do it; but I take the ground that this is all out of order, and I appeal to the Chair to sustain the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that the debate is not strictly in order.

Mr. POLK. There is no man whose advice I would sooner follow than that of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. NABERS. The only purpose I have in rising is this: My colleague [Mr. BROWN] makes the remark that, upon the old issues of the Democratic party, himself and the gentleman from Massachusetts stand together. Now, I desire to ask my colleague, with the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] whether the old Democratic party issues do not require a strict observance of the Constitution, and if there is not a clause in that Constitution guarantying to the people of the South the recapture of their fugitive slaves? I repeat, it is not one of the great issues of the Democratic party, that "No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due?" Is my colleague [Mr. BROWN] willing to recognize any man as a Democrat who, under any pretext whatsoever, justifies the non-enforcement of the above provision of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. POLK. Right there, upon that point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must arrest this discussion as out of order, unless permitted by the unanimous consent of the House.

[Cries of "Leave!" "Leave!" ]

Mr. FOWLER. I insist upon my point of order.

Mr. RANTOUL. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. NABERS] has inquired whether his colleague [Mr. BROWN] and myself stand upon the same ground in regard to the strict observance of the Constitution, and especially that clause of the Constitution which provides for the delivery of fugitive slaves. Now I ask the gentleman to allow me to answer that question.

[Mr. RANTOUL handed to the Reporter the following memorandum of the reply which he had wished to make, when he was prevented by the enforcement of the rules.

Before the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BROWN] can tell whether he agrees with me on these points, he must first know my views upon them. I insist upon the "strict observance of the Constitution," not in unmeaning words, but in fact. If there is any doctrine fundamental to the creed of the Democratic party, it is that the CONSTITUTION BE STRICTLY CONSTRUED. By the 10th amendment, "powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

The third clause of the 2d section of article 4th of the Constitution, just quoted by the gentleman, does not, in terms, grant one scintilla of power to the Federal Government. It does not, by any implication, necessary, or even unnecessary, grant any power, any more than the first clause of the same section, touching immunities of citizens. At the time it was adopted, there is no reason to suspect that any one dreamed that it contained a grant of power. It was borrowed from the ordinance of 1787, in which instrument nobody has yet pretended that it contained a grant of power. The fugitive law, pretended to be based on this clause, is a naked usurpation of power, without one syllable in the Constitution to justify it—a gross, palpable, flagrant violation of the Constitution, which we have sworn to support.

Such a usurpation, a Hamiltonian Federalist may justify. A State-Rights Democrat cannot. This I should have argued, if the previous question had not been employed, last week, "to quiet agitation," cutting off all debate.]

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANTOUL] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] allow the Chair to say that this course of remark cannot be indulged, except by the unanimous consent of the House.

[Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!" ]

Mr. HOUSTON. I object.

Mr. BROWN. I ask that I may be allowed to answer the interrogatory of my colleague, [Mr. NABERS.]

The SPEAKER. It is objected to on the right and on the left of the Chair. The Chair was disposed to indulge a very wide latitude in the discussion, until admonished by gentlemen upon all sides, that the discussion was out of order, and demanding that the rules of the House should be enforced.

Mr. BROWN. I have but one remark to make, and that shall be in order. It appears to have been in order for my colleague [Mr. NABERS] to ask a question, but it is not in order for me to answer it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi intend to cast an imputation upon the Chair?

Mr. BROWN. I simply mean to state what was the fact.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman is out of order.

[Mr. BROWN requests the Reporter to say, that if he had been allowed to respond to Mr. NABERS and Mr. POLK, he would have said: The time was when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANTOUL] was accepted as a sound Democrat. Mr. Polk appointed him United States district attorney for Massachusetts, and thus indorsed him to me and to the nation. He was a Democrat then on the old issues. If he has changed his opinions, I have yet to learn it; and if he has not, he is a Democrat on these issues yet. If the bank charter, or protective tariff, distribution, wasteful appropriations, or the repeal of the Sub-Treasury, any one or all of them shall be proposed, I will not reject the aid of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Free-Soiler though he be] in upholding the Democratic side of these questions. These were the issues—the old issues—when the honored brother of the gentleman from Tennessee appointed ROBERT RANTOUL district attorney. On these he was sound; we all trusted him then, and if he has not changed his opinions, I know of no reason why we should not trust him now.

On the new issues—those growing out of the slavery strife and the territorial acquisitions—there is no bond of sympathy, no affinity between the gentleman from Massachusetts and myself. On all these issues, direct and collateral, that gentleman and myself are as wide apart as the poles. This the gentlemen from Tennessee and Mississippi know full well.

If the gentlemen on both sides of the House who passed the compromise are to be trusted, the slavery question and all the incidental issues growing out of it have been settled; they were all compromised; and it was but the other day that we passed a finality resolution, which meant, as I supposed, that there was an end of the main issue and all its incidents. Now we have it dug up, resurrected, and dragged in here again, and that, too, by its own best friends. I hope we shall be done with this matter.

If fidelity to the Democratic party means that I must vote large and fat jobs of printing to Donelson & Armstrong, and if I can only signalize my fidelity by voting other large and fat jobs to the Republic, I must say to the gentlemen who are croaking "coalition!" "coalition!" that in this view I am not faithful, and never mean to be.

I would as soon have the aid of the gentleman from Massachusetts in severing the unholy bonds which unite the Union and Republic as I would in pulling down protection or upholding the independent treasury. When a good work has to be done, I will accept aid from any quarter.

It is a weak invention of the coalitionists to raise this hue and cry, and expect thereby to divert public attention from the fact that they have fastened the Union to one teat of the National Treasury, and then, by way of quieting the Republic, giving it another and a better one. Cry coalition as much as you please, the people will inquire by whom and for what reason these things were done.]

Mr. POLK. I think I can arrange this matter between the Chair and the gentleman from Mississippi. As the remainder of the hour belongs to me, I am willing that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BROWN] should answer his colleague.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee will suspend. The gentleman from Mississippi, if he had marked the proceedings, would have noticed the fact that the Chair was disposed to indulge the debate to an almost unlimited extent; but he was admonished by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. FOWLER,] and again by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] that the debate was out of order, and called upon by them to enforce the rules of the House. He endeavored to do so, for a long time without success; and he shall continue to endeavor to perform his duty, whatever may be the opinion of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANTOUL. I ask the gentleman from Mississippi—

The SPEAKER. By the unanimous consent of the House, the Chair will be happy to hear the gentleman.

Mr. POLK. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts again explain his position?

Mr. RANTOUL. The explanation I proposed to make— [Cries of "Order!" "Order!" and confusion in the Hall.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot allow this debate to go on. The Chair calls gentlemen to order.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the gentleman have leave to proceed.

Mr. GENTRY. You cannot take the floor from my colleague [Mr. POLK] without his leave.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] moves that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RANTOUL] have leave to proceed with his remarks. The Chair will state what the rule is upon that subject.

Mr. McMULLIN. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is upon a question of order. He was proceeding to say, that if the House agree to give the gentleman leave to proceed with his remarks, as a matter of course, it must be done under the rule, and that rule does not allow this latitude of debate. In order, therefore, to reach the object sought by this motion, there must necessarily be the unanimous consent of the House. The Chair will now hear the question of order made by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. McMULLIN. My point of order is, that my colleague [Mr. LETCHER] had not obtained the floor from the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. POLK,] and, therefore, had no right to submit the motion.

Mr. POLK. I am for harmony in the House, and in that spirit, I will even forego the privilege I have of continuing my remarks. I move that the whole subject do lie upon the table.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

Mr. CABLE, of Ohio. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not yet commenced.

Mr. CABLE. Would it be in order to move to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The motion has been made to lay the subject of the public printing upon the table; and, in the opinion of the Chair, that is a privileged motion.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to know what will become of my bill, if the subject is laid upon the table?

The SPEAKER. That will be for the House to determine. The Chair cannot anticipate the action of that body.

Mr. WOODWARD. The motion is, to lay the whole subject upon the table now. I desire to know what is meant by this motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the proposition is, to lay the report upon the table.

Mr. WOODWARD. Will it include the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. POLK. I understand it carries with it everything connected with the matter.

The SPEAKER. It does.

The yeas and nays were then ordered.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole upon the special order.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order, as there is a privileged motion pending before the House. The motion to lay upon the table, is one of those privileged motions which must be put, in the order in which they are made.

Mr. MARSHALL. I should like to know if the motion to lay upon the table, is regarded by the Chair as a privileged motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does so regard it. If the gentleman will indulge the Chair, he will turn to the rules upon the subject.

Mr. MARSHALL. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts what the practice of the House has been, in reference to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] but I am disposed to decide that it is in order, at this stage of the proceedings, to move to go into the Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union.

Mr. MARSHALL. I, then, make that motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand tellers upon that motion.

Mr. POLK. Has the motion to go into Committee of the Whole precedence of the motion to lay upon the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so decided.

Mr. POLK. I appeal from the decision of the chair.

Mr. OLDS. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. POLK. I withdraw the appeal.

Tellers were then ordered, upon the demand of Mr. JONES, of Tennessee; and Messrs. Houston and Fowler were appointed.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. MARSHALL, and the tellers reported—ayes 90, noes 39.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HIBBARD in the chair.)

HOMESTEAD BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The first business before the committee is House bill No. 7, for the promotion of agriculture, and for other purposes, and upon that question the gentleman from New York [Mr. JENKINS] has the floor.

Mr. JENKINS spoke during an hour; and in the course of his remarks he deprecated the notion that the public lands must all be voted away; spoke in favor of the present system of disposing of the public domain, by which it can be purchased for one dollar and a quarter an acre. He contended that it has worked well, and that no scheme of speculation has successfully competed with it. He denied the right of Congress to give the lands away for the purpose designed by the bill, and argued to show that the operations of this measure would not be productive of the benefits claimed by its friends. [Mr. J.'s speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. NEWTON obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. CHANDLER, who moved that the committee rise.

The question was put, and the motion agreed to. The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman (Mr. HIBBARD) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration House bill No. 7, being a bill to encourage agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and all other branches of industry, by granting every man who is at the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres of land out of the public domain, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation of the same, for the period herein specified, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. ORR. I move that the House—

Mr. MOLONY. I rise to a privileged question.

Mr. ORR. So do I rise to a privileged question. I move that the House do now adjourn. I will, however, yield to the gentleman.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. MOLONY. In looking over the Journal of Monday, I see that upon a motion to suspend the rules to enable the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SMITH] to introduce a resolution in relation to the census printing, I am recorded in the negative. I voted in the affirmative. I ask to have the Journal corrected.

Mr. STANLY. I ask whether the gentleman alludes to the Journal or the Globe?

Mr. MOLONY. The Globe.

Mr. STANLY. Then it is sufficient to call attention to the fact—

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the same mistake occurs upon the Journal. It can now only be corrected by unanimous consent.

No objection was made, and the Journal was accordingly ordered to be corrected.

Mr. ORR. I now urge my motion.

Mr. HOUSTON. I appeal to the gentleman from South Carolina to withdraw his motion.

Mr. ORR. The gentleman can accomplish his purpose some other time.

Mr. HOUSTON. As I cannot persuade the House to take up the business on the Speaker's table, I do hope the House will allow Senate bill No. 271 to be taken up, for it is very important that it should be acted upon.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object to taking up the bill out of its order.

Mr. ORR. I now insist upon the motion to adjourn.

The question was put, and the motion agreed to, and

The House adjourned till twelve o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL AND POLITICAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. MANGUM. Mr. President, I indicated, yesterday, a purpose to ask, by the courtesy of the Senate, that I might be permitted to speak on a matter which, I am aware, is not strictly in order this morning. I hope that the consent of the Senate will be given.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator will proceed unless objected to.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANGUM. Mr. President, I have no speech to make, in the ordinary acceptance of that term. I desire to make a few remarks touching, as briefly as I may, upon a few points which, in fact, are mainly in reference to my own personal position, which, I am aware, is of little consequence to anybody but myself—a topic on which most men are supposed to speak fluently, and but few wisely. I shall be as brief as I can.

It is known to the Senate, that, during the past winter, my health has been, I may say, bad, but at best very variable; and I have not participated at all in the business of the Senate, except occasionally and very slightly—still less have I participated in any arrangements or intrigues touching presidential questions, or anything of that kind. Yet I find, humble an individual as I am, that I am made the subject of newspaper speculations, represented variously and conflictingly at different points. However small may be the taper which I hold, I am unwilling that every wind should play upon it and extinguish it. I desire to be understood correctly.

It has been my habit, throughout life, on all occasions of this character, never to be doubted; and I desire, if I shall succeed in explaining myself perfectly, that I may here not be doubted on these subjects. In regard to the next Presidency, I shall, very probably, stand prepared to support the nominee of the Whig Convention. I profess to be a party man, and shall act upon that principle; I shall yield, as I was compelled to do, four years ago, against my own judgment, if necessary, against all my own inclinations, to support, as I did then, most strenuously, the nominee of the Whig Convention.

But while I shall probably do this, I have my preference. I had the same four years ago; and that preference implies no dereliction of principle upon my part, nor any departure from or modification whatsoever of the principles that I have steadily maintained, for now nearly thirty years, in both branches of the National Legislature. I know, if I go in a particular direction, that we have conservatives both North and South of what is esteemed the peculiar institution of the South, who imagine that a man is unfaithful to them—is untrue to them, if he does not happen to tread in the path indicated by them. I am old enough, if not wise enough, to act upon the suggestions of my own understanding; and, wise or unwise, I shall probably do so without fear, favor, or affection, reward or hope of reward—unintimidated by the menaces of power—unseduced by the blandishments of flattery.

Upon this interesting question, I unhappily am informed, and believe, that I differ as regards my first choice, from a portion of the constituency whom I have the honor to represent. It has not been an uncommon thing for me, in the course of my public service, to differ profoundly, upon several occasions, from my constituents. They have been forbearing and kind, and that is the ground of many griefs and regrets when my sense of public duty impelled me to such difference. Perhaps the boldest actions of my public life have been those in regard to which these differences have arisen, and have, in the long run, given me whatever little strength I may have had at home. I shall continue to pursue the course that my judgment shall indicate as the best for their interest, safety, happiness, and prosperity, during the short time that the relations now subsisting between myself and my constituents shall continue.

My purpose is to retire from public life. I am a candidate for nothing; nor do I expect to be ever again a candidate for anything. During nearly thirty years of service in both branches of the National Legislature, I have never sought employment under any Executive, under any power. I should always feel a sort of humiliation in giving up the kind confidence of a whole State to hold any office, however exalted and illustrious, by the feeble tenure of the will of one man. I have never sought it for myself or for mine. I shall never do so. I will also say that I have never felt a sense of humiliation in appealing to my constituents, the people of my own State; and, if successful, that success has invariably produced upon me the impression of a sense of my unworthiness or inability to render this service compatible with the degree of confidence which has been reposed in me.

I should not feel now any sort of humiliation to appeal to them for any place of honor, trust, or profit, if they had it in their bestowal, though I am no candidate, and, in all probability, never shall be again, even for the favor of a people who are nearer and dearer to my own heart than any others; and I trust the whole American family are near to me.

I understand, from evidences which I cannot question, that a majority of the people of North Carolina prefer the present President for the succession, as their first choice. That is not exactly my condition. I stand where I stood four years ago. I prefer another as my first choice. This diversity of opinion between my constituents and myself, can lead, I trust, to no results that may be detrimental to the public interests. I know perfectly well that the avowal of this preference on my part will grate harshly on the ears of the friends of the present Executive, both here and elsewhere. But, according to the custom of my whole life, I feel it to be my duty to speak truly my honest and sincere convictions. I will speak even unpleasant things to my constituents, if I believe the public interests require it.

Sir, I will further say, that I believe that the people of North Carolina are so averse to all the agitations that have existed here upon a particular subject, and to all the agitations of a local and sectional character of every kind whatsoever, that they would very reluctantly bestow their support upon any one who either directly or indirectly encourages such agitation. In that respect we do not differ at all; for I hold that no enlightened patriot can ever desire to see this country pass again through such terrible, such alarming scenes as we all witnessed during 1849 and 1850. I pray God that such may never happen again in this country.

I know very well that there are certain gentlemen who make light of it; who supposed, or affected to suppose, that no evil was likely to result from that agitation; who considered that the Union was safe; or who, to conceal their unpatriotic and traitorous devices, affected to consider it safe. Yes, sir, if they had been at sea, and in a storm, perhaps they might have made light of it when they regained terra firma; but they were not less affrighted, perhaps, during the time when the elements were beating and struggling, and warring above, beneath, and around them. The wisest men in this country did think there was great and imminent peril. I thought so then—I think so yet. I hope we have escaped it. But with all the finalities, there is not yet a finality to the disposition to agitate. I disapprove the whole of it. I think that in this burning focus of faction at the city of Washington, quite as much is done to produce this agitation, as is produced either by the abolitionists of the North, or the disunionists of another portion of the Union. I have no sympathy with either of them. I have never been heard to speak in any factious spirit upon this delicate question within my recollection. It is not my purpose to do it now.

Instead of preferring the present President of the United States as my first choice, I prefer Winfield Scott; and, if he shall be the nominee, I have little fear of the result. I know how difficult it is for a man, powerless, without patronage, and without official influence, to get a nomination against the power of an administration, which can wheel into the ranks a hundred thousand office holders, and dependants perhaps to the number of half a million. I know that if they unscrupulously use this power, it will be next to impossible to obtain a nomination against them. The present President is entitled to the declaration from me, that I believe he would scorn the use of such means. But what some of his friends might do, I should not undertake to vouch for. Their activity, premature and somewhat absurd, as I thought, seems to furnish a full guaranty, that they will not be in the future sluggards, and disloyal to their practices in the past.

I have said that North Carolina will not be inclined to support any man who is in favor of reopening agitation upon these delicate subjects; and on that point I here express the conviction, and I might almost say my knowledge, that General Scott can show as clean a bill of political health, on these questions, as either the present President, Mr. Webster, or Mr. Clay. I say what I think I know, during the pendency of these questions. After the successful adjustment of them, good and patriotic and pacific men met the "All hail!" of the entire country; but, before those measures passed, when men stood upon a plank, trembling over a precipice—that was the time to try the sincerity, the candor, and the truthfulness of men's professions and men's conduct. During that period, General Scott unqualifyingly went ahead to produce an adjustment of those angry difficulties, and a pacification upon which honorable men—North, South, East and West—could stand upon in reference to the questions that were then agitating the country so menacingly and appallingly. I do not pretend to say that he approved of everything that was done in the various acts of compromise, and concurred in all their details. Far from it. I would venture to say, as a mere matter of opinion, that there was not a member in either branch of the Legislature that approved of everything in every one of those bills. I certainly did not. But I acted upon this principle: I went for an adjustment upon which an honorable man could stand at both ends of the Union. I did not desire to obtain an advantage, or a victory, or a triumph over my opponents in that sectional controversy. I think there is no enlightened patriot who would not scorn to acquire a victory or a triumph over his friends and his brethren. In that respect, I believe, from my intercourse with General Scott, that he more nearly coincided with my personal feelings than any other man with whom I conversed. Sir, national in all his feelings, in all his proclivities, in all his inclinations, in all his professions; he desired neither a triumph of the North over the South, nor of the South over the North. Nor did I. I desired an adjustment of any sort, upon which men might stand with honor at both extremes of the Union, and preserve that heritage, without which, liberty, I think, would be extinguished, and, perhaps, forever. Imagine this Union separated exactly in twain; once set that example, and it would crumble down into the smallest and most contemptible, and factious, and warring fragments, and we would become a by-word and a scorn to all the enlightened portions of mankind, who feel any interest in human liberty, and in the progress of civilization.

I believe, therefore, that in doing what I do, in indicating the preference which I have, I in no degree depart from the principles I have always advocated; not at all. But yet I find gentlemen whose ambition may be limited to a township, or a county, or a Congressional district, or at most, perhaps, to a State, impugning me in the public prints as a tail to the kite of the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] for whom I have all due respect, except for his opinions upon the delicate subjects to which I have referred. There we are wide as the poles asunder. In regard to that, we agree to disagree. Yes, sir, these gentlemen of but yesterday are arraigning my consistency, my steadfastness to the South, to Southern principles and Southern institutions. Where can the boldest of them find, that in a public life of nearly thirty years, I have quailed in the presence of an enemy to the peculiar interests of my region of country? where the intimidation of power has made me succumb? or the blandishments and the arts of flattery have seduced me from the course which I had marked out for myself? No record of the sort can be produced. I may be a little ultra on this subject, yet I hope that does not extend so far as to make me sectional, and to forget that I have a great duty that I owe to every portion of this blessed Union. I hope not, sir. But some gentlemen are so extremely wise that they cannot associate with gentlemen who entertain different views on this subject. We must introduce into our platform and our creed a new principle. We are to take the compromise as a new article in our political creed. I have not looked at it very much of late; but I well remember, when it was passed, if you went South, you would find but a mere majority of Whigs and Democrats combined in favor of it; and if you went North, you would find the majority the other way—more Democrats in favor of it than Whigs, I admit. Well, that would be a platform! I suppose our friends in South Carolina, and even of Alabama and Mississippi, would be very unwilling to see it constructed; and some as sound Democrats as there are in this land, and as sound Whigs too, would be unwilling to meet on that platform. The compromise measures have passed into laws. There is no longer any territory open for the agitation of provisos; and I hope no more territory may be acquired, either by the spirit of rapacity or otherwise, to revivify these questions. They are now settled. There is nothing upon which agitation can act. If any triumph was obtained, it was but upon a single point—in accordance, I believe, with the principles of all parties in this country—that each State may determine for itself what shall be the character of its domestic institutions. I think there was no loss of honor on either side. Yet it has gone to the South, that there was an entire destruction of all the elements of honor, and that men cannot stand upon the settlement. They are asked to stand out of the Union; but they would not stand there long. So, in the North, it is said the Constitution must be disregarded. And who alleges it? Men who desecrate the Holy Bible and the religion of our Saviour himself. But this will not, in the long run, weigh with the common sense of the country; for I have an abiding belief, that whenever this country shall be deeply stirred to its foundations, it will show common sense enough, and conservatism enough, to maintain our institutions. In a word, I think a separation of the States almost a political impossibility. I thought otherwise, or rather feared otherwise, during that terrible session of 1849-'50. I had strong apprehensions, as one would have had even for a parent or a child that hung by a thread over a bottomless gulf. The bravest of men were made to tremble, and almost to quake; were sleepless at night; ridiculous as it is represented to be by some gentlemen who recklessly went forward, lighting their little tapers and making their way through the world, trying to get a little flash popularity which would not live longer than their tapers would burn. Recklessly as they pushed forward to results, fearful and destructive to everything of political philosophy, every lover of human liberty and human freedom must have felt that, on the decision of the questions then pending, depended the hopes of mankind; and that, if these reckless counsels should prevail, this Union—the hope of mankind—would have been buried for a time, if not forever. I hope never to be endowed with that sort of recklessness; and I hope that the majority of the American people will never be endowed with it. I hope that, with a fraternal, kindly, and affectionate sense, we will watch our institutions, watch their progress, and endeavor to perpetuate their safety.

In the preference I have indicated for the next Presidency, I feel that our interests will be as secure in those hands as in any hands that could be selected in this Union. I feel that in the purity, the nationality, the known honor, the honest and steadfast principles of that gentleman, they would be as safe as they would be anywhere. In the providence of God, it is not the highest ability and most practiced statesmanship that is required to give us a good government. It would be most unfortunate for the world, and especially for this American world, if it were so. Right intentions, a sound and a firm heart, and a steady purpose, with the elements of good, strong, common sense, are all that are required for carrying out all that is necessary to make the people happy, prosperous, and even glorious.

The practiced Machiavellians, intimately acquainted with all the sinuosities, tortuosities, and adroitnesses of the cunning politician, yield to strong and high sense, a firm heart, and right intentions and directness of purpose, as quickly as our cousins—the wily Mexicans—yielded to a greater than Cortez, in his triumphant, glorious, and almost miraculous march from Vera Cruz to the old city of the Aztecs.

There is another circumstance which leads me to my preference in favor of the gentleman whom I preferred four years ago. I think it was a great national misfortune that he was not selected at that time. If he had been President, we should have never had the scenes which occurred here during the winter and spring of 1849-'50; we should not have had the Buffalo Convention, with all its disasters. But this other reason of mine is, the ground of availability. It has been my steady, unwavering conviction, for more than a year and a half, that Winfield Scott is the only Whig in this Union, who can reach the Presidency by the voice of the people. I admit that he has been somewhat crippled and damaged at the South—and I say it with all due respect—by the development of a premature, and, as I have thought, somewhat absurd ambition of the present "powers that be." They have endeavored to ally him with Free-Soil and Abolition influences; and the unerring instincts of fear, have brought the ever-watchful Democracy into harmonious cooperation with the "powers that be" on this point. Sir, there is no Abolitionist who believes there is any truth in that allegation, or cunningly-suggested insinuation—nor do they believe it themselves. There is no Free-Soiler who ever expects to be able to use him as an instrument. Of all the men upon the earth, I should select him among the first who would never be made an unworthy instrument in the hands of any faction, whether South or North. That is my opinion. I undertake to express the belief, that he is the only Whig in the Union, who has any chance to be elected to the Presidency; and I would say to my honorable and respected friend from Michigan, [Mr. Cass,] that I should never repine to see any honor conferred upon him by the American people. Though perhaps this is praise coming from a quarter that may rather damage than benefit him, I must say, that I shall never forget the unwavering, steady, anxious solicitude that that Senator exhibited in the committee of thirteen, from the day of its first meeting, until the report was finally made. I say again—not as a Whig, but as an American citizen—that I should never repine at any honors the country might think proper to confer upon him: yet I should feel some sympathy for him to see him in collision with my friend, General Scott; for I rather apprehend that the scenes of Cherubusco and Chapultepec would be reenacted; though, of course, I do not mean to compare the Senator from Michigan to the Mexicans. I venture to express the opinion, that there is no intelligent person within the hearing of my voice, who has turned his attention to these subjects, who believes that either of the other Whig candidates presented, can get even half the number of electoral votes necessary to make an election. There is not an intelligent person, I think, who has turned his attention to the subject, who does not entertain this opinion in common with me.

I have a strong feeling of auld lang syne for my old friend, the editor of the Union; for I have been distressed at his sorrow that the Whigs did not seem to pay a sufficient degree of respect to certain other gentlemen who are named for a certain high office. I sympathize with his solicitude and anxiety; for I have none but the kindest personal feelings for him, and great respect for his sagacity—a quality which I think he possesses in a very high degree. It is the old doctrine of New York Democracy, first avowed, I believe, by Governor Marcy, now a very prominent candidate for the Presidency, that the spoils belong to the victorious party. It is said, that there are fifty millions of spoils to pass to the victorious party. And let me say, that if a satisfactory guarantee could be given to the friends of the editor of the Union, that we would nominate A or B, or any other than Winfield Scott, as a candidate for the Presidency, they might be willing to advance, in the Hungarian scrip style, ten per cent. of these fifty millions, or five millions; and they would make by the operation, forty-five millions, with an absolute certainty. Our friends of the Democracy are keen at a sharp bargain. But if our choice should fall upon the hero of Chapultepec and Cerro Gordo, and of all other fields where his proud war-steed has champed the victorious bit, they would not get off quite so easy. If this could be a business transaction, divested of everything supposed to be dishonorable, sustained by public opinion; if we could give satisfactory guarantees of who should be the nominee of the Whig Convention, we would have the money paid over, after reasonable notice, in a short time after the books were opened. By going into the political marts, where offices are bought and sold, and arranged "out," and "in," the thing would be very easy.

This is a very dull, and a very dry business to be giving in a confession here which is exactly at war with the feelings of my own constituents; but so it must be. I have seen, also, on the part of my friend—the editor of the Union—great solicitude to exclude General Scott from any intimation, in the terrible session of 1850, directly or indirectly, of desiring any law to be passed which should be more efficient in restoring fugitives from labor to their former service. I find, by looking at the Journals, that as early as the 3d of January, 1850, that bill was introduced and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and, as early as the 17th of January, it was reported back from that committee. It underwent several days' discussion, upon a motion which I myself had the honor to make, that with the resolution introduced by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. Bell,] and the resolutions and bills introduced by an honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Foote,]—no longer here—and the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. Clay,] should be referred to that much-reviled committee of thirteen. We afterwards (what seemed to me to be an anomaly in parliamentary business) retained in this body the fugitive slave bill, subject to occasional discussions, while the same subject was before the committee of thirteen. The committee reported a bill on that subject, which we supposed would be quite as efficient, and less offensive to Northern sentiment, than the bill which finally became a law.

By an amendment which was introduced—if I should speak of committee affairs—I think by the Senator from Michigan, and which was adopted and reported by the committee, it would have placed this law in a much more acceptable and less offensive condition to the North than the law which finally passed. But there was a wreck of the omnibus, and we had to gather the membra disjecta as we could, and fix them together. In doing so, we lost sight of the old fugitive slave bill, reported by the committee of thirteen, and took that already prepared to our hands by the Committee on the Judiciary, and that was passed. General Scott, when he addressed the Union meeting at Castle Garden—when he wrote his letter to Mr. Clay—when he spoke in the Capitol and the lobbies of this Chamber, manifesting the utmost degree of anxiety and solicitude that some plan of adjustment should be agreed upon by which the Union would be relieved from the menacing condition in which it was placed, must have had in contemplation that with the other great objects. That he went for all the details of that measure, or for all the details of all the measures usually called the compromise, I do not undertake to say. I have never heard him declare it. There were many things in those several bills which I would have had out of them if I could. But the Union, like divers other papers, with a very patriotic spirit, looking very much to the pacification of the country, desires to reopen this question upon the fugitive slave bill, and to indicate that General Scott must say what were his purposes, or that he cannot be supported by honorable men from the South. Well, sir, we shall see. I have no apprehensions upon that subject. I consider him as national and as patriotic as any man whatsoever who is named for the Presidency by either of the parties of the country. He would scorn to acquire a triumph for one section of the country over another; and nobody would do it but a little two-penny politician. No enlightened patriot or statesman, with enlarged views, would ever desire it. It would be the nidus—the nest of unnumbered ills in the future—the nest from which, instead of birds with brilliant plumage, to delight the eye, and warblings to regale the ear, would issue serpents to sting the American people to madness. It is unbrotherly, and it is as unwise as it is unbrotherly to desire such sectional advantages, miscaled triumphs. No American patriot can, or will ever desire it.

If I were placed upon the confines of the most distant frontier of the East, or if I were placed upon the banks of the Rio Grande; or if, again, I were placed in the furthest West, upon the wild sea-banks, laved by the waves of the Peaceful sea; or if I were upon the cold heights of the Rocky Mountains, I should desire to be able to say, with a full heart, with a swelling, exultant pride, This is my country; I am an American citizen.

Sir, every portion of the Union, to the enlightened public man, if not equally dear, is dear to this extent: that he would acquire no undue advantage over that, in favor of his own. A man who would do that, I would not trust with my purse, in the private walks of life—that is, if it had anything in it.

But it is said, by a certain class of politicians, that General Scott should give out a letter and his views; of what were, and what are, his sentiments and opinions. I should like to have seen what would have been said of a man who would have required that General Washington should ride over to his neighbors, in Alexandria, and have his views duly made out, under proper seals of office, that he was an honest man and a good citizen, and might be trusted with the management of the Government. What would have been said if such a thing had been proposed with regard to the elder Adams, Mr. Jefferson, or Mr. Madison? It is indicative of a sad declension in the times, when you require of such a man the same sort of certification that you would for a thousand-dollar clerk in one of your bureaus. I had supposed that the Whig party, with a fresh recollection of the Kane letter, of the watchword of "Polk, Dallas, and the tariff of '42," would not have desired any more of such things. I do not.

I mean not, on this occasion, to indulge in anything like eulogium upon my first choice. I think eulogies of the living are always in bad taste. I think they are very often misapplied, and not unfrequently quite ridiculous. I shall attempt no such thing. Let him stand forth, upon his own foot, and look upon him as one of the ablest and most prominent public servants of the country, who has illustrated our annals in a way that has commanded the respect and the approbation of his countrymen, and secured for him the admiration of the world, as much for his goodness as his unquestioned greatness. You will not think there is danger of his being swayed by free-soilism, or abolitionism, or anything of that sort, proceeding from the North or the South, the East or the West, or any quarter less than his country, his whole country. It is an insult to suppose such a thing of a man who was born in a Southern State, brought up in the midst of Southern institutions, who was educated for one of the learned professions; who has been, all his life, a law-abiding man; who has been, for the last twenty-odd years, the mark for the hostility of every Administration. They feared him, and they hated him. He has been placed in the most difficult situations; and in the closing scene of the last war, when he was about to be brought home to his own country almost in chains, the indignant refusal of his American heart to accept propositions made to him in Mexico, is worth more than all the speculations as to free-soilism, and abolitionism, Kane letterism, and all the rest of such things. I do not include in this the Nicholson letter, for I understood that perfectly. I do not think there was any mystery about it. I reviewed it four years ago, and I then put the proper interpretation on it. It was honorable to the gentleman who wrote it; and his whole life, especially that portion of it which has come under my observation, has been devoted to what he considers to be the true principles of Government.

The remarks which I have made upon this occasion, by the forbearance of the Senate, for which I return my sincere thanks, are made most disinterestedly. I make them honestly to my constituents. Though they may grate harshly upon their ears, and may produce temporary anger, yet it has been my fortune to have differed with them before; and, after their long-continued kindness to me, I feel a perfect confidence that they will not imagine that I would abandon any of their essential interests, or would see them abandoned without a struggle. I feel it due to them now to call their attention to the fact, that upon a false principle, to some extent, they are giving all their sympathies and all their affections in one direction, where they can be no better sustained nor justified than if they were given in the direction in which I give mine. I stand ready to compare the record, and I will make out as clean a bill of political health for my first choice as can be made out for either of the other gentlemen named by the Whig party. When I superadd to this the fact that we have an Eclipse that can outrun time itself, and that will pass over Young America, and old fogysism as he would split the currents of air that meet him, I feel braced and confirmed in my judgment that the selection I have made is wise, judicious, patriotic, and, in the event of success, will redound to the interest, the happiness, and the glory of the country.

I feel that I have trespassed most unreasonably upon the indulgence of the Senate; but before I take my seat, I wish to remark that the present Secretary of State won much upon my affections. I should at one time have felt willing to vote for him with a great deal of pleasure. I think that his position, and what he did, entitled him to the respect, and, in some sense, to the gratitude of the country, though I have yet to learn that a man deserves very much for the simple performance of his duty, particularly when such great stakes are to be played for as the preservation of the Union. In the course of my public life, I have found that I have more frequently been put in a false position by a certain ardor, warmth, and susceptibility of temperament, than by the opposite and, perhaps, less amiable weaknesses. I must say that certain events supervening have modified, if they have not entirely changed, the current of my feelings in that direction, not uncorroborated by the suggestions of my judgment. I stand first as in favor of one without competition, difficulty, or doubt. So I wish to be understood. Yet, as a party man, I shall be prepared to yield to the decision of those to whom is usually intrusted the selection of a candidate for the Whig party, unless I shall think that there is something unfair about it. In that case, I shall feel and recognize no binding obligation upon myself. That, however, is of no moment to any one, or to any thing, or to any result.

I have been among our friends of the East and the North, and I have studied them as carefully as I was able to do during a two or three months' visit. They have more elements of greatness in the highest state of excitation and activity, than perhaps any portion of the world of equal population. While they eviscerate many truths—much philosophy, they also turn up a great deal that is worthless and useless, and even pernicious. While it is a land of intelligence and vigor, of energy, of power, it is also a land of all sorts of isms, which, among our more sluggish, and perhaps less mercurial, or it may be less conceited population of the South, are hardly ever known to exist. Well, I have seen on the list of isms what I regard as the most respectable of any that has appeared in modern years, and that is anti-liquorism. It is one of a character that must command the approbation of every reflective man who has lived half as long as I have. It is an endeavor to cure a national evil. Whoever shall discover the means of doing it may be regarded as a great public benefactor. Looking upon it in that sense, it may be regarded as in some spirit national, as we have all seen, with more or less regret, from the highest positions in the Republic to the lowest. If they can suggest, either by legislation or otherwise, or by moral suasion, and find a remedy for it, they must be regarded as great public benefactors, and as eminently conservative, (as I believe the Whig doctrines generally are,) and promotive of life and domestic happiness. I wish them God speed; but I wish they would keep that question out of the range of partisan politics; for our recent disasters, proceeding from that cause, are not quite agreeable to my feelings. I think that so pure and so unselfish a movement as that must be supposed to be, ought not to be connected with partisan politics. Nothing can be imagined so pure, which, when it is brought into the arena of party politics, does not become soiled by the contact, and dragged in the mire and filth. Let these things stand upon their own footing. I hope we shall have no more national catastrophes. They are godsend to the gentlemen who fix their eyes upon the Presidency—a sort of windfall, from which they may carve quite capital enough to make a President. And that has reminded me of an amusing book I have recently read, where, in South Africa, the successful hunters shall strew the ground with the dead carcasses of his game, and where vultures and the savage natives flock by hundreds and tens of hundreds, and gorge, and gorge themselves until they and all about them are monuments of disgusting rottenness. They are essentially jacobinical, and are the best representatives of communism, of jacobinism, of modern notions of liberty and equality, and of equal rights born with mankind. They are to my mind a perfect type of some of those who advocate the jacobinical doctrines of liberty, equality, and communism, as samples of European republicanism. Sir, I beg pardon for this wandering digression. I did not imagine that I was going to occupy the Senate half the time which I have occupied it; but I hope that in future I shall not be misunderstood. This is interesting to nobody but myself and my constituents. Upon this question I shall be as free as they are. Though humble in retirement at home, as I am here, I shall exercise my suffrage, I trust, as free as anybody; and when I leave this seat and go into retirement, I shall be ready to cry "All hail!" to my successor, and all promoters of rational liberty and well-regulated order, and I fervently hope that he may be vastly more successful than I have been in serving all the public interests. That, while he will be more active, may be also vastly more able. I fervently pray for this for the honor of my native State, to the undying love and deep sense of gratitude which I cherish for her, which can cease only with the last gleams of memory and the last throbbings of my heart.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator from North Carolina has stated that General Scott can present as clean a bill of health as any member of the Whig party whose name has been used in connection with the office of President of the United States. Now, I wish to know whether the honorable Senator speaks by authority, when he says that General Scott occupies the same position with regard to the fugitive slave bill as the President of the United States does? That is to say, I wish to know whether the honorable Senator speaks by authority in making this announcement? whether he wants the country to come to the conclusion that General Scott is in favor of the fugitive slave law as it is, and as it passed through Congress?

and, if elected President of the United States, will execute the law as it is, and oppose any modification or amendment whatsoever?

Mr. MANGUM. I will reply to the gentleman. It is not my habit to bask in the smiles, or to be cooled in the shade, of great men.

I have had no conversation with General Scott on political matters since December of the year before last, nor on this subject, except in the galleries and lobbies of the Senate Chamber, or other portions of the Capitol, during the pendency of the "omnibus" bill. I speak what I know—I speak of his wishes, purposes, and desires at that time, and I say he can present as clean a bill of political health as any gentleman who is named for the Presidency, either on the Whig or Democratic side. This is satisfactory to me, and the experience of "the Kane letter" should satisfy the Whig party. We need no such letter from General Scott.

That was a time that tried men; when public opinion was in dubio; when it was shaking in stays. It required a little robustness of principle to step forward and take hold of questions of that kind, before there had been any indications of public opinion in coincidence with theirs. The honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. CASS] did so, and so did General Scott, with equal zeal, and equal ardor, and equal fearlessness of responsibility—that bugbear, that evil genius of trimming and cunning politicians.

As to the provisions of the fugitive slave bill, can the Senator from California name to me a single person, who voted for what is now usually termed "the compromise measures," who is satisfied with all the details of all the bills embraced in those measures? If he will show me such an one, he will show me what I have not yet seen or even heard of. I was not satisfied with many of those measures myself; but I took them because I saw it was a platform on which all honorable men could stand, and because it did not give a triumph to one section over the other. I did not desire that it should. General Scott did not desire it, for I think he is as purely national as any one who voted on that question.

Mr. GWIN. The answer is just what I expected it would be, that the Senator is not authorized to say that General Scott was in favor of the bill as it is, and, if elected President, will maintain it unimpaired, as the present President of the United States has done. I have as high a respect for the personal and military character of General Scott as any member of this body; but this is a very important question; and this is a very important era in the history of the country. I believe no gentleman in the Senate can get up and say that General Scott is in favor of the fugitive slave law, and will execute it as the present President of the United States has; and I undertake to say that, when the Senator from North Carolina asserts that General Scott can present as clean a bill of health, in regard to the compromise measures, including the fugitive slave law, as Mr. Fillmore or any other Whig candidate for the Presidency, he cannot say that he (General Scott) is pledged to execute the law as it has been executed, and that he would oppose any alteration of that law, if elected President.

Mr. MANGUM. Sir, I have no difficulty in answering the question; or, at all events, in giving my opinion as to that. I have not gone to ask General Scott the question, nor have I exchanged a word with him touching the Presidency, since last December was a year. I act upon my own knowledge and responsibility. You can make no President who will not endeavor to have every law executed, as long as it is a law, and as far as his power will go, unless he be a perjured, reckless, unprincipled man. I believe, sir, that General Scott, if elected President of the United States, would have all laws executed, according to the best of his ability—every one. He would be sworn to do it; and we must form a very low estimate of his morals or character, if we suppose otherwise.

Now, sir, I should like to know from the Senator from California, who feels so deep an interest in the opinion of General Scott on this subject, whether, supposing I got his authority to state here, that he would sustain these measures precisely as they exist, he may hope to get the vote of that Senator?

Mr. GWIN. I will answer the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MANGUM. I suppose I can as well answer for the Senator. [Laughter.] Gentlemen, therefore, need not show so much solicitude in regard to a matter in which they have so little personal interest—California, as a State, has just none at all. But, sir, I beg pardon, they have an interest—a deep interest—an interest involving fifty millions of dollars; because, I repeat, that if we give them a satisfactory guarantee to make a certain nomination, they hope to get in. I have nothing further to say on that subject, except that it might be a little inconvenient to some of the Democratic candidates to be placed on the stand, and I were permitted, unskilled as I am of late years, to run them through a course of searching examination. I should like to know what are their opinions about the existence of Mexican law in certain cases. Sir, I have but little respect for the legal opinions of some on that subject. I have my own opinion, however, on that matter, and should like to know their opinions on that and divers other small matters. Those opinions, however, will not influence my vote, and I would say further, that I do not think it proper nor decorous to place those gentleman on the stand to answer such inquiries.

Mr. GWIN. I shall detain the Senate but a moment.

The Senator from North Carolina presented himself formally before the Senate this morning, according to a notice which he had given last evening, for the purpose of announcing the fact, that he is in favor of General Scott for the Presidency. He has given his reasons, and among those reasons he has said that General Scott is as much in favor of all the compromise measures, including the fugitive slave law, as any candidate of the Whig party, for the Presidency. I therefore inferred that he spoke from authority, and thought it pertinent and respectful to make the inquiry. No Democratic candidate has been brought forward this morning in connection with this question; but I will say that if the nominee of the Baltimore Democratic Convention is not in favor of executing the fugitive slave law as it is, and opposed to any alteration of that law, I shall oppose his election. I take that responsibility in my place here, and I take the further responsibility of saying that the gentleman can name no person, who is prominent among the proposed candidates of the Democratic party, who does not intend to maintain that law, or who has a shadow of doubt as to his position on this question.

Mr. MANGUM. That is true.

Mr. GWIN. There is a doubt in regard to General Scott's position. He has written letters heretofore; let him write another, and pledge himself to the country and the world, that if elected President of the United States, he will execute this law as it is, and oppose any amendment of it.

Mr. DAWSON. I consider this a fit occasion upon which to ask the indulgence of the Senate, for the first time in my Congressional career, to say a word or two in relation to myself.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator can proceed if such is the pleasure of the Senate.

There was no objection.

Mr. DAWSON. What I have to say, Mr. President, is entirely in relation to myself. It is known to this body that it is not my habit to speak of myself in the Senate, or to "define my position." My acts heretofore have determined my public and party relations. But a position has been assigned to me, without any action of my own, in the New York Herald, a widely-circulated and influential journal, which requires some notice from me. I refer particularly to articles published on Sunday and Tuesday last. The first is headed "The Whig Caucus at Washington—Scott and the Fugitive Law—Trouble in the Camp." It is a long and interesting and admirably written article, containing many things which receive my approval; but that part which refers to me is founded in mistake.

The article of Sunday, the 11th of April, is in these words:

"THE WHIG CAUCUS AT WASHINGTON—SCOTT AND THE FUGITIVE LAW—TROUBLE IN THE CAMP.—We published, exclusively, yesterday morning, the proceedings of the Whig Congressional caucus, held in the Capitol on Friday night, for the purpose of arranging the time and place for the Whig National Convention. As our readers will have discovered, there was involved in that caucus the most important movement, by all odds, that has sprung up at Washington since the meeting of Congress. It is far more important than any public measure of legislation, passed or proposed, because it involves the permanent question whether the powers of the Federal Government shall be surrendered into the hands of Seward and the anti-slavery agitators, as far as the Whig party are concerned, or whether the Union, the Compromise, and the Constitution shall be proclaimed as the basis of Whig principles. That is the issue between the Whigs of the North and the Whigs of the South. That is the issue upon which General Scott is to be tried.

"The two most prominent characters in this Whig caucus, were Mr. Mangum, of North Carolina, the chairman, and the gallant Humphrey Marshall, of Kentucky, the leader of the forlorn hope of the South, possibly with the advice and consent of Mr. Clay. Mr. Truman Smith, the chief cook and bottle-washer of the Taylor campaign, was, of course, on hand, and very prompt to move a snap judgment upon anything like a declaration of principles. But Marshall intercepted him in a very explicit proposition, requiring the Northern Whigs to show their hands upon the slavery question, before the South were called upon to join them in a national convention. The suspicious affiliations of Scott with Seward, and his piebald anti-slavery and abolition associations, and the equivocal hide-bound attitude of Scott on the fugitive slave law, were the reasons submitted for this demand. And they were enough. Mr. Marshall will be justified before the whole country for grappling the bull by the horns, upon the threshold. If Southern men submit to be dragged unconditionally into a national convention, they will go out of it with a capitulation to Seward and his schemes, and a base surrender of their birthright, for the very doubtful chances of a mess of pottage. Let the Southern Whigs bear in mind that if, by a surrender to Seward, they succeed in the election, it will be the signal for renewed war upon the South, backed up by the whole power of the Administration; for there will be a power behind the throne greater than the throne itself. But let them also bear in mind, that by an open alliance with Seward and his various knots and cliques of agitators, they demoralize the National Whig party—destroy it in the South—with all the hazards before them of a most inglorious defeat, even in the pitiful contest for the spoils.

"There was a fair exhibition of firmness among the Southern Whigs, in support of the proposition of Mr. Marshall; but the notice of Mr. Mangum, that he should consider the motion out of order at the next meeting, and the adjournment of the caucus to meet again on Tuesday evening, gave a sickly and bad complexion to the whole affair. Mr. Mangum would undoubtedly, upon a satisfactory platform, be a very popular candidate to run with General Scott. Perhaps his colleagues—Mr. Badger of the Senate, and Mr. Stanley of the House—entertain the same opinion. It may be that Mr. Senator Dawson, of Georgia, has some aspirations for the Vice Presidency. At all events, the apparent willingness of all these distinguished Southern Whigs to take Scott and his right bower—Seward—upon trust, give a bad aspect to the whole case—the aspect of a final caving in to the most insidious and dangerous of all the enemies of the South.

"We have our misgivings that, in the second meeting of the caucus, the Northern Whigs, aided by a few members from the South, more intent upon 'the spoils' than upon principles and fidelity to their own institutions, will succeed. We have our fears of just that sort of a compromise upon which General Taylor was elected, and which resulted in driving the country headlong to the verge of civil war on the Texas question. It is not for us to presume that the death of General Taylor was a Providential interposition for the salvation of the Union; but we have reason to suppose that, had he lived, the influence of his Seward cabinet would have held him to his mistaken policy, and that the very next step in it would have been a war between Texas and New Mexico. It is hardly necessary to follow the consequences of such a step at that time; the end, in all human probability, would have been an abrupt dissolution of Congress, the secession of the South, and the destruction of the Union.

"Now, the question is, are the Whigs of the South willing to run the risks of another campaign without a platform? We repeat, that we have our misgivings that Mr. Humphrey Marshall and the compromise Whigs of the South will have to yield the wall to the force of numbers, or secede from the Northern Whig party. If they cannot, neither in person, nor by proxy, induce General Scott to show his hand or open his mouth upon the fugitive law, then it will be a duty which they owe to the Union and the South to bolt, and leave the Northern Whigs to help themselves. The late violent denunciations of the fugitive law, upon the case of Horace Preston, by the leading organs of Seward in this city and State, abundantly show that there is to be no peace upon that question—no finality, no acquiescence on the part of the Seward wing of the Whig party. Resistance and agitation are to be renewed in every case of the recapture of a runaway slave, till the law is repealed, and other measures are substituted, which will secure freedom to the fugitive upon crossing Mason and Dixon's line, or the Ohio river. And this is but a step in the abolition programme, the ultimatum of which is nothing less than the total abolition of slavery in the South, by a peaceable or bloody revolution. There is no disguise in all this. It is published to the world by the anti-slavery societies themselves, of whom Seward is the willing organ in the Senate. Every inch of ground which is lost by the South is a gain to them, and they never recede an inch. Will, then, the Southern Whigs knock under and cave in to the dictation of Seward, and accept his candidate upon his own terms, to conciliate his favor and the support of his allies? That is the question.

"The Whigs and the Democrats of the South have each the alternative of running an independent ticket, if their Northern allies will not toe the mark. They have thus the power of throwing the election into the House of Representatives, where they will have the strength to defeat the schemes of Seward, and the power of giving both parties an example of their principles, which will do them immense good for the future. Yet, we suspect this Congressional Whig caucus will stifle all inquiries for principles, and blindly follow Seward for the spoils. Will the Southern Whigs then withdraw? We doubt it; but we shall see. It is difficult to get over 'the cohesive power of the public plunder.' But we shall see."

Now, Mr. President, I did not attend that caucus, nor did I participate in its conclusions, either directly or indirectly; nor am I under any pledge to abide by the determinations to which those gentlemen may come. My position, I thought, was well known. It was publicly announced more than a year since that I would support no man for the Presidency who would not support the measures, one and all, known as the Compromise, openly and honestly, and with no view to deceive either the friends or the opponents of these measures. Hence I avow that I will act with no party which shall endeavor, either directly or indirectly, to open for agitation the questions adjusted by the compromise, even for the purpose of securing votes at the ensuing presidential election. Nor will I combine to elect any man to the Presidency, whose opinions are not beyond doubt or cavil on the finality of the compromise; nor shall I, under any circumstances, act with any party that shall not have the firmness publicly to avow their support of the compromise. Nor shall I commit myself by attending the Whig or Democratic convention, as at present advised. I desire to see our friends in the non-slaveholding States, by their own action, determine for themselves what is their true position in regard to the agitating questions of the day. If the South is to have no quiet upon these questions, I want to know it. The South herself desires to know it; and if it shall be determined that agitation is to be continued, then my word for it there will be no division in the South; there will be, as there should be, but one sentiment—that of union against unconstitutional aggressions.

The next editorial, from the paper of last Tuesday, is headed, "The Crisis of the Whig Party and the South." It is a long and interesting, and—like the other—a well-written article. It contains many truths; but that part which relates to myself is also founded in mistake. It is a mistake which places me in an attitude, known by all who surround me to be untrue. The article, which was published on Tuesday last, the 13th instant, is as follows:

"THE CRISIS OF THE WHIG PARTY AND THE SOUTH.—We have transferred to our columns to-day, several extracts from our Wall street contemporaries on the subject of the late Congressional Whig caucus at Washington. They throw but little additional light upon the matter, yet are not without interest as confirming the character and extent of the great trouble which threatens the most abject humiliation of the Whigs of the South, and the utter demoralization of the whole Whig party.

"The proposition of Mr. Humphrey Marshall in the late caucus, for a recognition of 'the finality' of the compromise measures, brings the Whig party to a crisis which involves the question of its nationality, and the still more important questions of the restoration of the confidence of the South, or the reopening of sectional animosities, and the agitation of disunion, from a base surrender to Northern Abolitionists. It involves the question of the restoration of quiet and good will between the two sections, or the revival, with the connivance of Southern Whigs, of all the disastrous influences and consequences of the anti-slavery agitation. It is an issue which makes the Whig party a Union party, or an Abolition and Disunion party; a sectional party, or a national party; a party upon principles, or a party for plunder; a party of law and order, or a party of sedition and nullification; a constitutional party, or a 'higher law' party; a party organized for the support of Seward and his anti-slavery coteries, or a party standing upon the broad platform of the compromises as they are; a party for the suppression of agitation—for the observance of good faith towards the South, for the recognition of State Rights, the reestablishment of peace, and the preservation of the Union. This is the issue upon which the Whig Congressional caucus of Friday night last adjourned over to this day week.

"This adjournment is ominous—the defection among the Southern Whigs is ominous; but the declaration of Mr. Mangum that he should consider a motion for the declaration of principles out of order, is the most significant feature of the whole affair, and the most to be deplored. What are the facts of this Whig caucus? The North was there in strength. William H. Seward, Thaddeus Stevens, Mr. Wade, of Ohio, and other notorious ringleaders of the Abolitionists, were there, apparently the most efficient members in the practical action of the caucus. Certain spirited and consistent Union Whig members, from Kentucky, Tennessee, and North Carolina, were there, boldly demanding an understanding with the North, as the first step to united action; but they were overwhelmed. There was a debate of four hours; but the question was deferred, and Mr. Mangum intimated that he should, at the next meeting, rule the motion for an understanding to be out of order. This is bad, and places Mr. Mangum in a bad position; and the apparent concurrence in his views by Messrs. Badger, Dawson, Jones of Tennessee, Stanly, and some other Southern Whigs, places them in the same questionable attitude. Let us briefly explain.

"In the spring of 1850, both Houses of Congress were sorely perplexed with the complicated unsettled issues growing out of the slavery question. Serious apprehensions were entertained of a violent dissolution of Congress and a speedy disruption of the Union. Henry Clay had thrown himself into the breach, but he was powerless without some efficient aid from the North. The leading Southern Whigs, such as Mangum, and Badger, and Dawson, rallied upon Mr. Webster, seized upon him, stuck to him, and brought him finally up to the mark. His speech on the 7th of March gave a new impulse to the compromise movement, and the whole country felt that the danger was substantially passed. But it is curious that, in the proceedings upon the committee of thirteen, Mr. Webster wavered again, voting this time against, and that way, and was only held to his place by the unceasing vigilance of Messrs. Mangum and Badger. It was a terrible trial to give up Massachusetts sure, for the doubtful prospect of a settlement of the slavery dispute; but he did it through the example of Henry Clay, and through the personal influence of such men as Mangum, and Badger, and Underwood, and other Southern Whig Senators. They stood virtually, if not directly, pledged to indemnify Mr. Webster in the future for the loss of Massachusetts, in the cordial support of the South; and it was that impression, and the general popularity of Mr. Webster's course in the South, that rendered him at once a promising candidate for the Presidency.

the Presidency. "The South are under similar obligations to Mr. Fillmore. General Taylor's policy conflicted with Mr. Clay's policy; and it was not till General Taylor was succeeded by Mr. Fillmore and a new Cabinet, that there was any really satisfactory prospect of a compromise. Mr. Fillmore sided with the policy of Mr. Clay, and threw into both Houses a conciliatory message or two. The way was cleared on the Texas question, the compromise bills were passed triumphantly and in quick succession, and the work was done. But the agitators had yet one hope of a failure—it was the stringent and effective fugitive slave law. Fillmore would be eternally damned in New York, to sign it. But he looked to the South, and the South looked to him. The bill was signed, and it has been enforced. The President may justly demand, in good faith, the support of the South in return. But what do we see? While the Whigs of all the Southern States, from Virginia to Louisiana, at home have declared for Fillmore, as their choice for the Presidency—while they all stand upon his platform of the compromise measures—the leading Whigs of the South in Congress—such men as Mangum, and Badger, and Stanly, and Governor Jones—are juggling with Seward and Thaddeus Stevens for a platform, and a candidate that will secure the support of the Northern Abolitionists. What a falling off is this in Southern dignity, Southern chivalry, and Southern statesmanship! Is there any security to the South, when her leading men are thus willing to throw wide open the doors of agitation, in the pitiful prospect of the Vice Presidency, upon a ticket with a candidate whose only pledge is a pledge to Seward not to commit himself against the Abolitionists? What is the South worth—what is the Southern Whig party worth—if its principles are thus to be sacrificed for the prospects of plunder?

Mr. Lincoln explained the obligations and partiality of the House of Representatives, and the influence of the South to Fillmore and Webster, it is easy to give the solution of their desertion by leading Southern Whig politicians. The late vote in the House of Representatives on the question of the fugitive law as a finality will solve the mystery. Mr. Jackson's resolution was carried—yeas 101, nays 64. Of this vote, there was only seven Northern Whigs in the affirmative to thirty Northern Whigs against it, the rest being absent, from reasons best known to themselves. Of the Southern Whigs, the vote was twenty for the finality to one in the negative. Thus, while the Whigs of the South are substantially unanimous in favor of the compromise as a permanent settlement, only seven men of the whole Northern Whig representation in the House of Representatives are found in the affirmative—only seven! This shows that the Whig party of the North is radically, if not hopelessly, infected with the leprosy of abolitionism. It shows that his element of the party must be conciliated, or that New York, Massachusetts, and Ohio may go by the board. And in this view of the case, we apprehend that the Southern compromise Whigs in the Congressional caucus, on Tuesday night next, will be overruled—that an understanding will be dodged, and that it will be dodged in the National Whig Convention. We also suspect that the Democrats at Baltimore will dodge the compromises—in fact, that the candidate of both conventions will be put forward with the lockjaw upon the slavery question.

lockjaw upon the slavery question. "Will the South submit? Will Southern Whigs submit to support a candidate whose only pledge is a pledge to Seward? Can either party of the South, jealous of the critical tenure of their social institutions, and aware of the steady increase of the anti-slavery elements of the North, submit to go into the election with their Northern allies, with no other argument than that the door is to be left wide open to the abolition agitators? We have our fears. There is reason to fear that, in uniting for the spoils, the Abolitionists will gather the fruits of the unholy alliance—demoralize both parties—overthrow the fugitive slave law—carry the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, assail it in the States, and drive the South, in the end, to secession or civil war. The Whig caucus of Tuesday next will probably solve the riddle."

This article refers to the last caucus of the Whig party, which I did not attend. I have not participated even in the outside discussion of the alleged intentions of the presiding officer of that caucus. My preference, as an individual, for a candidate for the Presidency is well known; but I shall in all probability support the man who shall be sustained by the friends of the compromise measures, whether he be the nominee of either of the old parties, or of the friends of the Union, and the Constitution, and the compromise; and these friends may be designated as conservative Whigs and Democrats, or, if gentlemen desire it, as "outsiders" of both of the old parties. But my object is to quiet the country; to have peace and harmony; to have unity and brotherly feeling throughout the land. Can any honest man suppose that I would loan myself as an individual, or as a Senator in Congress, to sustain any party that would unite for the purpose of creating or continuing agitation in this country upon the slavery question?

As to my courtesy upon the presidential election, this is not the place, nor is this the time, to discuss it. I merely make these statements as a reiteration of my declarations, made more than a year ago, to wipe off the wrong impression which the article in this paper may create, although such, I doubt not, was not the intention of its writer. Hence, as I have said, my remarks are entirely of a personal character; and, in all probability, I should never have asked for this courtesy from the Senate but for the occurrence of this morning—the explanation of the Senator from North Carolina.

EMPLOYMENT OF WORKMEN.

Mr. HALE. I throw myself upon the indulgence of the Senate, to make a motion pertaining to the business of the Senate; and that is, that all previous orders be postponed, for the purpose of taking up a measure which I understood yesterday it was agreed should be considered to-day. It was postponed yesterday, as I understood, in order that the Senator from Michigan might conclude a speech which he commenced on Tuesday. I move to postpone other orders to take up the measure for the relief of the laborers on the Capitol.

Mr. BADGER. I do not intend to make any personal explanation with regard to my position upon the various subjects spoken of by my colleague, [Mr. MANGUM,] or the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. DAWSON;] but I am sorry, nevertheless, that the Senator from New Hampshire got the floor to make the motion which he has submitted. I propose that the Senate, this morning, proceed to the consideration of the deficiency bill. As I have said before, I now say again, that I am in favor of the measure proposed to be taken up by the Senator from New Hampshire; but I hope we shall now take up the deficiency bill, and act upon it speedily, in order to save the credit of the country, and to save the country from dishonor.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope we shall not take up the measure proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, but that we may take up the deficiency bill.

Mr. BRADBURY. I shall ask the Senate to take action upon the French spoliation bill, which was under consideration yesterday. I shall not occupy much of the time of the Senate, merely desiring to reply briefly to some points which were urged by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. FELCH,] and then to have a vote taken immediately. I regret that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] should think it necessary to urge the consideration of another question at this time. I regret, also, that so many embarrassments should, from time to time, have been thrown in the way of bringing up this bill for consideration, and that almost all the objections to the consideration of the subject unfortunately come from gentlemen who are friendly to the measure, but who are anxious to press other measures. I thank Senators for the courtesy they have manifested in permitting the subject thus far to be disposed of, and I trust the Senator from New Hampshire will allow us to have a vote. I will ask for but a very few minutes. I will not occupy half the time which has been occupied by those who are opposed to the bill.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BADGER. On that I ask the yeas and nays.

The veas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALE. We shall never get this resolution up again unless we get it up now.

Mr. RUSK. I shall vote against taking up this resolution, though I intend to vote for it when it comes up. I do not think it necessary to be in a hurry in regard to the subject. We struck out a similar provision the other day, and a little delay now will do no harm.

Mr. MANGUM. I shall, with great pleasure, vote to take up this resolution to-morrow morning; but I really think it better to proceed with other important business to-day.

Mr. HALE. I have made various attempts to get action upon this subject, and I simply say now that this is the last time; for I have no idea we shall be any better prepared to consider it to-morrow than we are to-day.

Mr. RUSK. Somebody else will move to take it up.

Mr. BORLAND. I shall vote to take up this resolution. I do not anticipate that there will be any discussion. The Senate have already adopted a resolution precisely similar, and I have no idea the opinions of Senators have changed.

The question was then taken, and the result was—yeas 14, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Borland, Brodhead, Cass, Clemens, Davis, Dodge of Wisconsin, Douglas, Hale, James, Jones of Iowa, Shields, Upham, Wade and Walker—14

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Bell, Berrien, Bradbury, Chase, Clarke, Cooper, Dawson, Downs, Fish, Geyer, Gwin, Hamlin, Hunter, King, Mallory, Mangum, Miller, Morton, Norris, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Smith, Spruance, Sumner, and Underwood—29.

So the motion was not agreed to.

FRENCH SPOLIATIONS.

Mr. BRADBURY. I hope the Senate will now proceed with the consideration of the French spoliation bill, otherwise we shall be unable to finish it to-day.

Mr. HUNTER. Does the Senator from Maine expect to be able to get through with it to-day?

Mr. BRADBURY. I do. I expect to get a vote on it to-day.

Mr. BORLAND. I hope that if the bill is taken up, it may not be pressed to its final passage to-day. I am not myself prepared to vote upon it. I may have something to say upon the subject, and I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate to-day. For that reason, I hope the Senator from Maine will not press its passage.

The PRESIDENT. If no motion is made, it comes up, of course.

Mr. BORLAND. I move that its consideration be postponed till to-morrow.

Mr. BRADBURY. I suppose I can proceed with what I have to say as well under that motion as any other. I hope, however, the Senator will withdraw the motion.

Mr. BORLAND. There is no necessity that I should do that, in order to give the Senator an opportunity to speak.

Mr. BRADBURY. I will then submit to the opinion of the Senate. I do not wish to proceed, if the Senate do not wish to hear me now.

The question was taken on the motion to postpone, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BRADBURY addressed the Senate at length in defense of the bill. [Mr. B.'s speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. HUNTER. We were told by the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. BORLAND,] that he wished this bill postponed, because he wanted to speak upon it. I move now to postpone its further consideration until to-morrow. My object is to get up the deficiency bill, so that we may adjourn pending it, and consider it to-morrow.

Mr. BRADBURY. I understand now that the Senator from Arkansas does not want to speak upon the subject.

Mr. HALE. I wish to suggest to the Senate, that it would be better for us to get the bill out of committee and order it to be engrossed, and then let the test vote be taken to-morrow on its passage.

Mr. SEWARD. I desire to ask the honorable Senator from Maine, whether he wishes to have a vote taken to-day?

Mr. BRADBURY. I hope the vote will now be taken. The Senator from Arkansas told me that he did not desire to speak.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I hope the motion to postpone will not prevail.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the vote will be taken. The motion to postpone was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the amendment of Mr. BORLAND, to strike out of the first section of the bill the words "to an amount not exceeding $5,000,000."

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I move to amend the bill by adding:

And it is hereby expressly provided, That the appropriation in this act contained, until the whole amount be made up, shall take effect upon, and authorize the expenditure of only such surplus or excess of money as shall remain in the Treasury of the United States at the end of each fiscal year, after deducting from the amount of the public revenues in the Treasury the sums necessary to execute existing laws for the payment of private claims, for the improvement of Western rivers and harbors, and for all other objects which are required by law to be provided for previous to the end of each fiscal year.

Mr. BRADBURY. I desire simply to say to my honorable friend, that this is not the occasion to offer his amendment, for we do not propose to make any appropriation in this bill. When a proposition is made to appropriate money, then will be the proper time to offer this amendment.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I was aware that the friends of the bill were managing it most judiciously. I suppose the reason why no appropriation is put in the bill is because, if it contained an appropriation, it would, when it reached the House, have to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BRADBURY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. That is known to be sometimes a place of difficulty for such bills. I wish very much to have this amendment made to this bill, and I am the more desirous of it because it is an exact copy of an amendment offered by my friend from Maine, to the river and harbor bill at the last session. It will be remembered that when that bill was then under discussion, we sat days and nights voting upon it. My friend was then exceedingly troubled about the condition of the Treasury of the United States, and he exerted his ingenuity to protect and guard that Treasury, and the private claimants and others who were likely to have demands upon it. With the aid of certain friends, he fixed up an amendment which I have literally copied, and which I now propose to this five million appropriation bill—a bill involving the appropriation of double the amount contained in the river and harbor bill. Although it does not technically appropriate a single dollar now, such will be the result of it. I think that in all fairness, provision ought to be made for the payment of the commissioners to be created by this bill. I have no doubt they will be most honest and upright, and competent gentlemen; and that, unlike almost every other board of commissioners who have ever held their sessions in or about this Capitol, they will take the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States for their model; and that you will never find any Gardiner or Galphin claims allowed by them under this bill. And believing that these gentlemen will be most high-minded, honorable, competent, and disinterested, and far above those influences which sometimes have been found to exist in commissioners, I want to have them paid. If my amendment is not in order, I want to offer one to pay the commissioners.

The PRESIDENT. It is perfectly in order.

Mr. BRADBURY. I wish only to say, that had the Senator from Iowa and his friends accepted that amendment to the river and harbor bill, to which he has referred, the bill might have been passed, and the money partly expended.

Mr. DAWSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn. My reason for making the motion is this—

Mr. HALE. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. DAWSON. I know it is not.

Mr. BADGER. I call my friend from Georgia to order. He has no right to speak until he withdraws the motion.

Mr. DAWSON. I withdraw the motion. This is a vastly important bill. It ought not to be passed except by a full Senate. It ought not to be rejected but by a full Senate. There are a great many Senators who had no idea that the vote would be taken to-day, and they have gone home. It is now beyond the usual hour of our adjournment, and I think it is due to those who are absent, as well as to those who are present, that the vote should not now be taken. I therefore move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HAMLIN. I beg the Senator from Georgia to withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. DAWSON. I will, if the Senator will renew it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will renew the motion, and vote against it. I desire to say to the Senate that I would not myself vote to urge this bill to a final vote this evening, but we may vote upon the preliminary questions, and may order it, if the Senate shall so determine, to its engrossment, and then we can take the final vote to-morrow, or on some subsequent day, when the Senate shall be full. These preliminary votes may as well be taken now as at any other time. I renew the motion to adjourn, but I shall vote against it.

Mr. CHASE. I wish to ask the Senate to allow a bill to be passed, which was yesterday ordered to a third reading.

The PRESIDENT. This question must first be disposed of.

There was a division, and

The PRESIDENT announced that there were for the motion 13; against it 20.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I wish to modify my amendment by inserting before what I have already read, the following:

And be it further enacted, that a sum not exceeding $5,000,000, to satisfy the claims herein provided, be, and the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will take this occasion to say that on an examination of the rule, he finds that the change which has taken place, authorizes any gentleman to make a modification of a proposition, as was suggested by the Senator from North Carolina the other day, before any vote is taken; and after the yeas and nays are ordered, it can be withdrawn by the consent of the Senate. The Chair thinks proper to make this statement, because he fell into an error the other day by looking at the old rule instead of the new one. The modification proposed by the Senator from Iowa can be made without the consent of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I want to move an amendment to the amendment, by adding at the end of it the following:

"And after all the States of the Union, having public lands within them, shall have received as much of the same as they ask for constructing railroads, canals," &c.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I accept the amendment, and call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken resulted—yeas 5, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Borland, Brodhead, Dodge of Iowa, and Felch—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Badger, Bayard, Bradbury, Chase, Clarke, Cooper, Davis, Dawson, Downs, Fish, Geyer, Hale, Hamlin, James, King, Mallory, Mangum, Miller, Morton, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Smith, Spruance, Sumner, Underwood, Upham, and Wade—29.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I move to amend the bill by adding what was the tenth section of Mr. Clayton's bill:

"And be it further enacted, That, for carrying this act into execution, the sum of $5,000 be, and the same is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. BADGER. I hope the Senator will withdraw that.

Mr. DODGE. Does the Senator desire me to do so?

Mr. BADGER. I do.

Mr. DODGE. I withdraw it, but I really think we ought to provide for the payment of these commissioners.

Mr. BADGER. We will take care of them at another time.

Mr. BAYARD. I wish to move an amendment which, I think, may possibly prevent a difficulty hereafter in the construction of the bill, if it should pass. There is a proviso in the first section—

"That in all cases of transfer or assignment, no claimant shall be entitled to receive an amount beyond the consideration paid, and interest thereon."

I should object to the whole proviso, because I think it wrong in principle; but I wish to avoid a difficulty in the construction of the proviso, and I therefore propose to insert after the word "assignment," the words, "except gifts or donations;" and to strike out "claimant" and insert "assignee." The use of the word "claimant" is certainly improper in that connection. The effect of the amendment will simply be to prevent donations, such as from parent to child, being construed to be assignments.

Mr. BADGER. That is all right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWSON. I now propose to amend the bill, by adding after the word "donations," which has just been inserted, the words "made prior to the passage of this act." My object is to prevent those who have already in effect made assignments, giving their claims as donations hereafter, so as to get the full amount.

Mr. COOPER. That would be entirely destructive of justice.

Mr. BADGER. This amendment would prevent a man making a will, and giving his claims to his children, after the passage of this act.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HALE. There is one suggestion that I wish to make to the friends of this bill. They have provided that the assignee of one of these claims shall only receive the consideration paid and interest thereon, excepting those who have obtained the claims by gift or donation. They should also make provision for assignments of these claims as collateral security for the payment of debts. Where these claims have been hypothecated in that way it would be difficult to tell exactly what consideration was given for them.

Mr. BADGER. I do not think there will be any difficulty about that. The consideration received would be the value of the debt.

Mr. HALE. If gentlemen are satisfied with it, I shall offer no amendment.

The bill was then reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments made, as in Committee of the Whole, were concurred in by the Senate.

Mr. BRADBURY. Allow me to suggest that the bill had better be ordered to be engrossed, and the test vote can be taken upon its final passage.

Several SENATORS. That is the proper course.

Mr. BRADBURY. I hope that course may be pursued. Let it be understood that we are to have the test vote upon the final passage of the bill.

Mr. BORLAND. I hope that will now be done. It is very clear here, that in voting upon this bill there is a bare quorum present. This is an important bill, involving an expenditure of $5,000,000, and I do not think it is right to vote upon it when there is merely a bare quorum present.

Mr. BADGER. I would suggest to the Senator that he might as well let the bill now pass to its engrossment, and we can have the question upon the final passage of the bill to-morrow, by yeas and nays, in a full Senate.

Mr. BORLAND. I hope that course will not be pursued. I think it is probable—in fact I know—that certain amendments are to be offered to the bill; and if it is now ordered to be engrossed, these amendments will be cut off.

Mr. BADGER. That is what we want to do.

Mr. ATCHISON. I think it is apparent that about two thirds of the Senate are in favor of the bill; and for my own part I am anxious to get rid of it. I doubt not that any amendment that might now be presented, whether it be right or wrong, would be voted down. The Senate seems to be satisfied with the bill as it now stands.

Mr. BADGER. Oh, yes; it is an excellent bill.

Mr. ATCHISON. I am for acting on the bill now. Let it be considered as engrossed, read a third time, and disposed of.

Mr. FELCH. I believe the custom has been, in the Senate heretofore, to take the test vote on any important matter upon the question of ordering the bill to its engrossment for a third reading. I hope that the usual course will now be pursued in respect to this bill. Anybody who looks on this side of the chamber particularly, will see that a large number of members are absent. Some of them, I know, have left the Senate chamber with the expectation that no vote would be taken to-day. I know I am in a minority. There are a very few of us in the minority, but we would like to muster as strong as we could. So far as the engrossment is concerned, it is very well known that the clerks will, if it is desired, proceed to engross the bill, so that it would be ready to-morrow.

Mr. BADGER. If it is not ordered to be engrossed now, there will be fifty amendments offered to-morrow.

Mr. ADAMS. I am perhaps as much opposed to the passage of this bill as any Senator on this floor; but the reason given by the Senator from Arkansas, why we should not vote upon its engrossment, I do not consider to be any reason at all. It is no reason for delay, that gentlemen are not here when they should be here. If gentlemen are not here, it is their business. This method of postponing the action of the body for gentlemen who think proper to absent themselves, is altogether, in my humble conception, very wrong. If gentlemen feel an interest in what is going on, they ought to be here. That is my view of it. I do not think that the majority who take any interest in business, should postpone their action for the sake of gentlemen who do not choose to attend. I am, therefore, in favor of taking the vote now.

Mr. DAWSON. This discussion, going out to the country, might induce people to believe that some of the most attentive gentlemen on this floor have absented themselves from the Senate at an improper time. Now, it is long past the hour at which we usually adjourn; and it is due to those gentlemen to say, that it was not expected that the vote would be taken this evening. I suppose I am with the majority—I am in favor of the bill; but I think it is wrong to take any advantage of this kind to place the bill beyond the reach of the body, merely for the purpose of getting forward a step in the progress of this measure. I think it is wrong to take such an advantage, and especially in a body of the character of the Senate of the United States. I should move an adjournment, but for the fact that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. CHASE] desires to take up a measure in which his State is interested.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to say only a word. If we now order the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, we do not place it beyond the reach of the Senate. And I would say to my friend from Michigan, who remarked that this would not be pursuing the ordinary course, that he is certainly mistaken. We as frequently take the test vote upon the final passage of a bill as upon ordering it to be engrossed. I will call the attention of my friend from Michigan to the fact, that at this very session we allowed the Iowa land bill to be ordered to its engrossment without a division, and then upon the question of its final passage we took the yeas and nays, and I was one of a very small minority—ten in number—that voted against it. Here, then, is a case in point which occurred not very long since. The object is to save another day, and stop another discussion.

Mr. HALE. I want to say further, that I shall vote for the engrossment of the bill now; and if to-morrow any gentleman who may be absent to-day shall come to me, and tell me, that in good faith he meant to be here, and has an amendment which he wishes to insert in the bill, I pledge myself to move a reconsideration.

Mr. ADAMS. In justice to two absent members, perhaps it is not improper that I should say that my colleague, [Mr. BROOKE,] who is unwell at this time, and one of the Senators from California, [Mr. WELLER,] have agreed to pair off, as they are on different sides.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask the yeas and nays upon ordering the bill to be engrossed.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BORLAND. As I am called upon to vote upon this bill, I desire to state what my position is. I am as thoroughly convinced in my own mind as I have ever been upon any occasion, or upon any subject, that this bill ought not to pass; but I stand in a peculiar position. I am under the instructions of my State Legislature to vote in favor of this bill. I acknowledge the right of instruction; and on this occasion, as on all others, unless some very great necessity, or some extraordinary occasion arises, I shall obey instructions or resign. I wish to say, however, for the information of my constituents, that if on this occasion the vote was so near a tie that my single vote would determine the fate of this bill, and defeat it, I should disobey instructions, and defeat the bill, and justify myself before my constituents. When I find, however, that there is a decided majority in favor of the bill, and that my vote against it would do no good, I do not choose to put myself in a position of controversy with my constituents on the subject of my instructions; and therefore I shall vote very reluctantly for the bill, not doubting, however, if the bill shall not pass until the next meeting of the Legislature of my State, that I shall be relieved from these instructions, and be able to comply with my own sense of propriety, in voting against this bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Bayard, Borland, Bradbury, Clarke, Cooper, Davis, Dawson, Downs, Fish, Geyer, Hale, Hamlin, James, Mallory, Mangum, Miller, Morton, Seward, Shields, Smith, Spruance, Sumner, Underwood, Upham, and Wade—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Brodhead, Chase, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Felch, Hunter, King, and Walker—10.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

PUBLIC LANDS IN OHIO.

On the motion of Mr. CHASE, the bill to grant to the State of Ohio the unsold and unappropriated lands remaining in that State, came up on its third reading.

Mr. CHASE. I wish to state to the Senate, that before this bill was engrossed, it was discovered that, as it had been reported at a very early period of the session, the dates were made earlier than they ought to be. I therefore now ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to amend the bill by striking out, in the sixth line of the first section, "March," and inserting "July;" and in the sixth line of the second section, by striking out "July," and inserting "October." I would further state, that a gentleman, who has some interest in a private claim to some of the lands which the bill affects, but which he does not consider a vested claim, wished me also to strike out the words "vested in," and insert "of;" so that it shall read, "This grant shall in no manner affect any right of preemption, or other right of any individual." I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to make this amendment also.

The amendments were agreed to, and the bill was read a third time and passed.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 15, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the motion to lay upon the table the report of the Committee on Printing, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BENNETT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution, upon which it is very necessary, for the interest of my constituents, that there should be some action on the part of Congress. I ask that it may be read for information.

It was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Joint resolution declaring certain roads post routes.

Resolved, &c., That the road from Vallonia Springs post office, in Broome county, New York, via Nineveh and Coventry, to Oxford, Chenango county, be and the same is hereby declared a post road; and the road from Oxford, by the way of Coventryville, to South Bainbridge, be and the same is hereby declared a post road; and the Post Office Department is hereby authorized to pay the persons who have carried the mail on said routes, by the order of said Department previous to this time, a suitable compensation therefor.

Objection was made.

Mr. BENNETT. I appeal to the House to allow me to say a word in explanation of this resolution.

By the recommendation of the Post Office Department, a new post route has been established in my district, and the mail has been carried upon it for a considerable time past. The Postmaster General, however, says he has no authority to pay for carrying the mail upon it until this resolution shall have passed Congress, authorizing the establishment of this route. It is a matter of some importance to my constituents, and one to which I think no one can reasonably object. I hope I shall now have the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the resolution.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Does the gentleman design putting the resolution upon its passage?

Mr. BENNETT. I do.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then I do not see the necessity of doing this business out of its regular order. If the gentleman desires to refer it to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I have no objection.

Mr. BENNETT. But the mail has already been carried upon this route for eight months past.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I understand there are several other just such cases here. I object.

Mr. SEYMOUR, of New York. I would inquire of the Chair whether it will be in order to move that the morning hour shall be devoted to the reception of reports from committees?

The SPEAKER. It cannot be done except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object, and call for the regular order of business.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the motion to lay upon the table the report of the Committee on Printing, and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. Would it be in order at this time to move a call of the House?

The SPEAKER. It would be.

Mr. BROWN. I then move a call of the House.

The question was put to the House, and it was agreed to.

The roll was then called, and one hundred and sixty members answered to their names.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I apprehend that it is not necessary to progress any further in the call of the House; and if it is in order—and I presume it is—I move to suspend any further proceedings in the call.

The question was then taken and agreed to, and all further proceedings in the call were dispensed with.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The pending question before the House is the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] to lay the report of the Committee on Printing upon the table, is it not?

The SPEAKER. That is the motion.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I would be obliged to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] if he will withdraw that motion. I wish to say a few words in explanation of my course of action upon this question. I will renew the motion if the gentleman will withdraw it.

Mr. POLK. I am always disposed to act courteously towards gentlemen upon this floor. I will, at the request of the gentleman, withdraw the motion, provided he will hold the floor long enough to have it renewed, or for a proper answer to be made to his remarks.

The SPEAKER. Bargains of this kind are not admissible.

Mr. POLK. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. ORR. Will the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] give way for a moment, to allow me to suggest an amendment to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Mississippi? [Mr. BROWN.]

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will hear the suggestion of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] for a moment, if I am permitted to do so. I only want to occupy a few moments of time.

Mr. ORR. I propose to amend the resolution offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] by striking out the "Committee on the Judiciary," and to insert in lieu thereof the "Committee on Printing." While I disapprove of the action of the committee, I do not desire to cast any reflection upon them.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Upon this point I desire to say a single word.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not certain that the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] is in order. However, it will be entertained.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I want to say but a word or two upon this question, and then I will give the floor to the gentleman from—

Mr. BROWN. My friend from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] says that he proposes to amend the resolution offered by me, because he does not like to cast any reflection upon the Committee on Printing. I wish simply to say, that in offering this resolution, I did not contemplate, in the phraseology employed, to reflect upon the Printing Committee.

Mr. ORR. I had no idea that my friend from Mississippi [Mr. BROWN] had any such intention; but some are of the opinion that the phraseology of the resolution may have that effect.

Mr. POLK. It will so read to the country. There is no doubt of it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I wish to make a few remarks in explanation of my vote upon this question. I have been an attentive listener to the debate which has taken place upon this matter, without any feeling about it further than a desire that we may succeed in getting some judicious system by which to have executed the public printing, and, of course, that we shall take that which is least objectionable in all points of view.

This seems to be a bad piece of business as it now stands; and every one admits that we must take some step to get out of the difficulty. At least that is the general opinion. Now, what is it that the Printing Committee propose to do? As it was stated, Mr. Speaker, upon the day when the debate first arose, and as I understood from some members of that committee, by conversation with them—and particularly with gentlemen upon that committee in the Senate—they had not only made an arrangement to have the printing already given out executed, but that they had provided for the future printing; and that they had selected Donelson & Armstrong to do the printing for the House, and the Republic to do the printing for the Senate; intending thereby to cover all the printing which may be ordered by Congress during the present session. That is what I understand to be their action; and I find, in confirmation of that opinion, in the reports of the Senate proceedings—which I have a right to refer to, as appearing in the newspapers—that Mr. BORLAND, from the Printing Committee, reports exactly such a resolution as that. Now, that resolution, I consider, is clearly beyond the authority of the committee. The existing law provides that, where there is neglect and delay in the execution of the printing ordered by Congress, the Printing Committee may take the necessary steps to have it done, and they may deduct what is due to the contractor, or refuse to receive his work, and that in all cases they may proceed upon his bond, and hold him and his security liable. Of course, nobody will contend that the contractor will be liable for not printing documents never placed in his hands; and if it was the intention of the framers of that law, no doubt that condition only covers the printing actually given out, where the public printer had been guilty of neglect or delay, and where his security may be liable.

I have no doubt, that in accordance with this view, after the discussion in the House, the Printing Committee changed their original purpose—as I understand they did—and abandoned the resolution as reported in the Senate by Mr. BORLAND, and they submitted the one which we now have before the House, in their report. This resolution I shall not trouble the House to read. Gentlemen understand it, and they will find that it amounts to precisely the same thing, in substance, with the former one. But these gentlemen have ingeniously managed to get over the legal difficulty thrown into their way by an arrangement which I will now describe. They say that they did not propose to dismiss Mr. Hamilton, but to retain him as public printer; but that they will from time to time remedy his neglect and delay, by giving the printing of the House to Donelson & Armstrong, and that of the Senate to the Republic. They intend to make use of this man, Boyd Hamilton, and keep him in the position of a nominal public printer. You see, at once, the difficulty in the way, if they take any other course. If they had dismissed him—if they had said that he could not have carried out the contract, why it would have been necessary for this House to take some action; and the House could, no doubt, have made an arrangement to let out the public printing to the lowest bidder, or in some other way spoken of. And in either of these points of view, Donelson & Armstrong and the Republic could not have come in. Well, these gentlemen, adroitly, with a view of giving the printing to their favorites, adopted this mode. They intend that this man, Boyd Hamilton, shall be, nominally, the public printer. But the moment this printing is to be executed, they will say to Mr. Hamilton, "You cannot execute this work; you will not be able to do it"—and they tell us he is not able—and therefore they give this to Donelson & Armstrong, and that to the Republic. In this way they will keep Boyd Hamilton in that nominal position of public printer during the whole session, and turn over the work to the other printers—he being thus a mere sort of conduit pipe to convey the printing from Congress to their friends. Now, what is Boyd Hamilton's position? He may well say to himself, "If I commence on this document, and should set up one half of it, the committee will come in and snatch it from me, and turn it over to Donelson & Armstrong."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will.

Mr. JONES. Does the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] believe that Boyd Hamilton can execute the printing of this House and of the Senate?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will answer the gentleman with pleasure. It is a point I know nothing about. I think it very likely he cannot. But it is very certain that he has had no fair chance to execute it. It is very certain that this committee, three months ago, committed a war upon him calculated to discredit him, and put it out of his power to get along. It is clear, according to his own statement, that he has been embarrassed all the time, and I say it by no means follows that he cannot execute the printing.

Mr. JONES. One more question, with the permission of the gentleman. This contract with Boyd Hamilton was entered into on the third of March, 1851. Did he not have, from that time, knowing that he had the contract, up to the first day of December last, to prepare his materials, his paper, press, ink, type, and everything else in hand, to come here to do the work? And should he not, had he been able to do it, have fully prepared himself for it? If he had been thus prepared, does the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] suppose that any gentleman upon this floor, or in the other wing of this building, or any member of this committee, could have any objection to his doing his work?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hear this inquiry of my friend with great pleasure; but he will see that it does not remove the difficulty which now stands in the way. I tell him, candidly, that I do not know whether this man can execute the printing or not. I think, probably, he cannot. But suppose he cannot, what was the duty of the Printing Committee? Unquestionably to report to this House that this man could not execute it, and leave the House to determine whether they would let it out to the lowest bidder, or adopt the plan of the gentleman from Wisconsin, (Mr. DORR,) or some other mode. But these gentlemen of the committee say clearly, as their action shows, that if that was done, Donelson & Armstrong would not get any part of it, and the Republic would get no part of it, and therefore they have arranged matters in the present mode. They intend to hold on to Boyd Hamilton, and make him the instrument of keeping the control of the printing from the House, and to convey it into the hands of their favorites, where they are determined it shall go, and where they know that they cannot get it in any other way. That is what I object to. The plan recommended by the committee is the worst plan you can possibly have. You will have three printers, one a legal one, and two others foisted on us by this mode.

The difficulty will be, when you do not get any printing done, that you will have three printers to look to, and one will shift the responsibility upon the others. Boyd Hamilton will say, "I expected to have had this printing, but I found that the committee had given it to some other people." No matter what the condition of the public printing, we are to be bedeviled during the whole session, having no one responsible person to look to.

The Printing Committee have left things in this condition, and I can only account for it upon the supposition of a strong and overruling desire to benefit their friends.

Now, I was pleased, at the beginning of this session, with the candor of the chairman of that committee. He came out very frankly and told the House that his object was to benefit a political friend; that he was a party man; and he called upon his party, all around the House, to sustain him; and I have no doubt that that gentleman will admit that he is now actuated by the same feelings. I have no doubt that he will admit, if the question is put directly to him, that he does not intend to recommend any proposition that cuts out Donelson & Armstrong altogether. That is the situation of that gentleman upon the committee. They see that we are in a difficulty, and they do not mean to let us get out of it in any way, except through Donelson & Armstrong.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman if he is not actuated by the same motive to cut out Donelson & Armstrong?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Not at all.

Mr. GORMAN. I can, with the same propriety, say, Not at all.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask if it is not his fixed purpose not to recommend any plan which will cut out Donelson & Armstrong altogether?

Mr. GORMAN. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina the same question over, whether his fixed and determined purpose is not to cut out Donelson & Armstrong?

Mr. CLINGMAN. It is not. If they will do it as cheaply as anybody else, I am willing that they should have it. Now, will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. GORMAN. What is it?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I say, if Donelson & Armstrong will do this work as cheaply as any one else, I want them to have it. How is it with the gentleman?

Mr. GORMAN. If Donelson & Armstrong do not do this printing as cheap as anybody else, in view of promptness and contract price, they cannot and shall not have it, so far as my vote is concerned.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Will the gentleman recommend a proposition to let out the public printing to the lowest bidder, and let Donelson & Armstrong take their chance?

Mr. GORMAN. I have no such power in the committee, or in the House.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Will the gentleman vote for it in committee?

Mr. GORMAN. I will not.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The gentleman will not vote for it at all.

Mr. POLK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Certainly.

Mr. POLK. The gentleman says that he will vote for the contract system. I want him to tell me if, since the contract system has been adopted, there has been a single contract given out that we have not had men at our portals asking relief under it? And, further, if it has not cost more, by consuming the time of this House, to consider these applications for relief under the contract system than one half of the whole public printing costs?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will answer that question of my friend in a moment; but I will not leave the committee yet. I want to show to the House, as the committee has not, how this matter stands. They say that this man is not capable of executing the public printing, and they will take a certain other bid. But there were eight lower bids than that of Mr. Rives, although they have selected his bid. Every one admits Towers is a good printer—a responsible man. According to the statement given to us, Towers's bid is $30,000 or $28,000 and a fraction, less than Rives's, and yet Towers was passed over. Why pass over Towers's bid? And remember, according to the statement given to us, Rives's bid was about $60,000 better than the terms upon which they proposed to give the contract to Donelson & Armstrong; for Rives agreed to make a deduction for a large number of the documents. You will see from the statement given in the Congressional Globe, that that deduction amounts to about $60,000; so that it turns out that they propose to give to Donelson & Armstrong this contract at $90,000 more than Towers was willing to do it for.

Mr. GORMAN. Most certainly not.

Mr. CLINGMAN. How much more, then?

Mr. GORMAN. I told the House yesterday, but the gentleman seems to have forgotten it, that Towers did not propose to deduct a single per cent.—not one per cent. off the round numbers; but that Rives did propose to deduct sixty-nine per cent. upon all copies over twenty thousand, and that Rives's bid was, thereby, the lowest.

I say further, sir, that Mr. Rives has published—"I am the lowest bona fide bidder for the greatest portion of the printing of Congress, and have made ample preparations to execute it, and I am prepared to prove this before a committee. I therefore ask the Speaker of this House for a committee to investigate this fact, that I am the 'lowest bona fide bidder.'"

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask the gentleman, then, how it stands that they have given it to Donelson & Armstrong upon Rives's bid, without that deduction of sixty-nine per cent. upon the largest number?

Mr. GORMAN. No, sir; that is not so.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It is published in the papers that he accepted it, upon condition that he should not be held to the reduction. It so appears from their letter published in the Globe, as a part of the committee's report made yesterday. Did the committee and these persons come to that understanding?

Mr. GORMAN. They expressly declined to accept that proposition.

Mr. CLINGMAN. As I understand the gentleman, he has taken Donelson & Armstrong at Rives's bid, and they have refused it with his proposed reduction. Did the committee assent to Donelson & Armstrong's proposition, as they made it?

Mr. GORMAN. We have made no contract with Donelson & Armstrong.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then, this matter is in a worse condition than I thought it was. We seem to be entirely at sea, and, according to the present statement, this committee has not, in fact, made any contract at all. It seems to me, that this committee, instead of doing the business of this House, and making recommendations for getting out of the difficulty, want us to adopt their action when they have had no final action.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish to lay this proposition on the table; and I will, on Monday, give a tangible proposition: the reason why we cannot make the contract, and why the parties will not accept the proposition made. We will proceed to give estimates of what it can be done by by Donelson & Armstrong, Rives, or anybody else. I am one of that committee, and when we agree upon the subject, we will report the fact.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am glad to get the gentleman's explanation, but I will not wait for the committee. They are too supine and slow; for, three months ago, they told us that this man Hamilton could not execute the public printing. This was said again and again by the committee during the debate on the census report. And yet, with a full knowledge of this, that committee has utterly failed to take any action on the subject.

Mr. GORMAN. I never made a proposition to this House to give out one single particle of the public printing. I proposed three months ago to give Donelson & Armstrong the contract to print the census, and nothing else.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I understood the gentleman perfectly in the speech he made upon that occasion. He then said that Boyd Hamilton could not do it. He went into a long argument to show that Boyd Hamilton could not execute it, and he has rested upon his oars ever since, without bringing forward any specific proposition to remedy the evil. It is very obvious that the gentleman's motive has been to provide for Donelson & Armstrong. That is his object, and he intends to baffle the House until they find themselves so much worried to get this printing done, that they will adopt that proposition. Therefore, sir, I am not for it; and I propose a reference of this subject to the Judiciary Committee. I differ with my friend from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] as to the propriety of recommitting this matter to the Committee on Printing. The chairman of that committee has avowed it to be his object to benefit his political friends—and I refer the gentleman to his own speech—and therefore he is not prepared to modify his views.

Mr. GORMAN. The gentleman cannot be permitted to do mean injustice, and I do not think he will try to do it. The gentleman says I claim this particularly for Donelson & Armstrong, upon party grounds. Now, the gentleman must be aware that what I said was, that if patronage had to be bestowed, I should prefer bestowing it upon a political friend rather than on a political foe. That is all I did say, and from that he cannot adduce the conclusion he has.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will remind the gentleman that if he had stood upon that ground, he might very well have taken the proposition I suggested to him some months ago in debate, and that was, to let the lowest bidder take it. Then his friends would have had an equal chance. My colleague put the question again and again in his speech: Why was it they took the highest instead of the lowest bidder?

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I understand that this committee called upon Mr. Rives, and he told them that he made this bid far above its value, not expecting to get the work. They asked him to furnish a statement at which the work could be well and fairly done, which statement he did furnish them, far below the rates which the committee have proposed to give Donelson & Armstrong, and Gideon & Co., but the committee have said not a word about this to the House. Is that true?

Mr. GORMAN. Not one word of it, sir. Mr. Rives was called upon by the chairman of the joint committee to furnish a just estimate of the prices, and he furnished these prices, which are higher, and not lower.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman furnish them to this House?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; I will furnish them.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It was stated the other day by, I believe, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] that Rives said, that upon his own bid the contractor might make a handsome profit. That is so; but I am not disposed to go into this matter at length. The committee have not only passed over the bids of Towers and others, but when they took Rives's bid, they repudiated him. If you take his bid, why repudiate him? But, Mr. Speaker, I say that this is an attempt like the first was, to get a portion of the public Treasury for the benefit of friends.

Mr. GORMAN. If my friend will allow me again to interrupt him. I must have justice done me before the House. I tell the gentleman from North Carolina—and my colleague here, my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. STAGGON,] knows it—that I made the proposition in the committee to take Towers's bid, but an honorable Senator upon that committee made a calculation, and demonstrated to us that Rives's bid, with sixty-nine per cent. deducted, was the cheapest of the two. My proposition was for Towers's bid.

Mr. ORR. My friend from Indiana has fallen into an error in reference to this sixty-nine per cent. of which he speaks. Here is a table, and I will read the caption of it, prepared by the Clerks of the two Houses on the 3d of March last:

"Statement showing the amounts of the several proposals for each class of the printing of the Thirty-second Congress, as calculated upon the quantities of printing of the two Houses of Congress ordered at the first session of the Thirtieth Congress, and showing also the aggregate amount of the proposals of the several individuals for the printing of all the classes upon that data, together with the average amount of the whole."

Now, sir, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] states that Mr. Rives's bid comprehended the census, but the caption of this statement shows that the aggregate bids were calculated upon the assumption that the printing for this Congress would be equal to that of the Thirtieth Congress, when, as we all know, no census printing was ordered by the Thirtieth Congress; and Rives's bid, after deducting the sixty-nine per cent. on the long numbers, is, as I stated, $169,000. Apprehending that I might have misunderstood this matter, since yesterday I have seen both Rives and Towers, and both concur in the statement that Towers's bid is $30,000 less than Rives's.

Mr. CLINGMAN. That corresponds with the published report in the Congressional Globe, which I read this morning, and which is given at length in that paper. But I now wish to say a word upon the political bearing of this matter. You well recollect, Mr. Speaker, when the contract system was originally adopted, that at that time the Democratic party had a majority of sixty or seventy upon this floor; but the Whigs had been discussing it from session to session, and, finally, under the lead of one of your colleagues, (Garrett Davis,) a vigorous effort was made at that time, and the whole of the Whig party came up, and the Democratic party, with their large majority of sixty or seventy, came forward and helped it through. The Whigs did not want to bear the burden of carrying upon their shoulders an odious system of favoritism. Now it is proposed to abandon it, and for no new system that would do better, but to go back into that old system of favoritism, of party organs, which was found to be so mischievous. I should like to know upon what principle any man upon this side of the House—referring to party organization as existing on the old basis—I should like to know upon what principle we are to go over, and abandon this contract system. Look back to the constant denunciations of that day, and for many years, of the Government patronage and power, and its influence upon the press and country, and it will be seen that the whole Whig party came up to carry out the system now proposed to be abandoned. What is the consideration? Why, the only consideration offered for this surrender of principle—for there was principle in it originally, and there is still—the only consideration is, that the Republic is to have some share of the printing, it being a Whig organ. We are to sell out, and transfer whatever principle there was in this matter, in consideration of the favor done this year. For you will remember, Mr. Speaker, when this proposition was originally brought up to give it to Donelson & Armstrong, the whole Whig party, without any single exception, voted against it; and now it is supposed by a combination with the Republic that we will go over.

Now, Mr. Speaker, party principles are very cheap at this time, I admit. I did say, last session, that I looked upon the present parties as not divided upon any principle at all—that the old parties were merely bodies of men or combinations, struggling to get at the public offices. I still entertain that opinion to a great extent. But, sir, are we to be called upon now to surrender any relic of party principle, and that the whole Whig party enter into this system for that consideration? Now, I should like to know of the chairman of the Committee on Printing, whether any precedent like this can be found? It is said that Esau sold his birthright for a mess of pottage; but Esau intended to eat the pottage himself. There is no evidence whatever before us, that Esau would have sold that birthright for pottage for somebody else to eat. Yet we are to be so well satisfied, if this Republic can get into the public Treasury, and obtain a share of the money, that we are to sell out whatever of principle we had upon this question. That is the point, Mr. Speaker.

The Union endeavored, early this session, to get, through the aid of its friends, into the public Treasury; but found that it was not strong enough to get in, and had to agree to divide; just as, a few years ago, when the Patent Office was robbed of its jewels by two or three accomplices. Do you suppose the man who first conceived the design of getting in the Patent Office, and taking away these jewels, proposed to call in others and divide, from a mere feeling of generosity? Not at all. I do not doubt that he found he could not get in alone, and upon the principle of necessity, he made a bargain with several others, that they should aid him, and divide the spoil. This illustrates this principle. They wish to get into the Treasury, and finding that they are not strong enough alone, they say to the Whigs, if you come in and help us, we will divide with you. That is the amount of it, sir. It is a violation of the existing law, to get at the money. If the committee are of opinion that the system established by law is wrong, let them come up, and report a proposition to repeal the law; but they have no right to endeavor, while that system is the law of the land, to evade it in this way.

Mr. HAVEN. I shall only trouble you for a moment, sir, because in reference to all these party divisions I propose to have nothing to do; but there is one question which I desire to lay before the House, and let the gentleman have the benefit of it, too. The first thing is simply this: is the House satisfied with the execution, or attempted execution, of the contract by Mr. Hamilton? The committee were not satisfied; but if the House is satisfied, so far as I am concerned, I am willing to leave this matter where it is. But, as one of the committee, I have come to the conclusion that he did not perform his contract, and I choose that this House should make war upon Hamilton for not performing it, rather than upon the committee for having neglected their duty. Let the House take the issue. If they are satisfied with the quality and quantity of the work, let them have the responsibility; if they are not satisfied, then the second section of the act requires the committee to take such means as they may deem necessary to remedy the neglect or delay on the part of Hamilton. The committee have taken pains, so far as they have been able, to remedy that neglect and delay. They have not consummated these means. They have tried to, and will, if the House have confidence in the committee; but from the time that the House have not confidence in the committee I shall be happy to transfer into their hands that duty, and let them see with how much greater unanimity they can come to a conclusion than the committee have. I submit this proposition: If the House or country are satisfied with the printing, in quantity and quality, as delivered, and in amount, that they relieve the committee from any responsibility upon that subject; if they are not, then the committee, occupying the place they do, will take the best means in their power to remedy that inconvenience. It was because it was intimated or suggested by gentlemen here, that the committee were desirous to lay before the House their proceedings; and if the House have no confidence in the committee, if they think this work was all well done, let them take the responsibility and say, when they have waited twelve months for these heavy documents, that it was at their own suggestion that they waited upon Mr. Hamilton, and not through the inefficiency of the committee.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I understand the gentleman. He is mistaken about the fact. He is anxious to shift the dilemma from the committee to the House. He cannot do it. I have no doubt but he believes exactly what he states; but what I wish to say is, that the committee themselves have been in default. If they were satisfied that this man had not the capacity to execute the printing, they ought to have reported that fact to the House, and requested its advice. The House might then have disposed of it to some one else.

Mr. HAVEN. The law requires that the committee shall act—that they shall remedy the failure of the contractor.

Mr. CLINGMAN. That is the gentleman's construction of the law. My construction is a different one. The gentleman has construed the law erroneously. He has acted honestly and fairly, I do not doubt. I do not charge upon any of the gentlemen as having any such motive as the one I have been speaking of. He has made no statement bearing it out. Every one knows there has been a powerful outside pressure to take care of Donelson & Armstrong, and others. That is the point. And it has been intimated in the debate upon this floor, that one of the reasons why those gentlemen should have that contract, was that they had rendered important services to their country. I see it now stated in newspapers—the Baltimore Sun, and others—we hear it all around, that these editors have been fighting for the Union against the ultras, &c., and for that reason they are endeavored to be pushed forward in the way now proposed. You know, Mr. Speaker, that they have been, and are endeavoring themselves—in their editorials—to create the impression that there are a few ultra men—Disunionists, Secessionists, Abolitionists, and others—opposed to their patriotic effort to get into the Treasury. Why, if that were really true, that the only guardians of the public Treasury were a few ultra men, it would tell badly for the country. But there is nothing in it.

Mr. POLK. If the gentleman will allow me, I cannot permit such a charge to be made without the facts coming to light. I ask any member of that committee whether Gideon & Co., or Donelson & Armstrong, ever made propositions to them for the public printing? I will put another question to them. I ask these men—the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] is one of them—and if we have to go into this fight, we will contend brow to brow, and bosom to bosom—if the editor of the Southern Press did not approach that committee with a proposition to divide the spoils, but could not get it?

Mr. CLINGMAN. I know nothing about it; but the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] stated the other day that the editor of the Southern Press did not make any proposition to the committee.

Mr. POLK. Let any member of the committee answer my questions.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I do not care anything about it. The gentleman is endeavoring to get me upon a point to which I attach no weight. I am opposed to the giving of that printing to the Southern Press, Union, or any other political press.

Mr. POLK. I hope the gentleman will, in this connection, allow a member of the Printing Committee—the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON]—to state the facts.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. With the gentleman's permission—

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will, in a moment. I will give the gentleman an opportunity. I desire now to state what I understand to be the operation here. It may be that the editor of the Southern Press applied. I do not care if he did. The gentleman from Indiana said that he did not. That is a matter between the gentlemen. I am not the representative of the Southern Press, but I fully concur with the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. GORMAN. He made no proposition to me. He made no proposition that I know of.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I know nothing about it. That is a matter between the gentlemen. What I was speaking of when interrupted, Mr. Speaker, was the obvious effort made upon the part of the editors of the journals here interested to create the impression in the House—and we hear it all around the Hall—every one knows the attempt is being made—to force the measure through under that idea to enable them to get into the Treasury—under the idea that they had been performing important service in the saving of the Union, and making war upon extreme men. Gentlemen here press them forward under that idea. There is hardly a newspaper in which you do not see something about it. Look in the morning papers at the puffis which go out to the country. Look at the effort made to get up a strong impression in behalf of those individuals under the idea that they have performed patriotic public service. Now, to give you, Mr. Speaker, a notion of how high the services they have rendered are in the estimation of those who are pressing their claim here, let me state a case. Suppose a soldier had been in every battle of our late war with Great Britain, and brought away honorable scars—suppose that he had gone with Scott's column to Mexico, that he had fought at Buena Vista—that he had participated in all of the conflicts in Mexico, and I should introduce a proposition to give that man ten or twenty thousand dollars out of the public Treasury, how would it be received? It would be voted down at once. Unless I could show that he had actually been disabled in the public service, there is not a committee in this House which would vote to give him a dollar. No, sir, not one! They would not put him upon the pension roll. If I were to introduce a proposition to give a man who had struggled against a foreign enemy in any way, or a man who had filled all the civil departments of the Government, from the President down to the lowest, and who was now in poverty, a few thousand dollars out of the public Treasury, it would be voted down at once. Well, then, how grand must have been the services those two organs performed for the country to justify gentlemen in pressing their claims here upon that ground! They will make $100,000, $200,000, or $300,000 if they get the printing. Statements vary. According to a statement of Mr. Rives, from one class of printing alone—the census printing—they would, if 100,000 copies were printed, and the prices given as proposed, make nearly $1,000,000! I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, what I think we ought to do if this contract system cannot be carried out, and I have great doubts as to whether it can. Let us try the experiment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOTY], of a national establishment. I do not speak with reference to the details of his bill, as I have not sufficiently examined them. Let us appoint some man with a salary of $2,000 or $3,000, and let him hire workmen to do the public printing. Let us make that experiment. If you do that, you separate the press from the political control of this House. I am willing to start there. This is an additional reason why this matter should go to the Judiciary Committee. I hope that committee will report some system which will take from the Government, and every part of the Government, the control over the newspaper press. That can easily be done. Let it be provided that the paper in which are to be published the laws and advertisements shall be selected solely with reference to the largest circulation. The result would be that no party could exercise any control over the press.

The press is one of the great estates of this country. Every gentleman admits that it ought to be independent; but if the Government is able to control it here at the centre, the administration that happened to be in power could control it to a great extent, in all the States. Papers are selected upon the principle of favoritism, in which to publish the laws. Advertisements, and such favors, are extended to such papers as may agree in sentiment with the administration in power. By selecting a few leading papers at different points, to which they give these crumbs, they are enabled to control their party press. Now, that whole thing is wrong. For example: Every paper in this country, employed to print the laws and advertisements, should not be a Whig paper.

There is no reason why a Democratic paper should not have them sometimes. If the Democratic party come into power, it is wrong that Whig newspapers shall be excluded from every advertisement, and the publication of the laws. Every one will admit that. Let us then rid Congress of all control over the printing here, and pass proper laws, either such as I suggest, to make the printing depend upon the circulation, or do something else to remove control over the press, if possible. Then you will have an independent press, and the people will have a chance to get at the truth. I have occupied ten times as much of the time of the House as I had intended. My object was simply to throw out a few observations. I have been led away by questions of gentlemen upon the other side. I want to know from the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] whether he desires me to renew his motion, which I promised to do?

Mr. POLK. I consented to withdraw it on the condition that it should be renewed. I expect the gentleman to renew it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I, then, feel bound by my promise to renew it. I move to lay the whole matter upon the table, and upon that motion demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will withdraw that motion. I have but a very few remarks to make upon this subject, which I desire to make at this time.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I wish to address the House upon this subject also.

Mr. POLK. I relieve the gentleman from North Carolina from any obligation to renew my motion.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then I withdraw the motion I have just made.

Mr. JONES. I have, Mr. Speaker, but a very few remarks to make upon this subject, and I desire to make those in justification of the vote I expect to give upon this occasion. I expect to vote to lay this whole matter upon the table. However we may differ as to who should execute this work, whether Whig, Democrat, or Free-Soiler, or Southern-Rights man, I think every gentleman upon this floor has arrived at the same conclusion to which I have been irresistibly forced—and that is, that the present contractor, A. Boyd Hamilton, cannot execute the contract he has made with Congress to do the public printing. I do not say this to prejudice his case, or out of any disrespect to him. I would much have preferred that he had obtained this contract upon terms which would have enabled him to execute it as it should have been,—without loss, but with a fair equivalent for the time and labor devoted to its execution. Then, if that is so, if Congress are satisfied that the present contractor cannot execute the work, something is required to be done in order that it shall be executed. We have Executive communications made to us from the first to almost the last day of the session. It is important that these documents should be in the hands of the Representatives of the people, to enable them to legislate understandingly for the benefit of the country. It is important, then, that this work should be done; and if the present contractor cannot do it, something should be done by which the printing may be executed. The Joint Committee upon Printing of the two Houses, in the exercise of a power which they believe is vested in them by the joint resolution of 1846, have proposed to give this work—a portion of it to one firm, and a portion to another firm of this city. What is the objection to their doing this under these circumstances? Why, the great objection here to giving the work to Donelson & Armstrong—that ordered to be printed by the House—is, I believe, that they are Democrats. That, sir, is the only objection I have heard urged against them; but, Mr. Speaker, in the sincerity of my heart, I say to you, and this House, that it is no objection with me.

Mr. ORR. As one of those who object, I desire to say, that the price has as much to do with my objection, and more, than politics.

Mr. FLORENCE. I would also say that my objection is not based upon politics.

Mr. JONES. The principal objection urged against Gideon & Co. is, I believe, that they are Whigs. That would be a pretty good one with me, if I had the distribution of this patronage, if it may be so called. This is known, I presume, to a majority of those who occupy seats upon the other side of this Hall. I have said that I expected, or intended, to vote to lay this whole subject upon the table. I intend to so vote that this committee may have this work executed; and I hope that they will not stop at that. I hope that that committee will report to this House, and to the Senate, a proposition to repeal the joint resolution of 1846, providing for this contract system. I voted for that contract system, and I am satisfied that it has proved an utter failure. I am satisfied that it will not work well; and, so long as it is continued, and remains upon your statute book, that it will prove a fruitful source of discord, contention, and strife, in both ends of the Capitol. I hope that the committee will not stop at the point merely, of repealing this system, but that they will investigate this question, and consult with honest men, who are practical printers, in regard to it. There are printers by trade in this, and the other House. There are others in this city, and in the cities adjacent to this Capitol. I hope that committee will investigate this subject, and report to this House a bill establishing the prices for the public printing; and, that that being done, I hope that each House will elect its own printer. We can establish the prices, and we will have no individuals before us for whom we should vote favor at the time. Then let each House elect its printer, and let him do the work. Let each House, for itself, through its committee, superintend the quality of paper, and the execution of the work, and report, from time to time, if it is according to the law, or the conditions which the law may require. My friend from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] says, let the House buy the paper. I would have no objection to that; but, as a commentary upon this House buying paper, walk into the room adjoining the post office, where each member is supplied with stationery. It is done upon this low-bid system—this contract system.

The contractors furnish samples when they bid, to the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate, and these gentlemen say that they hardly ever furnish an article equal to the sample. If you are going to buy the paper, send your agent into the market, as you would go yourselves, to select the material, and when he finds an article suitable for the purpose, let him purchase it at a fair price, and not offer a bonus to dishonest men to swindle the Government. Then, suppose this should be done. First, I will say that I am opposed to this printing bureau project. I think that it will be one of the most fruitful sources of favoritism and abuse that can be conceived and carried into practice. How will you fix the compensation of the hands, who are to work in this great printing establishment of the United States? There are printers scattered all over this country. I believe they have printers in every Congressional district in the United States, except that of my friend from Accomac, [Mr. BAYLY.] [Laughter.] and members of this House and the other House—

Mr. BAYLY. The gentleman has referred to a fact, which has been very often referred to in this House, that the district I represent, with twelve counties in it, has not a newspaper in it. [Laughter.] I am happy to admit that such is the fact. We have no large towns in that district, and I regard as a great nuisance a village press. The reason that such presses cannot live in my district is, that my people are a well-educated and thrifty people, and they prefer to take metropolitan and city papers, which are well edited, to taking little miserable village papers. I will lay a wager, [cries of "Oh, no! oh, no!" and laughter,] I will venture the assertion then, [laughter,] that there are more Intelligencers, more Unions, more Enquirers and Whigs, leading political papers, taken in my district, than in any country district represented upon this floor.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman says that his towns are small, and will not support a paper. If you establish this printing bureau, there will not be a district represented upon this floor, but what will have some of these small towns unable to support the printer, and he will be brought here perhaps for his partisan services to his friends, and forced into that bureau. He will not come here to do work. He will come here to be quartered upon the Government, and in all probability you will have five times as many of these printers here, as John C. Rives would have in his establishment, or any other good printer, to do the same amount of work. You would have continual applications here to increase the compensation, for extra compensation, and all sorts of propositions would be brought forward here from that establishment. These are a few of the evils, which I think would result from it, and which determine me uncompromisingly against having that work executed in such a manner. I desire that the prices shall be fixed, and, when fixed, that each House shall elect its own printer. In my opinion it is the very best system which can be adopted, and the only one which will work well. You ask me for whom I would vote, if this question were to come on now? I have no hesitation in saying it here, and to the world, that I would vote for Donelson & Armstrong. Are there any more worthy or better men in this country than they are? I ask the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] who addressed the House this morning, and I ask also my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] if he was here, and in the majority, and this printing was to be given out, would he not vote for those who agree with either one or the other of them, as the case may be? I would myself, and I have no doubt—

Mr. CLINGMAN. If the gentleman will allow me, I will answer the gentleman's question. I admit, if you had by law the right to elect a printer, and were obliged to elect him, that gentleman and myself might vote for our friends; but I am opposed to the system, because I think it a bad one; and I am especially opposed, while we have another system in operation under the law, to resorting to this system in violation of the law.

Mr. JONES. I object to this system, because we are fighting about the prices and about individuals at the same time. Let us fix the prices when we have no individuals before us, and then let us contest the matter, who they shall be, when we have settled upon the prices.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If the gentleman will allow me, I will beg leave to remind him, that when Congress have, in two or three instances—he will recollect the case of Gales & Seaton—fixed the prices and elected the printer, and he has agreed to do the printing at those prices, that his friends, being in power, have come in at the end of the session and enlarged the prices, just as they attempted to do with Mr. Ritchie.

Mr. JONES. These were your political friends when they had the power.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am not justifying it, and I am only reminding the gentleman that his suggestion will not answer the purpose. It was done by the Whigs, and was attempted to be done by the Democrats, and would have been done in the last Congress, but for a few outsiders who defeated it.

Mr. JONES. There was a law, as the gentleman will recollect, fixing the price for the printing of Congress. When this House came to elect a printer, they fixed it in the resolution which provided for the election of a printer that he should do the work at fifteen per cent., I believe, less than the prices of 1819. After he had executed the work, at the close of the Twenty-seventh Congress, his friends came forward and said that the House could not repeal a law by its own action, and deprive him of the prices designated by law. The case will be different if you fix the prices by law, and elect a printer under that law. But I have said that I would vote for Donelson & Armstrong. I ask gentlemen here, every one of them, to say, when they come to elect a printer, if they would not do the same thing, and vote for the men who concurred with them in political opinions and principles—who were not only thus situated towards them, but were their personal as well as political friends? I take it that there is no man upon this floor who will say nay to that proposition. Then, I ask gentlemen, what objection can those of us, at least those who claim to be Democrats, who are of the compromise school of Democrats as designated at present, have to voting for Donelson & Armstrong? Major Donelson is not only well known to this Congress, but to the country. He has occupied various important public political trusts under the Government, and I believe that his escutcheon is untarnished by the breath of slander, or in any other way. He stands before the country as a man of honor and of integrity.

Now, sir, the other gentleman who is associated with Major Donelson in the Union establishment of this city, is not so well known to this House as Major Donelson; he is not, perhaps, so well known to the country. I believe the inquiry has been made in this House, "Who is General Armstrong?" At least the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. EVANS] said, he did not know him. Well, Mr. Speaker, General Robert Armstrong is a native of the State of Tennessee, from which I hail. He has been raised, and has spent his days, up to the time when he came on here, as a citizen of Tennessee, and in all the relations of life, public and private, his character and course have been marked by an honor and integrity unsurpassed by that of any other man in that State, or in any other State.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment? I merely want to say that my remarks certainly will not bear the construction which the gentleman from Tennessee seems to have put upon them.

Mr. JONES. Oh no; I did not say they would.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I have a great respect for Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong personally. I think highly of them—very highly.

Mr. JONES. I was referring to a remark made some time since by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. EVANS,] not now in his seat.

Mr. GENTRY. Will my colleague allow me to perform a pleasing duty in reference to the gentlemen of whom he is speaking?

Mr. JONES. Yes, I will yield the floor to my colleague.

Mr. GENTRY. Not that these gentlemen need any indorsement or certificate from me in regard to their standing or character, but simply from the fact that they are of adverse politics, I volunteer to adopt all that my colleague has said in relation to Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong, as individual citizens.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, General Robert Armstrong, from the days of his youth, was the confidential and bosom friend of Andrew Jackson; and that great and illustrious man—the greatest of his age—when he came to lay down his life, bequeathed that sword, with which he achieved the glorious victory of the 8th of January, 1815, to this same humble individual, General Robert Armstrong, with the confident belief in his breast, that it would ever be wielded by him to whom he had bequeathed it, in defense of that country, whose liberties he so cherished. And, sir, as my colleague said, General Jackson never mistook a man. He always knew his man before he intrusted him with his confidence.

But, sir, General Armstrong is not dependent merely upon the friendship of General Jackson for his history and character. He was at the battle of Emucklaw, in the Creek war of 1814, and commanded one of the most gallant companies of artillery that ever fought in the maintenance of the rights of these United States. In that battle, he fell, as was thought by some, mortally wounded. His exclamation then, to those around him was, "Boys, don't give up the guns." This, sir, is who General Robert Armstrong is—a man who stands before the country and before the world, of as high-souled honor, as unsullied integrity, as pure patriotism, and as sound democracy, as any man in it.

Mr. FITCH. I feel some delicacy in saying anything upon this subject. The charge of coalition has been so freely made here, that I fear there may be an attempt to make me a party to it. Heretofore, however, I believe, it has only been charged that the members of the committee, of opposite politics, have coalesced, for certain purposes of their own, and that, in the House, a coalition has been formed to defeat their action, between the extremes upon both sides—the State-Rights men and the Free-Soilers. Now, as you very well know, I occupy something of a conservative position. I am not among those who would encourage runaway slaves on the one side, nor am I, on the other side, among those who would dissolve the Union because slaves will run away. I cannot, therefore, be properly classed with either of these sectional parties, and I cannot, consequently, be justly charged with being a party to any coalition they may make. But I do not believe in this thing of a coalition so suddenly developing itself here, in the House. Its existence is imaginary.

I wish, very briefly, to give a view of the action of this committee from a point different from that presented by my colleague, [Mr. GORMAN,] the chairman of the Committee on Printing; and it is because the chairman of the committee is my colleague, that I prefer that the expression of my views should precede my vote.

I acknowledge the binding force and obligation of party usage. I pay as much deference to such usage as any member upon this floor, in all proper matters. I acknowledge, likewise, adhesion to party principles; obligation either to defend them when assailed, or no longer to consider myself as a part and parcel of the party proclaiming them. But when I see an effort made—not designedly, probably, but having that effect—when I see an effort made to pervert party machinery in such a manner as to make it conducive to the prostration of the best interests of the country, or the violation of a settled policy and existing law, I cannot follow the lead. Attempted leading of a like injudicious character has developed anew differences here among Democrats, which otherwise might soon have been healed by time; or, if the lead has been followed by a majority, has placed us in a false position before the country.

Let me say in the outset, that I am not the advocate of the contractor for public printing. I do not know him, and even if I did, should have no disposition to appear here as his defender. Indeed I admit prejudice against him; but prejudice shall not govern my action, unless proof is adduced to sustain it. He may or may not be able to fulfill his contract. The committee say he is not. Members upon this floor say he is not. But I have no proof of it, other than the delay in the delivery of one class of printing—a delay which we know occurs during every Congress almost to as great an extent as it has done during this. But I will admit that the public printer has violated his contract, and still I cannot vote to sustain the action of the committee. I may as well state here, that my objection to sustaining the action of the committee, grows out of no dislike, personal or political, to Donelson & Armstrong. I have none of the political objections to those gentlemen which were avowed by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE,] not long since; and I wish to say to that gentleman, in this connection, that not only do I sustain the policy of the Union, and esteem most of its political principles highly conservative, but that any attempt—although I do not suppose that he will make any—to ingraft principles of an opposite character upon the Democratic creed, cannot succeed, and must result in the overwhelming defeat of himself and those who act with him.

Mr. VENABLE. Did I understand my friend—

Mr. FITCH. Simply as saying I did not believe you would attempt to ingraft the grounds of your objections to Donelson & Armstrong upon the Democratic creed.

Mr. VENABLE. It is but justice to myself, and to the parties concerned, to say that I have no personal objection to Messrs. Donelson & Armstrong; my remarks concerning them were purely political. I am no creed-maker for one party or the other. I am rather a free-fighter than otherwise. I never make creeds for the Democratic party, for the Whig party, or for the Federal party; but I know what Democratic doctrines are, what Whig doctrines are, and what Federal doctrines are. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana, that I have never endeavored to enlarge, or diminish, or alter the Democratic creed, or to ingraft any new principles upon it. According to the strictest sect of our religion, I have been considered a Democrat for the last thirty or forty years. I have never taken from the Democratic creed or added to it.

Mr. FITCH. I did not understand the gentleman from North Carolina as objecting, personally, to the editors of the Union, but only to the principles avowed in their paper—principles which he could not sanction by voting them any portion of the public patronage. I have said that I have not only no personal objection to those gentlemen, but that I have no objection to the principles which they avow. On the contrary, sir, if the contract system was annulled, and the House was called upon to elect printers, I might prefer them to almost any other men, and cast my vote accordingly. But there is the difficulty; the contract system is in force, and the committee had no right to assume legislative power, and practically repeal it, without the consent of the House.

Sir, the contract system was adopted in order to avoid the objections which were brought on all hands against the old system of election. It is well known that system was a corrupt one, and that there never was an election of printer to Congress which was not mingled, more or less, with intrigue, coalition, and corruption; and there never was a printer elected by Congress who did not subsequently ask for some modification of the terms of the contract under which he was required to do the printing. We know that political printers were paid by their party when in a majority, some $40,000 over and above the price at which they undertook to do the printing of Congress. And where a bonus in that shape was not given, it was customary for the elected printers to charge extras, not strictly permitted by the terms of election, but which were allowed by the committees and by Congress, in order—not to compensate them for their losses, for they pretended to no losses—but to make up the profits to which they thought they were entitled.

Well, sir, that system was repealed—repealed, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] well said, by a Democratic Congress. A gentleman then representing, in part, my State was chairman of the Committee on Printing. He urged the adoption of the contract system as the right one. It was so esteemed by the people, and no statement made here, before the system has had a fair trial, can convince them to the contrary. If it has not been found to work well, the fault is in the manner in which the system has been managed, and not in the system itself. Why should there be any more objection to the contract system for the public printing than for supplies to the Army, or for the transportation of the mails? You do not elect the gentlemen who perform such service. They take contracts according to bids, and are expected to fulfill those contracts. If the system is mismanaged, the mismanagement is mostly our own fault.

My objections to the action of the committee will be stated briefly, for I wish to occupy as little of the time of the House as possible. Their action was improper, inasmuch as they have assumed, and so reported to the House, that the contract is violated, without adducing any satisfactory proof of the correctness of their assumption, and without giving the contractor notice of their final intention with regard to the contract. The contractor, as I understand it, denies not that he received no notice that action of some kind would be had upon the part of this committee, but that he was specifically notified of their intention to annul in part the contract with him, and give the work to somebody else. And I do not understand the committee to assert that they did give him such notice.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me for a moment to submit a question to my colleague upon the committee? [Mr. GORMAN.] I desire to know of him whether he did not go, personally, to this contractor and tell him what we designed to do—if he did not show how much he was in default, and propose to give Mr. Hamilton a written notice to that effect?

Mr. GORMAN. I went to Mr. Hamilton in the Hall, and said to him, "We are going to take some action upon this matter of public printing, wherein we suppose you have failed, and want to see you. Do you want a written notice?" "By no means," says he, "I will be sure to be there." And, in obedience to that notice, he did go before the committee, where I saw him—where the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] saw him, and where the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] saw him. And the course of the contractor in relation to this matter, has only added insult to injury.

Mr. FITCH. That is precisely the case I put. I said there was no doubt that the contractor had received notice of some action upon the part of the committee, but that he had received no specific notice of the kind of action which that committee was to take. He had not been notified that they intended to declare this contract null and void, and of their further intention to give the printing to somebody else.

Mr. GORMAN. My friend has fallen into an error in this. We have not abrogated the contract.

Mr. FITCH. I will come to that presently.

Mr. GORMAN. We have not only not abrogated this contract, but, on the contrary, we have expressly pursued that contract, insisting that he should execute his contract, and requiring that he should pay all damages.

Mr. FITCH. I will come to that presently. I am aware that the committee have not formally abrogated the contract. But, first, I will proceed with stating my objections to their action. Their action was further improper in bestowing the work upon partisan editors—the favorites of members of the committee—and highly improper in bestowing a portion of it—half or more—upon an editor, or publisher, whose opinions, and those expressed in his paper, differ with those of three fifths of the members of both Houses of Congress. If the work is to be given to partisan editors, why not give it to those whose opinions coincide with those of a majority here? It is wrong to bestow it, unless as a contractor by a bid, where all can compete, upon any partisan, but especially upon one whose paper has teemed with abuse of a majority of those who are to bestow the patronage, and whose office has poured forth slanders by the wholesale upon the party of that majority. I allude to Gideon & Co. It is true, that it was said yesterday, that the Gideon & Co. who were included in this new printing distribution, were not the Gideon & Co. of the Republic. But I apprehend such subterfuge—

Mr. GORMAN. That was in relation to the bid, not in relation to our present arrangement.

Mr. FITCH. I object further to the action of this committee, because they have left in the hands of the public printer a very large branch of the public printing, of which they declare he has delayed or neglected the execution, and has not laid upon our tables within a reasonable time. The second section of the law under which the committee acts, very clearly implies that it is their duty to see to that portion of the public printing which is neglected or delayed. But we have the admission of the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] that every class of the printing is well done, and delivered according to the contract, except class No. 4—that of Executive documents; while we have the testimony of the chairman of that committee, [Mr. GORMAN,] that this very class, or a large portion of it, is left in the hands of the printer; while matter of the other classes, which they admit he executes properly and promptly, is retained, and has not been put in the hands of the printer at all. The committee have withheld, in part, the work from him, but not of the only class which it appears they charge him with neglecting or delaying, and now endeavor to prejudice us against him, by attributing to him "neglect or delay" of the whole work, including that which they have never given, and for the delay of which they are responsible. Their duty under the law very clearly was to have taken that which the contractor had delayed or neglected to execute, and bestowed it upon some one else, charging the contractor the difference between what they paid for it and the contract price. But instead of doing this, they have left this portion of it in his hands, still further to be delayed, while they have withheld from him work he might have done, and which they admit he previously had done, and properly. What better grounds could he have for coming here hereafter, with a claim for indemnity? All he will have to do to establish a claim, will be to prove that the committee have withheld from him the work which he was ready to execute—proof which it will not be difficult to obtain, when the admission of the committee furnish him with most of it.

Mr. GORMAN. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, I will say that we should have taken this work from him long ago, but for the fact that we could not agree who to give it to. We could not agree upon any one to make a contract with.

In reference to this withholding work from the public printer, I will say that we do not put this work into the hands of the printer. That is the business of the Clerk of the House of Representatives and of the Secretary of the Senate. If they have gone to him it is their fault. But we could not take this document, which he has delayed or neglected to print, out of his hands, until we could agree upon some one to give the printing to.

Mr. FITCH. Mr. Speaker, it would certainly have been as well for the committee to have taken those documents out of the contractor's hands, and retained them till they could have found some one to do the work, as to leave them to be delayed in his hands, and better than to have withheld those which they have never presented to him, and which,

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

SATURDAY, APRIL 17, 1852.

NEW SERIES...No. 69.

if we are to judge by his own assertion, and the admission of the committee, he would have executed long ago.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I am not aware that the committee have withheld from the printer any document, except the first part of the Patent Office report. That is a document which, if printed at all, must be printed all alike; and when we get the balance of it, we will then dispose of it. It will be time enough for that when the whole of it is before us. I am not aware that, with this exception, anything has been withheld from the public printer.

Mr. FITCH. If I am not mistaken, my colleague [Mr. GORMAN] stated to the House that a large portion of other branches than Executive documents of the printing had been withheld; but if I am, let him correct me. Such was my understanding, and I presume that of the House generally, of his statement. Now, I am no lawyer; and it is sometimes said that common sense and law are contradictory—are incompatible; but I should think the common-sense reading of the second section of the law of 1846 dictates a course to the committee contrary to that pursued by them in this matter. It was their duty to have taken away from the contractor that work which he had delayed or neglected to deliver according to the contract, and not to have withheld that which he professes to be, and probably is, prepared to execute, and has heretofore executed. I object, further, to the action of this committee, because they have assumed to themselves legislative powers—powers which were never delegated to them. They have assumed the power of practically annulling, or suspending during this Congress, the contract system—a power resting with Congress only.

I come now to the remark made by my colleague [Mr. GORMAN] a short time since, that the committee had not abrogated the contract with Mr. Hamilton. Disguise it as you may, the action of this committee amounts to a virtual abrogation of this contract, and to a suspension of the contract system, for the present Congress at least. They have assumed to say who shall, and who shall not, be the public printer; to turn out Mr. Hamilton, and substitute others. While the contract system is in force, that system declares who shall be the public printer, viz: the lowest bidder. If that system is to be repealed, it is for us to repeal it; and with us only then will rest the power of electing a printer, or pointing out the manner of his selection. The committee have nothing to do with either, except to enforce the contract while it exists. They cannot usurp the power to annul it, or elect a printer. If they believed the contractor could not carry out his contract, why did they not come here, and declare that the contract was void; that the contractor had violated it, and ask the advice and direction of the House in the matter? But instead of pursuing this, which would have been the proper course, they proceed to elect a printer for the whole of the present Congress; and though they do not formally abrogate the contract, yet they must know that the only possible result of their action, as regards the present contract, must be its abrogation; for they propose to withhold from the contractor those portions of the work which he can and has promptly executed, and leave with him only that portion, his delay of which, they allege, has already violated his contract.

Mr. FREEMAN. Will the gentleman permit me to call the attention of the House to the second section of this law? It is as follows:

“And he it further resolved, That a committee, consisting of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives, shall be chosen by their respective Houses, which shall constitute a Committee on Printing, which shall have power to adopt such measures as shall be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect or delay on the part of the contractor to execute the work ordered by Congress, and to make a pro rata reduction in the compensation allowed, or to refuse the work altogether, should it be deemed inferior to the standard; and in all cases, the contractor and his securities shall be responsible for any increased expenditure consequent upon the non-performance of the contract. The committee shall audit and pass upon all accounts for printing, but no bill shall be acted upon for work that is not actually executed and delivered, and which they may require to be properly authenticated.”

Mr. FITCH. This committee have the power to do what? To declare that the contract is void, and that some one else shall do the work? No, sir; they have the power to remedy any “neglect or delay” in the delivery of the work; and did they do that? On the contrary, by their own confession, they have left all that work in the hands of the public printer with which they charge him with “neglect or delay,” and withheld other portions of it from him which he has heretofore promptly executed. Is that remedying the “neglect or delay?” Leaving that which, according to their own statement, is delayed to still further delay and neglect, and withholding other printing which he was prepared to execute and deliver! Is that what the law contemplated? Clearly not.

Mr. FREEMAN. Does the gentleman assume that this House is to be the judge of the discretion to be allowed the committee?

Mr. FITCH. Most certainly.

Mr. FREEMAN. Well, sir, this committee has by law discretionary power. Now, there is not a judge in the land; there is not a court in the land, which is allowed to exercise discretionary powers, which is not decided to be a court from which there is no appeal as to matters of discretion merely. Now, I undertake to say, as a legal proposition, that when discretionary powers are given by law to this committee to judge what is necessary in the case, it is not for any member upon this floor to say when they shall or shall not exercise that discretion.

Mr. FITCH. I am not learned in the law, but I fancy when the gentleman has been in Congress even the short time I have, he will find that we do constantly exercise control over our committees. They have never assumed the power of acting irresponsible to this House. They have no such power; they cannot have, from the very nature and manner of their constitution.

Mr. DUNHAM. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FITCH. Why, I am beset on all sides by lawyers.

Mr. DUNHAM. I desire to inquire of the gentleman, whether we can exercise control over the jurisdiction of committees where that jurisdiction is fixed by law?

Mr. FITCH. We give a power, a jurisdiction, relative to the extent of which there is a difference of opinion. Who shall decide that difference, and define that extent—the agent or the principal, the creature or the creator, the committee or the body which constituted it and gave it whatever of power it has? It was the duty of the committee to have sought the advice and action of those under whose authority it was acting—not attempt the exercise of even a doubtful power, much less the usurpation of one never contemplated to be bestowed upon them. They have attempted to make themselves greater than the separate bodies which created them.

Another objection to their action is, that it was concealed from this House, and probably ever would have been concealed, until we had known it by its effects—by having printing laid upon our desks from some one else than the contractor—had it not been for the introduction of the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN.] That resolution elicited what the committee had done, and what they proposed to do; and the frequently-expressed sentiment of the House since the matter has been under discussion, has, as I have reason to believe, changed the original determination of the committee; and it will be still further changed if the power is left in their hands.

I object to it again, upon grounds somewhat personal to the members of the committee. I object to it because it subjects the committee to the imputation and the charge of having been governed, in the distribution of this printing, by improper motives. It subjects them, in fact, to the charge of having done precisely what some members of the committee charge others upon this floor with having done—entered into a coalition, not upon principle, but for patronage and for money. I have no idea that any such motive governed any member of that committee, but they should have anticipated that the charge would be made; and it will be made, and it is no answer to the charge that another coalition has been entered into here. Two wrongs never make a right. If there is another coalition here, it does not justify one upon their part. I say again, however, that I have no idea that motive governed their action. But the charge will be made, and may as well be alluded to here, and now, that they may prepare to defend it—for defend it they must; and so must every man who votes to sustain their action. Having no disposition to place myself in that predicament, I shall not so vote. I will make myself no party to a transaction of the kind they contemplate. I will make myself no party to a political warfare, wherein I will be compelled to defend the very course which, a few years since, the Democratic party itself opposed. It is but a short time since the Democratic party repealed the law of the elective printing system. Shall we now place ourselves in the inconsistent position of repealing what we have done, and defending what we once condemned? On the contrary, if this contract system is to be repealed, I prefer at once the adoption of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. DORR,] or some other, to the old system, condemned because of the well-founded charges that intrigue, coalition, and improper motives were permitted to enter into the election of the printer. I have done.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, here obtained the floor.

Mr. STANLY. Has the gentleman from Kentucky the floor?

The SPEAKER. (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, being in the chair.) He has.

Mr. STANLY. I do not object; but four on that side, and one on this—it is rather hard. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the considerations which influenced him in giving the floor to that gentleman.

Mr. STANLY. I do not desire any explanation.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair prefers to give his reason. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] is a member of the committee.

Mr. STANLY. That is all right—I am glad to hear it; but five to one is pretty hard.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, said: I am, unfortunately, a member of the Printing Committee, and if I were not, I should not now trespass upon the indulgence of the House, wearied as it must be with this discussion. But, I think I have a right, under the circumstances, to avail myself of the opportunity of stating the reasons which, to my mind, justify the course I have thought proper to pursue, as a member of that committee, in assigning such of the public printing to Donelson & Armstrong, and Gideon & Co., as the present contractor could not, or would not do.

In connection with this subject, much has been said upon this floor about a supposed coalition entered into by the committee; and I am placed in the category of those who are charged with entering into a combination with men differing from me in political sentiment, to secure for the publishers of the Union a portion of the public patronage. From the manner in which this charge has been made elsewhere, and repeated here, it may be supposed that corrupt motives are implied. So far as my own action is involved, I say to the House and the world, that such imputations are not true, and that I had no agency in any combination or coalition of any kind. My sole motive, in the course I pursued, was an honest desire to secure to the House, in the most speedy manner, the printing which was necessary for legislative and other purposes. I believe my colleagues upon said committee were each and all of them actuated by the like honest intention; and I affirm, in denial of the statements which have been made here, that no coalition, for any political or other purpose, was made by that committee, or any of its members.

No combination or coalition for any purpose was talked of by the members of the committee, or any attempt made to form one for the purposes charged. The only thing which occurred that had any semblance of a coalition, originated with the editor of the Southern Press, and which has been alluded to by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Polk.] In relation to this I should have been silent, if he had not called the attention of the House to it, and appealed to me to disclose the circumstances.

When it was known that the contractor, Mr. Hamilton, would not be able to complete the public printing in the time limited by the contract, and at a period when it would be useful for legislative purposes, the committee had a meeting, talked over the matter, and, without any hesitation, came unanimously to the conclusion that the public interest demanded some immediate steps to be taken to remedy the default. It was determined, that the delay which had taken place in the delivery of the work, the bad materials upon which it was printed, and the known want of pecuniary means of the contractor to carry on the work, were enough to justify the committee in the exercise of the power conferred upon them by the law of Congress on the subject. I voted to give the work, which could not be done by the contractor, to Donelson & Armstrong, and this I did before I ever had a word of conversation with them upon the subject. The House has been already informed of the action of the committee in endeavoring to unite upon some one to do the work. While this struggle was progressing in the committee, Mr. Elwood Fisher, one of the editors of the Southern Press, and the leader of the State-Rights party, came to me, as a member of the committee, and proposed a combination between him and the editors of the Union, requesting that the printing should be divided between these two presses. He informed me that such a combination would produce a union between the State-Rights party of the South and the national Democratic party. I frankly informed him that I thought it would be utterly impossible for him to get any part of it; that under no circumstances could he calculate upon more than two votes in the committee; that there were but two men upon it from Southern States, and he had nothing to expect from the four other gentlemen who were Northern men. I told him, that to secure the speedy execution of the work, I would go for his press, and I would have voted for him, or any other man in the Union, who would do the work speedily and upon good terms, if the committee could have united upon him. But that was impossible. I did not believe that any political idea was involved in the result, and could not see how any political effect was to be produced by simply employing men as a temporary necessity to do the portion of the public printing not executed by the contractor. Mr. Fisher, finding that his efforts to secure a portion of the printing by persuasion was unavailable, tried what could be accomplished by threats. He informed me that if we entered into a combination between Donelson & Armstrong and other persons, and did not associate him in the arrangement, that it would be a proscription of the Southern Press, and he would make war to the knife upon the Democratic party. He avowed that the whole State-Rights party would go off in a body, and that he and they would do all they could to defeat the Democratic candidate for the Presidency.

Mr. WOODWARD. Mr. Speaker, with the indulgence of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Stanton,] I will make a single observation. He imputes to the Southern-Rights party a wish to have the Southern Press included in the arrangement with the Union and the Republic, and refers to a supposed threat from the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown,] that the exclusion of the Press would be avenged by that party. Now, I suppose there is not on this floor a single member less disinclined to see a war break out between the Southern-Rights party and those disposed to make war upon them, or who would go into that war with more promptitude than myself; and yet I declare that I do not know a single member of the Southern-Rights party, including myself, who has taken any step whatever to obtain for the Press a participation in the public printing, or with whom such a thing has been an object. There is not one, as I believe, who would vote for the proposition of the Committee on Printing, though the Press were included with the Union and the Republic. We do not object to Donelson & Armstrong because they are Democrats, or to others for being Whigs; our objection to them is that they are party editors, and not printers.

Mr. STANTON. I certainly acquit my honorable friend from South Carolina, [Mr. Woodward,] and all other Southern-Rights men in this House, from any participation whatever in an effort to make that combination. Mr. Fisher had this conversation with me in the rotunda of the Capitol.

Mr. WOODWARD. I can only say that Mr. Fisher had the perfect right to do it.

Mr. STANTON. The first attack made upon the subject was made by the Southern Press, and my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown,] reiterates to some extent what was said by the Press; and his language might well be construed into the same sort of a threat, that the Southern branch of the Democratic party would go off and not unite with us in the election of a President.

Mr. BROWN. Will the gentleman indulge me for a moment?

Mr. STANTON. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. If I was understood in any thing I said yesterday, or the day before, or at any other time, as intimating directly or indirectly a threat that the Southern-Rights, or State-Rights party, or any portion of the Southern people, would be governed in the presidential canvass by the action of this House upon this question, then I say I have been misunderstood. What I meant to say was this: that if the Press, which reflected the views of a portion of the Southern people, was proscribed—and it was stated that it had been proscribed—because it reflected the views of a portion of the Southern people, I thought it exceedingly probable that the votes of those people could not be relied upon in the presidential election. I did not mean to say what they would do. I had no authority to speak for them. The remarks I made were by way of argument, or rather by way of friendly suggestions, that it was better not to proscribe the press which reflected the views of anybody, and gave as a reason for doing so that it reflected those views. If you calculated upon the votes of the friends of that press, such policy was decidedly bad.

Mr. STANTON. I do not think the gentleman's explanation alters the case at all.

Mr. FREEMAN. I would like to ask my colleague [Mr. Brown] a question. From the remarks that were made yesterday, it may be presumed that my colleague [Mr. Brown] considers the Southern Press of this city, the organ of some portion of the Democratic party in the State of Mississippi. I do not believe that it is; and if it be, will my colleague state who it is that the Southern Press represents in the State of Mississippi?

Mr. BROWN. It represents, like all other papers, its patrons, and those who agree with the opinions it expresses. I stated yesterday, explicitly—I thought, sufficiently explicit to be understood by everybody—that my action in the presidential election would not be controlled by anything you might do, in reference to the Southern Press. But it has its patrons in the South, and most of them belong to the Democratic party; and I say again, that if you proscribe it, because it is the organ of those for whom it speaks, they will, perhaps, resent the injuries.

Mr. FREEMAN. Then, I understand my colleague to say that the Southern Press is not the organ of any organized party, or any party that has heretofore been organized in the State of Mississippi?

Mr. BROWN. I do not know that it is. I do not undertake to say whose organ it is. It was established here, as must be recollected by those who were members of the last Congress, upon the recommendation of a large number of gentlemen, some of them now the leaders of the Union party. I recollect the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Toombs,] was one of the sponsors when that paper was started, or rather when it was accouched and brought into existence. I do not know whether it is his organ now or not. I recollect, too, that certain distinguished gentlemen, in the other branch of Congress, now active and leading Union men, recommended it to the Southern people. They have never withdrawn their recommendation. Whether it is their organ now or not, I do not know. But they established it; they recommended it to the Southern people, and told them that it was a capital good paper, and many of them subscribed for it on their recommendation. Messrs. Dawson, Mangum, and others of the Senate; and Messrs. Toombs, Stephens, and various other gentlemen of this House, united in this recommendation. If those are responsible who brought it into existence, the Union men may respond for the Southern Press.

Mr. FREEMAN. I doubt not but that there are a great many persons who subscribe to that paper; but my own opinion is, that the number of persons in the State of Mississippi who agree with the sentiments of that paper are exceedingly few. I think a strong impression will be created from my colleague's remarks, that that paper is his organ.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. I never said any such thing.

Mr. FREEMAN. I would not have such an opinion prevail, whatever may be the difference between my colleague and myself in regard to the doctrine of secession. I do not desire the opinion to go out here, from any remark he might make, that the balance of the delegation agree with the sentiments uttered in that paper in relation to the doctrine of secession and dissolution, or that they are the opinions of any respectable portion of the community of Mississippi. I would ask my colleague if the Southern Press is his organ?

Mr. BROWN. One solitary word upon the subject of organs. My colleague asks me—

Mr. DEAN. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. BROWN. I hope I am not again to be ruled down on a point of order.

A Voice. Let Mr. Brown reply to his colleague.

Mr. BROWN. I have only to say in reply—

Mr. DEAN. I rise to a point of order. Is the debate between the two gentlemen from Mississippi in order?

Mr. BROWN. I will say that the Southern Press is not my organ. I am my own organ.

The SPEAKER, (Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, in the chair.) It has been the practice of the House during this session for the gentleman in occupancy of the floor to yield it to another gentleman; and upon one occasion the present occupant of the Chair took an appeal from a decision to that effect, and the House sustained the decision.

Mr. DEAN. My point is, that the discussion is irrelevant.

Mr. POLK. I call the gentleman from New York to order. I do not see any point in his point of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. STANTON, (resuming.) I alluded to this subject for the reasons I have stated, and because the Southern Press was the first to attack the committee, denouncing its action as a flagitious outrage. I repeat, that I know of no other attempt at coalition than this made by Mr. Fisher, and the effect of his disappointment has been seen in the columns of his paper.

Allusion has been made, by my honorable friend from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown,] to the fact, that there was a Senator from Connecticut upon that committee, who happened to be a Whig and a Free-Soiler; and he places me beside him as forming a sort of unholy coalition for corrupt purposes.

Mr. BROWN. No; not for corrupt purposes.

Mr. STANTON. Political purposes, then. I do not think it necessary to say more than I have already to exculpate myself from the imputation of political motives in voting as I did in the committee. It is due, however, to truth, and the honorable Senator referred to, [Mr. Truman Smith,] to say that he was not in favor of giving any portion of the printing to the conductors of a political press. He was warmly in favor of giving the work to John T. Towers, a practical printer, and former printer to Congress. He opposed the Republic to the last moment; and it was only after every other expedient had failed, and, under the stern necessity of the case, that he yielded and gave his vote to the two firms which were selected by the committee. I have no reason to believe that he did not act from a sense of public duty, and with the sole desire to do what he deemed best for the public interest.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose to state briefly the reasons which made it necessary to give a portion of the public printing to other persons. I think they are such, when calmly considered, as will fully justify the committee in the course they have thought proper to pursue. The contractor, on the third day of March, 1851, executed his contract to do the public printing for the Thirty-second Congress. Its terms are such as to require him to execute the work, in all respects, in a better manner than the printing heretofore has been done. I have the contract now before me, signed by himself and his securities. It stipulates that the work shall be done according to a sample attached to the instrument, and made part of it. A further requirement is, that the paper shall weigh fifty pounds to the ream, and be of a quality equal to a sample which is also attached, and made part of the contract. Now, sir, these provisions of the contract are such, that, if he had fully complied with them, would have secured to Congress better work and better materials than any ever before furnished by the predecessors of Mr. Hamilton. It is not the fault of the committee that these provisions were in the contract. The law prescribed the duty of the committee, and our course was plain, and we had no alternative but to enforce the contract as we found it. We had no power to vary its terms. The paper heretofore used had never been equal to what was required by Mr. Hamilton's contract, perhaps never to exceed forty pounds to the ream. The paper agreed to be furnished by Mr. Hamilton weighed fifty pounds to the ream, and upon this quality of paper the whole work was to be executed.

The Committee on Printing met at an early day of the session, organized itself, and entered upon the discharge of its duties. It was not long, however, before it was apparent to every member that the contractor was a mere man of straw, who had undertaken this work—not with the expectation of carrying it on in good faith—and I quote his own statement when I say so, because he gave the committee, during an interview we had with him, distinctly to understand that he did not expect fully to comply with the terms of the contract—but relied upon the indulgence of the committee to allow him to do the work upon an inferior quality of paper. This would have been a fraud upon Congress which the committee could not tolerate; and he was promptly informed of it. I came then to the House, and in the course of a debate which was progressing at the time, announced the fact that the public printer was greatly in default with the public printing, and that he did not expect to execute it in good faith. The next morning he laid upon your table a statement flatly contradicting what I had said, and containing as reckless a string of misstatements as that laid upon your table yesterday. I deemed it necessary, not knowing much of the man, and never having seen him before the interview in the committee-room, to vindicate my own veracity. I was fortified by the statements of the members of the House who belonged to that committee, in support of the truth of my assertions. The members from the Senate on the same committee, who heard Mr. Hamilton's remarks, concurred with the members of the House. They all gave a flat contradiction to his printed statement.

Mr. MEADE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him, whether I understood him just now—and I ask purely for information—to state, in the words of the contractor, that he told the committee that he did not undertake this business with a view of carrying it out, but to be able to perpetrate a fraud upon Congress.

Mr. STANTON. No, sir, you are mistaken. This is what I meant to say.

Mr. MEADE. What were his words?

Mr. STANTON. In conversation with the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN,] he gave us distinctly to understand, as has been stated by other members of the committee, that he did not expect to come up to the requirements of the contract, but relied upon the indulgence of the committee to tolerate an inferior quality of paper. It would be a fraud upon Congress, for it was an express violation of his contract. His contract required him to furnish paper of a particular weight, and to do work in a particular style.

Mr. MEADE. One other question. I wish to know if the contractor, at the same time, informed the committee, that he expected to be remunerated out of the printing of the census, which he claimed under his contract?

Mr. STANTON. I do not remember that the subject of the census printing was mentioned in that conversation. I know the public printer, at that early period in the session, began to make excuses for not having complied with his contract in regard to time, as well as in regard to the quality of the work and the quality of the material. One of his excuses was alluded to on yesterday by my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE,] and that was, that the rivers were frozen up, the railroads obstructed, so that conveyance could not be had to the city of Washington by which the paper could be received in time. We regarded it as no excuse. No excuse, for the reason that this man had ten months from the execution of his contract in which to prepare his stock, and get ready for the prosecution of the work. The rivers were not then frozen up—the railroads were not then obstructed. All the means of getting paper to this city were at his command, if he had the capital and disposition to comply. When we called him before us, the printing was lamentably behind. From the manner in which he was progressing, his equivocation and want of frankness with the committee, we were all impressed with the conviction that there was no prospect of getting in time for any useful purpose the greater portion of the important work. And I now assert, Mr. Speaker, that if the President's message and accompanying documents remain in his hands, and he makes no more rapid progress than he has already done, that we shall not see the work completed before Christmas, if then. In the interview referred to, the honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] demanded to know when we might expect to have the message completed. He informed us that we might expect them upon our tables in two weeks from that time. Three months have since elapsed, and not one third of the work is yet done. Three hundred and fifty copies were accepted by the House committee, to be laid upon our tables for the convenience of the members. We took that number, while the Senate committee rejected the whole of those sent to that body, for the reason they were not printed in a style the contract required. It is not only in reference to the President's message that the public printing was behind, but nearly all of the important documents are even behind at this day—doubly more so than they were then. The committee found it the cause of a great deal of complaint in the House, that the printing was so far behindhand. If at that early period, the default of the contractor was a just cause of complaint, how much more so is the condition of the work now? I hold in my hand, sir, a list of eighteen important Executive documents, embraced in a single class of the public printing, not one of which has been completed, and not one of them yet touched, except the annual message of the President. That the House may see the importance of these documents, I will read the names of some of the most important ones:

The Annual Message of the President.

The Treasurer's Accounts. This document was the third one put into the hands of the contractor, and has, therefore, been in his office for more than four months. It should have been printed, and in the hands of the Committee of Ways and Means, long ago. It was necessary and useful to that committee in the discharge of its important duties.

The Contingent Expenses of the Treasury Department. This document also was an important one for the same committee.

Army and Navy lists, Amount of Pay, &c. This, I suppose, would have been equally useful to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The Coast Survey Report.

Receipts and Disbursements of the Post Office Department. I am sure the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads could have found this document useful to his committee.

Contingent Fund of the Interior Department.

Report upon the Light-house System. This document is, I understand, a very important one; and the Committee on Commerce having that subject before them, I cannot see well how they could do without it.

But I will not weary the House further by reading from this list. It is sufficient to say, that these documents have been for some time in the printer's hands, and cannot be got out of them.

The honorable gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FIRCEN] thinks it exceedingly oppressive upon the contractor, that the committee have not thought proper to place in his hands that portion of the Patent Office report which has been made to the House. Now, sir, under the circumstances, I ask, what sufficient reason was there for intrusting that to him? Let him show a disposition to execute the work already placed in his hands—let him execute the documents contained in the list to which I have referred, and which are needed every day, and it will then be time enough to intrust him with more work. In the last two months, he has printed about four hundred pages of the President's message and documents, and this is all.

This contractor came to Washington a mere adventurer, without a dollar in his pocket to carry on the immense contract he had undertaken to execute—a contract which, if complied with in good faith, would cost him more for the materials consumed than the whole amount of money he could receive from the Government. The committee were well apprised of this. Mr. Rives, in a letter dated December, 1851, and addressed to the officers who made the contract with Mr. Hamilton, says that “the prices stipulated in Mr. Hamilton's bid would not enable him to pay for the white paper.” The contractor gave the committee to understand, in the interview I have before referred to, that he had no means, and was dependent upon what he received for his work to enable him to pay the hands who did it. Here, then, was a contractor, who had secured the printing at an inconsiderable price, unable to go on with the work, a large part of it in arrears, and with not the slightest possible prospect of the condition of things becoming better. Under these circumstances, what alternative was left the committee? The work must remain in its present condition, or some one must be employed to execute it. The emergency was one which imposed upon the committee an important responsibility. The law of Congress, under which the committee was formed, prescribed our duty. It required us to remedy the neglect or delay, and clothed us with power to do so. We should have been recreant to our trust if we had not endeavored to perform the duty imposed upon us. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FIRCEN] supposes that we have transcended the law, or infers that we intend to do so. I do not know in what respect. So far, we have complied literally with the terms of the law. It is not the intention of the committee to take away from the contractor any portion of the work except that which he cannot or will not execute.

The committee have voted to give such portions of the work as the contractor will not do, to Donelson & Armstrong, and Gideon & Co. The House has already been apprised of the difficulty experienced in the committee of arriving at this conclusion; and I shall not repeat what has already been said upon that subject. These gentlemen were selected, so far as my own action was concerned, because they were men of character, and prepared with the proper materials and necessary means of proceeding immediately with the execution of the work. The emergency was such as to justify me in voting for this expedient, I valued more the public necessity for this expedient, than I did any political effect that might be supposed would result from our action.

The work was assigned to these gentlemen, if they would perform it upon the terms proposed. A source of complaint is, that we have offered them a price which will enable them to make extravagant profits. We are told that we ought to have taken the bid of John T. Towers, and not that of John C. Rives, because the former was the lowest of the two. Now, sir, I will call up Mr. Rives, and put him upon trial before this House. You have informed the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and, perhaps, a dozen others on this floor, that your bid was much higher than that of Mr. Towers. How happens it, sir, that this discovery is just made? Why are we only told this morning that your bid is so extravagant? Now, sir, here is a letter in your own handwriting, with your proper signature attached, dated as late as the first day of December last, before the Committee on Printing had ever been appointed, and directed to “the President and Secretary of the Senate, and the Speaker and the Clerk of the House of Rep-representatives," who constituted the board which gave out the contract, demanding the work, because you were the lowest "bona fide bidder." Here are some extracts from this letter, from which it will be seen that Mr. Rives considers himself unfairly dealt with, because the contract was not given to him, "the bona fide injured bidder."

"As I am the lowest bona fide bidder for the greatest portion of the printing of Congress, and have made ample preparation to execute all that may devolve upon me, I have felt it my duty to assert my claim; and I herewith tender as security, Messrs. John W. Maury and George Parker, of this city—as sufficient men as can be found anywhere—who are prepared, as you will see by the inclosed, to enter into bond for the execution of this work, according to the terms of your advertisement and my bid.

"I am ready to verify the statements of this note by testimony before you. But if, as agents for letting the printing of Congress, you should not determine to set aside a sham bid in favor of the bona fide injured bidder, (according to the usage in the Executive Departments of this Government), but choose, rather, to submit the matter to the body immediately interested, I beg leave respectfully to solicit, through you, an investigation of the case by a committee of Congress."

Mr. Rives not only asserts that he is the lowest bona fide bidder, but proposes to adduce testimony to the committee to prove that fact. He says, in another part of his letter:

"Foreseeing, long since, that this would be the case, (Mr. Hamilton's inability to do the work,) and feeling it to be my right and my duty, as the bona fide bidder entitled to the work, to provide that Congress should not be embarrassed by delinquency in printing its documents, I have procured a large supply of new Congressional type," &c.

It will be thus seen that he regards himself as entitled to the work, and claims it as his right. Now, why did he set up this claim if he did not then think his prices the lowest? So certain was he that he had underbid all others, that, in the anticipated delinquency of Mr. Hamilton, he provides new material to execute the work. Yet, in the face of all this, he now asserts to members upon this floor, that his bid was higher than that of Towers.

Mr. ORR. I have one remark in reference to the communication he speaks of. I perhaps was the person who brought that matter before the House, that Rives's bid was higher than that of Towers. I did it upon the authority of the printed statement of the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate. The aggregates show that Rives's bid was $30,000 above Towers's.

Mr. STANTON. I will show that you are as much in error as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE.] The gentleman was misled by the little paper laid upon our tables, and accidentally found by him at that moment.

Mr. FLORENCE. I have informed myself, since I had the honor of speaking yesterday, that the paper which I read was substantially correct—the little paper to which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] refers. I had that information from the person who compiled the table, which will be found in this public document, (holding up the document No. 17,) in relation to your public printing.

Mr. STANTON. When the gentleman first made his statement, he took up a little piece of paper and said that he had found it accidentally there. Somebody had perhaps desired to furnish him with information, and had laid it there for that purpose, and out of that he read. He finds there that John C. Rives's bid for the fourth class of printing was $207,000, being $50,000 more than the President and Secretary of the Senate and the Speaker and Clerk of the House, had determined it to be. I find by examining the official documents, prepared under the direction of the board and reported to the House, that John C. Rives's bid for the fourth class of printing, which embraces the Executive documents, is only $152,696. That is the net amount of his bid, and what he would have received if the same quantity of that class of work which was done for the last Congress, should be ordered for this. If you add to it what he never bid for, and what he never said he wanted, you may make the sum as large as your imagination may please. The bid of John T. Towers for the same class of printing, is $133,000, or only about $14,000 less than that of Rives. The aggregates are set down in another table.

Mr. FLORENCE. They say that figures cannot lie, and here is a fact. In this very document, from which the gentleman quotes, it will be found, under the head of total aggregate of the gross amount of each proposal, opposite the name of John C. Rives, the very figures I quoted yesterday, from the little piece of paper.

Mr. STANTON. And which he attempted to create the impression in the House, was the amount of money Donelson & Armstrong and Gideon & Co. would get for doing the same work.

Mr. FLORENCE. I did not desire to create any such impression.

Mr. STANTON. That is not John C. Rives's bid. His bid does not amount to that. That is a mere calculation to show you what it would have amounted to, if it had been a different bid from what it really was, and if he had got the same proportionate price for 100,000 copies of the Patent Office report, that he would have received for 20,000. I refer to this matter only to show that the committee were disposed to do what they believed to be right. They do not, upon the one hand, give these men extravagant prices, nor do they give them prices at which they could not live. Supposing Mr. Rives to be an honest man, of which I have no doubt; supposing him to be an experienced and practical gentleman, the committee preferred to take his proposition, in connection with the letter which was lying upon their tables at the time, and to make his bid the basis of the prices which they were to pay for this printing. The parties themselves are dissatisfied with it, because, they say, it is too low; and they have indicated to us that they will not accept our proposition, unless we make a slight modification. Mr. Rives hands me this paper, which I will read:

"I still say, that I am the lowest responsible bidder for the greatest portion of the public printing. I am the next lowest bidder to Hamilton on the fifth class, which always has included the census—and the census will make more than all the other four classes.

"I will show clearly, in the Globe of to-morrow, that my bid is higher than Towers's." J. C. RIVES."

It is possible he can make it out. He says in his letter, that he is the lowest bona fide bidder, who bid in good faith, and that he is prepared, by testimony, to prove it to the committee. We took him at his word.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman has fallen into an error. Speaking of the bid of John C. Rives, I differ with the gentleman in the statement which he has presented to the House. Mr. Rives made his proposals to perform the printing for Congress. It was divided into different classes. The proposition which is here presented, is made under the expectation that at this Congress there will be as many copies of your documents printed as were printed for the last Congress. He proposed, then, that upon certain Executive documents, if they exceeded a certain number of copies, that there should be a certain discount for the press-work, &c., as for instance, if you will turn to page forty three, you will find—I now look at his extended bid—a per centage deduction for additional copies of three classes.

For deduction on the prices above stated for the press-work, paper, folding, and stitching, for furnishing additional copies of matter included in either of the aforesaid classes, the additional copies to be printed on the same paper, with the same ink, and in the same style, as the usual numbers, viz:

For deduction for any number of copies—
Exceeding 1,500, and not exceeding 5,000 —	per centum.
Exceeding 5,000, and not exceeding 10,000 —	"
Exceeding 10,000, and not exceeding 20,000 —	"
Exceeding 20,000 —	69

Now, the computation which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] has offered, where he states the amount of his bid for the fourth class of printing to be $207,000, is without the deduction. If he will look still further in another column, he will find a deduction of $54,979 20 to be taken from that amount, and which makes the proper estimate and proper calculation $152,696 65.

Mr. STANTON. We do not differ about that matter at all. You are perfectly right, and so am I. His bid was not $207,000—

Mr. PHELPS. But that was a part and parcel of his bid; and upon the Patent Office report, if there were 100,000 or 160,000 printed, there was a certain deduction to be made from the prices at which it was proposed to print it.

Mr. STANTON. The calculation was based upon the number of the Patent Office report printed at the last session. It was expected at the time this calculation was made, that a portion of his bid would apply to the excess, because sixty-nine per cent. was to be deducted from it. But the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] was, that Towers's bid was really $30,000 less than that of Rives. I refer to these documents for the purpose of correcting it; and the official statement shows that there is really only a difference of $14,000 between Towers and him upon that particular class of work. Rives proceeds upon the assumption, as he states in this little memorandum which he sent me, that he was to have the census printing; but the census printing is not calculated here. It is not considered by the board, who made out the statement, and is not included in this aggregate of $186,000.

I have but little more to say, and that relates to the character of the work. We have seen some gentlemen hold up a portion of the documents to show the House that they were done in good style, and, as an argument to induce us to retain this man. I am willing to retain him, if he will give us any guarantee in the world that he can go on and do the work as he has contracted to do it. We have a work laid upon our tables, called Foster and Whitney's report, which is not a part of the printing ordered by this House, and which had no business here. It was put upon your desks as a sample, and it is the best job he has done; but it was not done as the regular printing of this House. It was done under the direction of the Commissioner of the Land Office, and under a special resolution of the Senate. It was really done so badly, that the Senate committee have rejected the whole lot, and will not take one of them. He was to get a fair price for that printing, to print it on good paper, and to do it in a workmanlike manner. He did not do it in any respect according to what his contract required. As I said yesterday, the sheets of paper on which part of this work is done, are too small for the purpose, and leave too little margin; so that when the books come to be trimmed, the edges are cut off so close as to disfigure the book, and in some instances, where there are plates, the names of the plates have been cut off.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask the gentleman if that difficulty does not arise in consequence of the plates being wider than was originally contemplated? and if the paper is not of the size that was originally contemplated?

Mr. STANTON. I never measured the paper, but the chairman of the Senate committee informed me that it was less in size than the contract required. The plates, I know, are of the usual octavo size, and if there had been margin enough to the book the plates would never have been disfigured.

But this is not all. You may take up the very book that has been laid upon our desks, and you will find that there is scarcely a page of it that registers. Everybody who understands printing knows what I mean by registers; the pages do not lie exactly over one another; they have slipped sideways, and you sometimes find a page which has slipped a distance of two ems from where it ought to be. Then there are places where the printing is so light that you can hardly read it, and other places where it is so black as quite to disfigure the page. In consequence of these defects in this particular book, the Senate committee rejected it entirely, and threw it upon the hands of the printer. So of that portion of the President's message which has been printed; the whole of that was rejected because it was inferior to what the contract required; and so it has been with all the important work which has been brought in.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FITCH] assumed that we are abrogating the contract with this printer. Now, we have done no such thing. If the gentleman will take the pains to examine the resolutions that were passed in the committee, and to compare them with the powers given to us by the law, he will see that we have followed the law strictly. It never was, for a single moment, the intention of any member of that committee to so far violate the provisions of the law under which we are acting, as to abrogate the contract. That never was contemplated.

Mr. FITCH. What I said, when I was on the floor before, was, that by profession they had not abrogated the contract, but that that must be the inevitable effect of their action; because, by withholding a portion of the printing from the contractor, which a member of the committee alleges he has hitherto delivered according to the contract, they of course justify him in refusing to do such work as they may give to him; the contract is, of course, null and void; and the printers designated by the committee must become the printers of Congress.

Mr. STANTON. I do not understand what the gentleman means by "profession." We profess nothing that we have not put upon the record, which is there for the inspection of the gentleman, or of any member of the House. What we have said, we designed to do—we intend to do in good faith. When this man shows that he cannot do the work, and will not do it, we will take it away from him, and give it to somebody else, and not till then. If he can do it, he will get the whole of it. But he cannot do it. He has not done the President's message yet, which has been in his hands for nearly five months. He promised, three months ago, that he would have it finished in two weeks, and only one third of it is done now. It is true that we did withhold from him a portion of the manuscript of the Patent Office report; but that work, gentlemen will recollect, embraces two volumes, and is not yet reported complete. If that work is printed at all, it must be done by one man, in order that the two volumes may be uniform. But we saw, as plainly as could be, that this man was not capable of doing the work, and did not design to do it; and hence the reason why we did not put that portion of the Patent Office report in hand. The truth is, I do not know that we have got the power to do it yet. It was referred to us, to report to the House as to the number of extra copies to be printed. We have made no report upon that subject yet, and it may be that we have no power to send the book to the printer, until the House has decided upon the number of copies to be published. At any rate, it would not be good policy to send it to the printer, until it is known what number will be required.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Fitch] says, further, that we gave Mr. Hamilton no notice. I tell you, sir, that he has had notice from the first day he commenced this work, down to the present time, that he was not acting in compliance with his contract, but was in default all the time. The deduction of ten per cent. on the first work he brought to the committee, was notice enough, in all conscience, that he was in default. The continued deductions of that amount up to the present time, was standing notice to him that he was not complying with his contract, but was in default. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing more to say upon the subject, and as other gentlemen around me desire to speak, I shall give way for them.

Mr. PARKER, of Indiana, next obtained the floor.

Mr. POLK. I desire to renew the motion to lay this whole subject upon the table. It was my purpose to do it when the gentleman from Kentucky had concluded his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana was recognized by the Chair. The Chair cannot anticipate the purposes of gentlemen.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I did not understand that I was under obligations to renew the motion, or I should have done it.

The SPEAKER. If there was any such understanding, it is too late now, for the gentleman from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PARKER then said: I did not intend to make a single remark in reference to this subject, until my attention was attracted to it by a suggestion that this matter was probably to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Speaker of the House, at the opening of this session, saw fit to place me upon that committee, and I confess that when the idea of referring this subject to the Judiciary Committee saluted my ear, I was somewhat astonished. It struck me as strange that a matter of printing should be referred to that committee. I have had my attention somewhat attracted to this thing since then, and it strikes me, with my humble knowledge of judicial affairs and the interpretation of laws, that there never was a clearer question presented to this House.

One of the members of the Committee on Printing made an allusion, yesterday, to the fact, that in numbers of these documents that had been presented to us, there were instances of what printers call "monks" and "friars," brief margins, and so forth. It strikes me that there are as many "monks" and "friars" to be found in the course of this debate as there are in any of those documents; and I confess that they are, as they appear in our printing, disgraceful to this House. I make this remark with due deference to the House, and without intending disrespect to any gentleman here. I should be happy, if I had it in my power, in calling the attention of the House to the law of the land—above which we are not—to relieve this chamber from some of the "monks" and "friars" that have intruded upon us here; and I would be extremely gratified if, in addition to all that, I could cut this thing off so as to leave no "margin" for future difficulties.

Now, sir, I am a new member of this House, but I am not altogether a new man. I am getting old. I have had my attention somewhat attracted to public affairs. I am aware of the fact that Congress has existed for more than half a century, and I think it would strike any wise man with wonder that we should be involved in such interminable difficulty as we have been for days, in reference to the mechanical execution of work that appertains to us. Why, I expect the next thing will be troubles in regard to the cleaning of this Hall. These things are all provided for. I ask gentlemen to suggest to me wherein I am wrong in the representations that I am about to make to the House. I hold in my hand the act in reference to this subject, approved August 3, 1846. I suppose that is the law that is to rule us. We of this House cannot make or repeal laws alone. Our resolutions do not override laws. Our reports do not override laws. We must see what the law is, where there is a law in the case. It is our rule, as much as the Constitution is our rule.

The fourth and last section of that law reads in these words:

"And be it further resolved, That all laws and parts of laws now in force, not in conformity with the provisions of this joint resolution, be and the same are hereby repealed."

I understand, then, that the three preceding sections cover the case. Now what are they? I ask the attention of gentlemen, who have been wandering for days through this maze of difficulties in which the whole politics of this nation, the price of printing, and every other considerable thing, has been involved, to this law.

The first section of this law provides, that at the beginning of the final session of every Congress, the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives shall advertise for proposals to do the printing of the next Congress. It provides, over and above this, that they shall prepare and show specimens of the kind of work that is to be done—bills, resolutions, reports from committees, Journal, Executive documents, and so forth—and they are also to provide samples of the paper and of the type, and of the manner in which the work is to be done. After that is done, and bids are presented and examined, a contract is to be made with the lowest responsible bidder, and then the duties of those officers in this respect are concluded.

I now beg members to look to the second section; and if there ever was a clear proposition since the sun shone upon the earth, it seems to me it is clear that we have been involving ourselves in the most useless difficulties that can be imagined. If this law be good for anything, if it is to be as effective as any other law, if it is to cover the case that it pretends to cover, I ask you, when you look into this second section, what is there left for us to quarrel about? The second section reads:

"And be it further resolved, That a committee, consisting of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives, shall be chosen by their respective Houses, which shall constitute a Committee on Printing, which shall have power to adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect or delay on the part of the contractor (provided for above) to execute the work ordered by Congress."

Well, now, that looks very simple indeed; and it is a most beautiful exemplification of the difficulty we have been involved in here. Two hundred and thirty-three members have been for several days trying to do the work of this committee. The law has precluded us from being troubled with any of these difficulties. The committee "shall have power to adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect or delay on the part of the contractor to execute the work ordered by Congress, and to make a pro rata reduction in the compensation allowed, or to refuse the work altogether, [mark that,] should it be inferior to the standard" set up here in the first section.

But, sir, who is to be the judge? That committee is as much a tribunal as is the Supreme Court of the United States; and we have no more to do with its decisions than we have with the decisions of that tribunal. This section goes on to say: "or to refuse the work altogether if it shall be inferior to the standard; and in all cases the contractor and his securities shall be responsible for any increased expenditure consequent upon the non-performance of the contract." The committee shall audit and pass upon all accounts for printing," &c.

The third and last section but one, which one only provides for repealing all laws not in conformity with this resolution, provides—"That all motions to print extra numbers of any bill, paper, or document, in either House, shall be referred to the members of the committee of that House, who shall report upon the propriety of printing, and the probable expense thereof, as early as convenient. And all expenses for printing shall be paid from the contingent fund of the two Houses in proportion to the number of copies ordered by each, except the expense of composition, which shall be paid by the House which shall have first ordered the printing of the paper or document; and if there shall be a second composition, it shall be paid for by the House which shall authorize and direct the same; and when extra copies of any document or paper shall be ordered by both Houses, they shall be delivered to the two Houses simultaneously, in proportion to the number of copies by them respectively ordered."

Now, that is the business of the committee, and we have nothing to do with it. We can do nothing unless we get the consent and help of the President and Senate to amend the law. And there is great wisdom in that provision, as I said before. We have had a beautiful illustration of it here for the last two or three days, when we have been resolving ourselves into a sort of committee of censorship upon the Committee on Printing. For myself, I know but very little upon the subject of printing; and if we were to act upon the matter—if the House were to undertake to direct the committee how to act—I should wish for a good deal of time, and to take a good deal of pains to inform myself upon the subject; and so with every other gentleman here. It is for that very reason that the law provides that three intelligent gentlemen should be selected from this, and a like number from the other branch of Congress, who should have specially in charge this whole matter, and thus relieve the House. Now, it seems to me that there can be no difficulty whatever in the case; but if any exist, it is that suggested by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] in relation to the constitution of this committee. That gentleman is an old and able lawyer, and went right to the head of the difficulty, if there be any. If this committee be rightly constituted, we have nothing more to do with it—we have no right to direct them. If we were to pass ever so many resolves for that purpose, they would not be worth the paper they were written on. They would be the merest chaff; for we cannot rise above this law. If you would strike at the substance of this case, you will find that if there be any difficulty whatever, it is in the constitution of the committee. There is an old maxim—and a very good one it is, too—it would be well if this House would adopt it—that "what a man does by another he does himself." Now, I have given this question but a moment's thought, and I conclude there can be no difficulty in relation to the constitution of this committee.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PARKER. Oh, certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to inquire whether this House can delegate its legislative powers per se, and whether it can delegate its judicial powers per se, and whether the choice of the committee is not one of them?

Mr. PARKER. This House has no legislative powers per se, nor has it any judicial powers per se. It has certain official duties to perform, and I presume it will be its own judge of the manner in which those duties are to be performed. My friend from Pennsylvania was here at the opening of the session, and why did he not interpose objections then to this mode of constituting this committee? The judgment has gone now by default, and too many days have now passed to allow a motion to be entertained to set it aside for a new trial. I suppose, too, it would now be a work of supererogation, and my friend is too old and wise a lawyer to demand a new trial when he knows the judgment must still be the same. That would be a culpable creation of costs. The decision of the Speaker would, of course, be the same, and the decision of the House would be the same. The Speaker decided this matter on yesterday, when the point was made, and there was no appeal from his decision. I consider the matter, therefore, as settled. We of this Congress have settled it by our tacit consent from the opening of the session, when the Speaker must have been guilty of usurpation when he exercised the right, the authority, and power to constitute this committee just as it is. And, sir, I understand that in this we have done only what our predecessors have in like manner done.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is there so terrible in this case? I know how men's feelings and sensibilities are wrought upon. I tell gentlemen that this law, with all the power it gives this committee, was made for wise, practical purposes. No other law than just such an one as this will do for all cases that may arise. This country has for years been engaged in an extensive system of public works. Millions and millions of dollars have been expended—and, I had almost said, millions of millions—in the public improvements in the different States. Yet, what is the fact in regard to these works? I have had occasion to look into them, not only in my own State, but in New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, and in every instance where the work was being constructed under a general law, the whole matter in relation to contracts, when made, the progress and kind of work, is referred to the engineer in charge.

Mr. VENABLE. Do I understand my friend from Indiana to say that this committee is wholly irresponsible to the House? That, under the law, the House cannot control or restrain them?

Mr. PARKER. I do most unequivocally and absolutely, in all cases covered by this law, as I deem this case covered.

Mr. VENABLE. And having reported their action to the House, it cannot have any further control over the matter.

Mr. PARKER. So far as the law covers this case, their power is supreme. The law made it so. There can be no mistake about it. But I was going on to elucidate this question. I say that when we assume, as a body, to settle these difficulties, we load a very large gun to shoot small game, and game, too, that is ever on the wing. The committee, most wisely, have absolute control in this matter. They are not required to report to the House in relation to it at all, and I am only surprised that the committee have given way to the responsibility and delicacy of their situation so much as to have done it. It only shows their great delicacy, and their disposition not to act further than the majority of the members upon this floor would approve, were they placed in their situation, not that they were required to do so.

Mr. FREEMAN. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to this very point, for the gentleman's remarks agree with my own opinions. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to this interrogatory: How was this matter brought before the House?

Mr. PARKER. Out of order.

Mr. FREEMAN. Not by a regular report of the committee, but by the introduction of a resolution by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown,] calling the attention of the House to the subject.

Mr. PARKER. That was out of order.

Mr. FREEMAN. Thereby forcing the committee to make a report, which was commenced to be made verbally, but finally written out. Then the discussion came up on the motion made to print that report, by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN.] Upon that motion this whole debate has ensued. I concur with the gentleman from Indiana, that the whole matter has been out of order, from beginning to end. It has been out of place, and it ought to be laid upon the table.

Mr. PARKER. It seems to me that there can be nothing clearer. This rule was made in connection with that body at the other end of the Capitol, and we cannot alter it of ourselves, if we desire.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I understand the motion was made to refer a bill, in connection with this subject, to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to them to report back a bill providing a plan for executing the printing.

Mr. PARKER. The motion was to refer the whole matter to that committee.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, I understand they are instructed to report back a bill upon this subject. Do I understand the gentleman to say we cannot do that?

Mr. PARKER. I understand that we have a law already in reference to the case. And that we cannot interfere with the duties under the law of the Committee on Printing. Why, sir, in this debate we are, as we are proceeding, mixing up with the duties of this committee all the politics of the country. We can have nothing to do with them in this wise.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a single question? I agree with the gentleman from Indiana, that the public printing has been given to Mr. Hamilton, and if there has been any neglect upon his part, this committee have ample powers to remedy it. They may go on and get the work done, and make him pay the difference in the cost of printing, if it be above his contract prices. But I will inquire of the gentleman whether, if they shall find that he is incapable of doing the work, they are authorized, under this law, to make a contract for the entire printing—that is, for the printing hereafter to be ordered?

Mr. PARKER. If the gentleman will tell me what is the meaning of the phrase, "or to refuse the work altogether," I shall probably be able to answer his question, to his satisfaction.

Mr. CLINGMAN. That has reference to work already ordered, and delivered to him for execution.

Mr. PARKER. I do not so understand it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Do I understand the gentleman to say, that they can proceed upon his bond? Do I understand the gentleman, as a lawyer, to say that he believes they could make the securities of the public printer liable for his non-execution of work ordered by Congress, but never delivered to him?

Mr. FREEMAN. Here is the contract. It states that the printing shall be for the term of the Thirty-second Congress.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I desire to ask—

Mr. PARKER. I will submit to no further interruption. I want to finish what I have to say, and then the gentleman can get the floor. I want to make my positions clear before they are attacked.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] asks me, in substance, if I understand the law as giving the committee power to take the whole printing from the contractor to whom it has been assigned? Mr. Speaker, in a proper case, I have no doubt but such is the law. The particular clause to which I have referred in that behalf, empowering them "to refuse the work altogether," to such contractor, is enough, in my mind, to settle the question. But when the whole statute is looked to—when the several other places in the statute where the phrase "the work" occurs, and the practical working of the whole thing, are contemplated—I see no room for doubt or cavil left, as to the integrity of my position.

I take it, sir, that the words "the work," wherever they occur, mean no more and no less than "the necessary printing" for Congress that the printer may have stipulated to perform. In fact, those two phrases appear only separated by one line, near the beginning of the first section of the act, and are obviously used as equivalent expressions. Subsequently, in at least two places, those words, "the work," are found in the same section, and twice in the next; and clearly mean as before stated, wherever found.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the attention of the House to the "power" vested in this joint committee by the law as it appears in the next section. There it is expressly provided, that the committee "shall have power to adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect or delay" in the performance of the contract. And amongst the powers specifically delegated is this: "to refuse the work altogether" stipulated to be performed by him; and, as a matter of course, to employ somebody else, or others, to do "the work."

Mr. Speaker, no rules of judicial interpretation are better established than these: To resort to the context to determine the meaning of all words and phrases found in the particular statute, and to always give an uniform meaning to the same words and phrases whenever found recurring. Thus guided, I see no escape from my conclusion. But the gentleman intimates to me that the words, "the work," in the connection where this controversy particularly hinges, does not mean all "the work" contracted to be done, but only a particular part of it. Now, sir, if we concede that, we make the words mean what another and different word means, used in the first section, and apply conveying that idea of part. I have reference to the word "class," as there found and so used. Sir, such a mode of interpretation is too absurd to be admitted.

But, again, Mr. Speaker, I ask the attention of the House to the practical working of this thing, if you abridge the "power" of this committee—if you do not adopt the position I have assumed. This law unquestionably was enacted with a view to relieve the House from all trouble in the procurement of its printing, in determining the style of the same, the speed with which the work shall be executed, &c. These things are all devolved on the committee. Now, I would inquire of gentlemen, what is to be done in case the printer die, get sick, run away, or squarely refuse to do the work? The law does not in terms provide for such exigencies; it nowhere, in terms, says a word about the committee's making a new contract with another printer. But who doubts their authority to do that very thing, and that it is imbedded in the clause "shall have power to adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect or delay?" &c.

Well, now, if they may recontract, "the work" in such a case, pray tell me why they may not do the same thing where the printer undertakes to do the work, but neglects his duty in that behalf—delays the work unreasonably, or furnishes work "inferior to the standard?" Sir, they have the "power" "to refuse the work altogether" to such a printer. If they have not, this House may be imposed upon by a bad man, who gets your printing, almost at will, and we have no means of relief. You compel your committee to run to him with every item of each "class" of "the work," though he may have been willfully, basely, flagrantly, in default, in the same thing an hundred times before. Who would serve on such a committee? And what body, that regarded its own self-respect would suffer itself to be placed in such a predicament?

This argument, arising from the inconveniences of the case, it strikes me, ought to be deemed conclusive. If I am right, the committee have all power in the premises. Let them exercise it, and I have no doubt they will be sustained, here and elsewhere.

I was proceeding to direct the attention of gentlemen, when interrupted some time ago, to a matter which I presume is not a new one to them. I mean that of the internal improvements of this country. A system has been adopted in regard to this matter, from the first to the last, equivalent to this. The whole power in relation to the construction of those works, is thrown into the hands of the engineers, under whose direction the works are constructed. Let me again invite the attention of the committee to that law of 1846, and I will read the section through without comment. We all understand the English language:

"And be it further resolved, That a committee, consisting of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives, shall be chosen by their respective Houses, which shall constitute a Committee on Printing, which shall have power to adopt such measures as may be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect or delay on the part of the contractor to execute the work ordered by Congress, and to make a pro rata reduction in the compensation allowed, or to refuse the work altogether, should it be inferior to the standard; and in all cases, the contractor and his securities shall upon the non-performance of the contract. The committee shall audit and pass upon all accounts for printing; but no bill shall be acted upon for work that is not actually executed and delivered, and which they may require to be properly authenticated."

Now, I cannot be mistaken, it seems to me, in regard to the construction of the law. It is a thing which is beyond our power. It has passed out of our hands, by virtue of action under this law, and we have no concurrent jurisdiction with this tribunal, created by the two Houses. We have none. It is all referred to them, and when it came in here it came in out of order. They have all the power, and all they have to do, is to do as General Jackson was wont to do, "take the responsibility," whatever it is.

Mr. MEADE. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion to him? I concur cordially with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PARKER] in the views he has taken in relation to the powers conferred upon the committee. I believe, with him, that the law gives them plenary powers over the subject; but the gentleman seems to argue the proposition as if there were actually propositions before this House, to revoke what the committee has done. I do not understand that to be the question.

Mr. PARKER. Well, that will do; I wish to proceed; if the gentleman wishes to call me to order, perhaps I may be ruled down.

Mr. MEADE. It is a different object that I have in view. I wish to hear the gentleman's views in relation to what I suggest. The committee have made a report, and a resolution has been offered by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] not to abrogate what the committee has done, but to refer that report to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to inquire into the general subject of the printing of Congress, with a view to recommend to Congress some future plan in relation to the manner in which that work should be done; and with that resolution there is coupled an amendment from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE,] referring at the same time the bill introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOTY,] That seems to me to contemplate future action, not to contemplate the abrogation of the action of the committee.

As the gentleman has allowed me to interrupt him for a moment, I would like to hear him upon another question. The gentleman certainly will not assert that any plenary powers have been conferred upon this committee, which this House cannot discuss; and censure, if they please, the manner in which they have discharged their duty.

Mr. PARKER. I will state the reasons at another time; I will answer the question now. The power of this House to discuss is plenary, as the action of the House is, when we get into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. We may discuss and discuss, it seems, forever. I have ascertained that to my heart's content.

The gentleman suggests to me that the matter now before the House looks to future action, rather than present, so far as the printing is concerned. I agree with him in that; but that is not all. We have wandered many a league beyond that. The case turns out exactly the case I thought it was at the outset. It is most beautifully illustrated by the interminable confusion and debate we have involved ourselves in. Can it be that this law leaves us subject to these troubles in the matter of our printing? Heads too wise have gone before us, for me to believe it; and these endless and multiplied questions are what we now have up before us. It is future action, and present action, presidential elections, politics, of every hue, pay for partisan service—and punishments too—motives of members, personal action, personal knowledge, and everything else, and nothing, so far as the printing is rightfully concerned, upon which to predicate any part of it. And what are we doing in the House now? What can we do? Nothing at all. Nothing. I am very happy to see that gentleman, [Mr. MEADE,] in whose judgment I have the greatest confidence, concurring with me in my general view of this case. It seems to me that there can be no mistake about it from any quarter; none whatever. We have nothing under heaven to do with this matter until that law is repealed, and then the whole thing may be brought up anew, and then we can change or modify it, in connection with the other branch of Congress, and the President. We cannot do so ourselves. It is utterly out of the question.

A VOICE. We can give the committee instructions.

Mr. PARKER. Grant we can, which I do not; that will not relieve us from the difficulty we are in. I understand that gentlemen are complaining, and I have complained for two months, because we have not our printing upon our tables here. It is a disgrace to the country, and I look to the committee to remedy the difficulty.

Mr. HAVEN made a remark, mostly inaudible to the reporter; but was understood to say that the bill introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOTY,] in reference to future action, had been referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PARKER. Yes. It shows again that this hotch-potch is even greater than I expected. He suggests that this same bill, for some future action, is already referred to the Committee of the Whole. Mr. Speaker, I was going to observe that this matter has all grown out of the fact that this printer has not complied with his contract. Can there be any doubt of that? Look at this disreputable document, placed upon our tables, [holding up a printed document.] This is the first time that I have ever had the honor of a seat upon this floor. I confess to you, sir, that my notions were a little enlarged when I came from my State Legislature to this national council. I expected to see printed documents nearly equal in execution to those of the State of Indiana. I expected to see documents nearly equal to those we have out there in the wild woods! We are now upon the fifth month of our session, and the President's message, with the accompanying documents, is not yet before us. How does this happen? There is wrong here, and I am only surprised at the forbearance of the committee with this man, who has been trifling with us and our constituents so long. I ask the committee to act. They have the power, a power that has been given to them by both Houses, because it was a power without which, lodged somewhere, we could not act; and they have it all completely within their possession. I have said all I designed to say, upon this subject; and I have predicated my remarks upon a motion I designed to make to lay the whole matter upon the table.

But I wish to make another remark while I am upon the floor. I expect it is as painful to other gentlemen here as it is to myself, to see ourselves involved in such difficulties as these. It was the design of this law to remedy them; and if the law were left to have its full force, and be so executed, it would accomplish that object to a great extent; but still I think there would be trouble in connection with this matter any way, under the guidance of this law. There is money involved in this thing to the amount of millions, which I think may be saved to the country. I have not had my attention particularly directed to this matter for years. But I have thought, and still think, that we ought to have a Government printing office. I know that some gentlemen think that this would build up a power for great patronage—a power for overruling the people, and awing them into doing the behests of the Administration of the Government. I cannot look upon it in that light; and I do not think it is a correct view of the case. We may manage a Government printing office as we may manage our Land Office, or any other bureau. Put a head to it, let him manage the matter, purchase the materials, the paper, at the Government expense, and let no profit be made upon it, except the profit of the paper maker. We shall thus save the paper profit—an immense one—and it goes into the coffers of no favorite of the Administration, but remains in the Treasury. Sir, tens of thousands of keen eyes would be directed at once to the action. The Government would select one establishment, and give them the market price for paper, as it is furnished to others. Then only will we get paper cheaply as others get it. After that is done, you have here the head of the bureau at all times, from the third of March until the third of March come again, two years, to provide for and do his duty. He knows what his duty is, and has the credit of the national Treasury to back him. He can call to the journeymen printers, and employ them, as the National Intelligencer and the other papers employ printers, and do the work as economically as they do theirs. And so we shall not only save upon the paper, but upon the printing; too; and who can estimate that great saving? Now, sir, in building up such an establishment as this, we would have to expend some money in erecting the right kind of an office—say a million—two millions if you please. Look at this census printing. Why, sir, I hear millions spoken of as the cost of that printing alone, first and last. Now, when the thing is done, it is done forever. Disconnect it by law from all partisan presses, and you get rid of incalculable difficulties constantly recurring. They ought to be corrected, and I hope that the proposition which has been presented for the establishment of a printing bureau will ultimately succeed.

Mr. ORR. I rise for the purpose of reminding the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PARKER,] that one of the propositions contained in the subject-matters now upon the Clerk's table, is a proposition of that character.

Mr. PARKER. So I am informed.

Mr. ORR. It is an instruction to the Committee on the Judiciary to establish a Government printing office.

Mr. PARKER. If it be the duty of the Judiciary Committee to inquire into the propriety of establishing such a concern as that, I suppose they will act; but I do not believe its consideration belongs to us.

Mr. STANLY. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Judiciary Committee—I speak respectfully as to its members, individually and collectively—is the last committee of the House that this matter ought to be sent to. As I understand it, there are upon that committee three advocates for the right of secession, and one gentleman who goes against the fugitive slave bill, wishes its repeal, and of course is opposed to the "Union" and "Republic," and all newspapers that bear such names, and all other papers of that kind in the country. I wish any other committee than that, for I do not believe that is the right committee in the abstract.

Mr. PARKER. I agree with my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. STANLY,] I do not think that is the right committee in the abstract, or the concrete either. I will observe further, that the gentleman's remarks indicate to us what ought to follow. Our predecessors settled this trouble; and all we have to do is to put it upon the table, or rule it out of order, as a matter determined as belonging to the Printing Committee. Their power is as great as the power of any other body in this land, that is not provided for in your Constitution. It is provided for by law; and they have the plenary right to act in every and all matters connected with printing, as I have sufficiently indicated, if we can understand a very plain law in our own mother tongue. I move to lay this whole subject upon the table; and if my views are right, it ought to, and will, I hope, go there.

[Cries of "That is right!" "That is right!"]

Mr. BROOKS. I would say, that after the legal gentlemen of the House have discussed this question, it is quite time for the printers to say a word upon it.

Mr. FREEMAN. I rise to a question of order. I am not entirely familiar with the rules of the House, but there is a printed rule to which I wish to call the attention of members. It is the 20th rule of the House, which is a copy of the second section of the law discussed by my friend from Indiana, [Mr. PARKER,] It is a joint rule of both Houses, as is the law under consideration. Here let me say, that I agree with the gentleman from Indiana that it is not in the power of this House alone to repudiate that law. The point to which I wish to call the attention of the House is this: "It shall be in order for the Committee on Printing to report at any time." Now, the Committee on Printing consists of three Senators and three members of the House of Representatives. There has been no report made to this House by the Committee on Printing.

A VOICE. Yes there has.

Mr. FREEMAN. The Joint Committee on Printing have never authorized or required the chairman on the part of the House [Mr. GORMAN] to report. He was called out here by the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BROWN] to give information to the House of what had been done by the committee. There is no regular report now before the House, and the point of order I make is, that the Committee on Printing have not made any report in this matter.

Mr. GORMAN. They did not authorize me to make any report, nor did I, except for the information of the House. My statement was only made for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has then been greatly misled. He had supposed there was a report made.

Mr. GORMAN. If the Chair will allow me—I made a written statement only, for the information of the House. I so stated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Indiana had, for the information of the House, submitted a report of the proceedings of the Joint Committee on Printing by order of that committee.

Mr. GORMAN. I never had any order in the world.

Mr. VENABLE. I rise to a question of order—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is already upon the floor to a question of order.

Mr. FREEMAN. I agree with the gentleman from Indiana in the remarks which he has made. It struck me at the time that this whole proceeding was out of order. Had I been one of the old members of the House, I should have mentioned the fact a long time ago. We have now ascertained that there is no lawful report from the Committee on Printing before this House; that all of this discussion has occurred out of order; and, therefore, I conclude that the motion to print this report, and the motions to amend, are all out of order.

Mr. FLORENCE. I wish to recall the gentleman's recollection—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend until we reach an important fact. It is impossible we can all talk at once, and be understood. The Clerk, for the information of the House, will read the report of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The Committee on Printing, which is charged by law with the duty of remedying any neglect or delay on the part of the contractor to do the public printing for the Thirty-second Congress, ask leave, for the information of the House, to report, that they have had the subject under consideration," &c.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must overrule the point of order raised by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. FREEMAN.] He must continue to regard this document, upon its face, as a report from a committee.

Mr. FREEMAN. I wish to make this suggestion to the Chair: That there seems to be a misunderstanding, upon the face of that report, of what this committee intended to do. The Chair is familiar with the mode in which this thing was brought before the House, and he knows the fact that it was not brought before this House upon the motion of the committee itself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of no such fact.

Mr. FREEMAN. The chairman of the committee expressly stated that it was not their duty to report; but if the House desired the information they would report. It says expressly upon its face, "done for the information of the House."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi appeal from the decision of the Chair? The Chair again states to the gentleman—

Mr. FREEMAN. I wish to make this point, seeing that the equity of the thing would lay the whole subject upon the table—

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. And thereby confirm the action of the committee.

Mr. PARKER. The remarks of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. FREEMAN] have brought to my mind a matter to which I would direct the attention of the House for a moment. Now, it will be observed in this second and third section that there is a plain distinction drawn between the committee as a whole, and that portion of the committee which belongs to this House. The committee as such, constituted by the Senate and by the House, have certain powers. One portion of the committee have certain other powers. All of these powers to which I have referred, it struck me, that this House was assuming to itself to exercise, and especially to determine whether the printer has been in the line of his duty, and whether he has complied with his contract. Look here, again: "that all motions to print extra numbers of any bill, paper, or document, in either House shall be referred to the members of the committee of that House." There the members of the committee of this House have certain powers, and the committee as a whole is a legal body, and their powers as such are designated. My intention was, when I arose, so many gentlemen having discussed this bill so fully upon both sides of the House, and some of them having seemed to me to wander so far from the true track, to try and put an end to this discussion. In making these suggestions, I do not desire to do a discourteous thing to any gentleman. A few friends ask that I shall not make a motion to lay upon the table, while numerous others are pressing me to make it. With the views I have in this case, concurred in as they appear to be, I cannot do otherwise than make the motion. If the House disagree with me, they can vote down my motion, which is to lay the whole matter upon the table.

Mr. BROOKS. I rose to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PARKER] to let us have a vote directly upon referring this question to the Judiciary Committee.

The SPEAKER. It is moved to lay the report upon the table, and upon this proposition the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRIS moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. GORMAN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the motion.

Mr. BAYLY demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS. Being urged by several of my friends around me, I withdraw my motion to adjourn.

Mr. VENABLE. I renew it.

Mr. HALL demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish that the House would consent to take one vote, that we might act one way or the other.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. JONES demanded tellers upon the motion to adjourn; which were ordered.

The question was then taken, (Messrs. VENABLE and WILLIAMS acting as tellers,) and there were—yeas 73, noes 61.

The House then adjourned to twelve o'clock to-morrow.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 16, 1852.

Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

On motion by Mr. GWIN, the execution of the order setting apart Friday for the consideration of private bills was postponed until one o'clock.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BORLAND. I throw myself on the indulgence of the Senate while I make an explanation personal to myself, in respect to my course while a member of the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT. If such is the pleasure of the Senate, the Senator will proceed.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, I do not occupy a position of such prominence as to make what I do or say of any great importance to the country at large. Fortunately for myself, and perhaps more fortunately for the country, this is the case. But what I do or say is of importance to myself and to my constituents; and I wish therefore always to stand right upon the record—that is, to be known for just what I am, and responsible for just what I do and say, no more and no less.

It will be recollected, that the other day I made an informal report from the Committee on Printing, and at the conclusion of it, and the explanation which I then gave, asked to be excused from further service on that committee. I was excused. And I did hope that with that transaction all my connection with the Printing Committee, and all my concern, beyond a motion or vote, with the printing of Congress, would cease. For three years and more it had been my duty and my misfortune to be chairman of the Committee on Printing. I say my misfortune, for, although the duties which devolve upon that committee are of no great importance to the general interests of the country, they did impose upon me an amount and character of labor more trying to my feelings and my powers of endurance than any other of which I can well conceive. They were not heavy cares that oppress, but small ones that irritate—irritate and annoy to a degree that unfitted me for other and more important business. That consideration, with the others which I then stated to the Senate, induced me to withdraw from that committee. After that I did hope to have nothing more to do with it, or the business before it.

It will be recollected, further, that in my remarks on that occasion I expressly disavowed any intention to treat with disrespect any member of that committee, or to cast censure upon anything they had done. I expressed the opinion that the action of the majority of the committee had been wrong, and that I could not concur in it; adding, at the same time, that I did so without disrespect to any member of the committee, and without casting censure upon its action. I did so deliberately—I did it with a purpose. That purpose was to disconnect myself from all matters relating to that committee and its action, so that I might not even seem to be involved in anything like controversy about them afterwards. But it seems that I am not permitted to escape, even after I have voluntarily withdrawn, and been excused by the Senate from further service on the committee.

I will read a paragraph from an editorial in the Union newspaper of this city, which appeared yesterday morning, in respect to my course on the committee, connected, as it is, with the debates of the House of Representatives, as I find them reported in the city papers. The editor of the Union newspaper, in commenting upon the course pursued by the Southern Press of this city, says:

"We should not have noticed such acknowledgments of profligacy, had not the honorable member from Mississippi manifested so great an anxiety in his remarks lest the public interest should fall a sacrifice to the party bias of the members of the Printing Committee. That gentleman called to his aid his friend from Massachusetts, Mr. Rantoul, who declared that he could defend his own coactions, but not those founded on public plunder. Coalitions to break up the Union were all excusable, but coalitions to execute the laws were infamous! It was all right enough to prevent the Washington Union from being employed as public printer, as long as thereby the door of hope was kept open for the Southern Press and the National Era; but the moment the committee acted, as they were bound to do by the provisions of law, all is wrong! All was right as long as Mr. Borland continued to put his veto on the Washington Union."

In my report from the committee, and in my remarks upon it, I made no reflections upon the Washington Union. I said nothing about it, except to state the action of the committee in regard to it. And yet connecting the last sentence of the paragraph which I have read with the other portions of it—although it does not do so directly—it does, by implication and innuendo, place me, together with a Representative from the State of Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] and Mr. RANTOUL, of Massachusetts, in the attitude of delaying and obstructing the public business for the purpose of getting patronage, or because we could not give patronage, to the editors of the Southern Press and of the National Era. If it means anything, it means that.

I shall not, however, comment upon this separately. I will now read, in connection with it, from a speech which appears in the Washington Union of this morning, as delivered by Mr. GORMAN, of Indiana, on the 13th of this month on the same subject. Mr. GORMAN, as chairman of the House Committee on Printing, in giving an account of what the majority of the committee had done, and in justification of himself for the course he had pursued, said:

"We have only the power to do, what? To remedy neglect to comply with the contract—to remedy any neglect in printing the documents in time. That is our business. We are sentinels placed upon the watch tower to see that your contractor has done his duty, and to see that you get your public documents when you need them, and in due time. When the conviction forced itself upon us that he had not done so, we attempted to parcel out the printing, so that it could be done properly. One gentleman proposed that it be done by Donelson & Armstrong. Another proposed to add the name of Mr. Towers, and so on, until almost everybody in this city was proposed. I frankly tell this House, that I have voted for two months against anybody having this printing but Donelson & Armstrong; and when I asked the honorable chairman what he proposed, and what he wanted, he responded 'he wanted nothing.'"

It is here attributed to me, that when asked what I wanted to do with the public printing, I answered, I "wanted nothing;" and the words are given with quotation marks, as the identical ones used by me. I will not comment upon this separately; but will read further, in connection with it, a passage from the remarks of Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, another member of the Committee on Printing, delivered in the House yesterday, as I find them reported in the National Intelligencer of this morning. In defending the action of the majority of the Committee on Printing, Mr. STANTON alludes to something that had been said about giving a portion of the public printing to Mr. Fisher, the editor of the Southern Press, and says:

"While negotiations were going on to obtain the execution of the public printing, Elwood Fisher, of the Southern Press, proposed a combination between himself and the editors of the Union. Mr. Fisher requested the committee to divide the printing, for this reason—that it would produce a reunion between the Southern Democrats and Compromise Democrats. He (Mr. S.) told him that such a thing was utterly impossible; that under any state of circumstances he could not get more than two votes—those of himself and Mr. BORLAND—all the other members of the committee being from the Northern States."

Mr. President, taking the article in the Union, this statement of Mr. STANTON, with the general drift of the remarks of Mr. GORMAN, all together, the impression is likely to be made that I sat in the committee as the representative either of the Southern Press singly, or of the Southern Press and National Era together, seeking to obtain for those papers, as patronage, a portion of the public printing. I have to say, upon that, in few words, that from beginning to end, in every line, word, and syllable, so far as any such impression or imputation upon me is intended, it is false in fact—

The PRESIDENT. The Senator is aware that he must not speak of what has taken place in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, I am alluding to proceedings published in newspapers—to articles published in newspapers reflecting injuriously upon me—doing me gross injustice, and I am giving them my contradiction. I apprehend that is not out of order.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator will listen to what is the rule, and then confine himself within its limits:

"It is a breach of order, in debate, to notice what has been said on the same subject, in the other House, or the particular votes, or majorities on it there; because the opinion of each House should be left to its own independency, not to be influenced by the proceedings of the other; and the quoting therein might beget reflections leading to a misunderstanding between the two Houses."

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. President, I know that you would not do me injustice, or put a wrong construction on what I said, or intended to say. I think, however, if you will recur to the beginning of my remarks, and my reference to the several articles I have read, you will recollect that I spoke of them as newspaper publications reflecting upon me. I did not treat them as the proceedings of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator expressly named the individuals who made the speeches from which he read.

Mr. BORLAND. I named the individuals as the reputed authors of the articles which appeared in the public press. What I mean to say, without referring to those articles as the proceedings of the House, or to those gentlemen as members of the House, but as publications in the Union and the National Intelligencer, is, that so far as they represent me as occupying any such position as I have mentioned—that is, as either seeking or desiring the public printing, or any portion of it, for the Southern Press, the National Era, or any other press, they are in every sense, and in every way, false. So far from representing any one upon that committee, or desiring to obtain patronage for any one, I expressly declined to advocate the claims of any one. This is well known to every member of the committee. I will say, further, that when applied to by Mr. Fisher, the editor of the Southern Press, to agree to an arrangement by which he supposed a portion of the printing could be given to him, I told him at once, and decidedly, that I would do no such thing. I told Mr. Fisher, I told the committee, and say it here now, to place myself right, once for all, that in regard to patronage, either to the party press, or to partisans of any class, I hold this position: I will not create patronage for any one—I will not increase prices or patronage for any one; but when public work is to be dispensed, and I have to choose, at fair prices, and for proper public purposes, for the execution of the work, between my political opponents and my political friends, I will give to those who agree with me in political sentiment, and rejoice if they can make it useful either to themselves personally, or to the party to which we belong.

This is the position which I have always occupied. And the statement of it, brings me to my course upon the committee.

I will repeat here, as I said the other day, I believe that, under the law, the committee had the power to take the printing from the contractor, and to give it to other persons. I did not agree to the particular direction in which they gave that printing, because, as I expressly said to them, and say now, neither of the parties to whom they gave it agree with me in sentiment, or pursue, as conductors of the public press, a policy which, in my opinion, fairly represents the views I entertain, or which is calculated to promote the public interests, or the special interests of the Democratic party.

The position in which I seem to have been placed before the country by the articles I have read from the newspapers, and by the general course of the majority of the committee in defending their own course, is that of obstinately disregarding the public interests in an exigency which required prompt action, because I could not obtain patronage for certain presses or individuals, for whom I sought and desired it. I repeat, that I occupied no such position; and there is no truth in any assertion, or implication, which tends to place me in any such position. I did not say, I "wanted nothing," or was willing to do nothing. When applied to by the chairman of the House Committee, to propose some person as a recipient of this patronage, I said I had no proposition to make. I said I sat there, then, as chairman of the committee, presiding over its deliberations, ready to hear, and put to the vote, any proposition that might be made. I had no proposition of my own to make; but if one should be made which met my views of propriety and policy, I would vote for it.

Now, Mr. President, I presume it will not be out of order, or, if it be, you will correct me, to remark somewhat further upon the course of the committee, while I was a member of it. To do so is necessary to a full understanding of my position, alike on the committee and as a member of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator, that, strictly speaking, it is not in order to detail what takes place in committees. However, it has been done, over and over again, in the Senate without objection, and, if no objection be now made, the Chair will interpose no obstacle.

Mr. BORLAND. The action of the committee to which I particularly allude, is that which has, in part, been reported, in the form of resolutions, both to the Senate and to the House of Representatives. If it were true that I had thus obstinately thrown myself in the way of the execution of the public work, I should be culpable before the country. If it be true that the action of the committee, in disposing of the public printing, was such as the exigencies of the public service made necessary, or was even the best that could have been taken, under the circumstances, I should still have been culpable, to some extent at least, for resisting or obstructing that action. But, sir, I deny that this was so. I deny that this action was either necessary, or that it was even the best that could have been taken. This is my opinion. I think facts warrant me in entertaining it, and a sense of duty induces me to express it. I say that, although the public printer had violated his contract, and it was proper that the work should be taken, in part at least, from him and given to some one else, yet that it has not been given to the persons best prepared and best qualified to do it; and it was not agreed to be paid for at prices which, in my opinion, were warranted by the public interest, or the rights of the superseded contractor. There were persons every way well qualified and prepared, in my opinion, even better qualified and prepared than those to whom it was given, ready and willing to do the work for a smaller price than was agreed to be given. And, then, there stood the contractor who, however far he had failed to do his duty, was still, with his securities, liable on his bonds, to pay the difference between his contract price and this new price. So much for that.

Now, sir, a word upon the resolutions reported to the two Houses, respectively, as representing the action of the committee. On the 12th, (last Monday,) I reported, as the action of the committee on the 8th, this resolution:

"Resolved, That the committee enter into a contract with Donelson & Armstrong to do the future printing of the present Congress in the House, and with Gideon & Co. for the Senate, upon such terms as shall be agreed upon hereafter."

This is copied from the journal of the committee, as the official action, by a vote of four to two, of the joint committee.

The other resolution, as reported by the chairman of the House committee, as representing the same action of the same committee on the same day, as I find it published in the newspapers, is in the following words:

"On motion by Mr. GORMAN, 'Resolved, That, for so much of the public printing as may be deemed necessary by the committee to remedy any neglect or delay on the part of the contractor (Mr. Hamilton) to execute the work ordered by Congress, the persons doing the work under the direction of the committee be allowed the same price as may be contained in Mr. Rives's bid for printing for the Thirty-second Congress: Provided, That in no case shall pay be allowed for double composition.'"

The two resolutions are found to be materially different. The one I reported here on the 12th is the one adopted on the 8th, and as I copied it from the journal, unaltered by any recorded action of the committee up to that time. How the alteration was made I do not know, nor why it was done. I merely state the facts in order to show that what I reported was the recorded action of the committee. I have attended no meeting of the committee since the 8th, when that resolution was adopted.

I have been censured because I refused my vote to give the printing to Donelson & Armstrong and the Republic—especially because I refused to give it to Donelson & Armstrong. In my opinion they do not fairly represent the views which I entertain upon important matters of public interest and policy, now before the country. However binding, then, I might have felt the obligation to give any patronage at my disposal to a political friend, instead of a political opponent, the Union newspaper, as conducted by them, does not sustain towards me, at least, such party relations as would require or justify such consideration at my hands. I am not disposed to quarrel, nor will I quarrel, with them, or any one else, because they differ with me on matters of public policy. But I am bound, nevertheless, to act from my own sense of propriety, and convictions of duty, in all such cases; and when I do so act, I am not amenable to censure—no one should quarrel with me on account of my opinions; and surely no one, who claims to think for himself, or to act from his own convictions, can justly charge me, for my course, with any want of regard for public duty, or party fealty.

But I never understood, until recently, that the proposition to give this printing to Donelson & Armstrong was placed upon the ground which I now find it placed by the committee; that is, the exigencies of the public service, or the necessity for having the work done at once and promptly. The main, if not only, consideration suggested by Mr. Donelson himself, to me, and his active friends, to induce me to support that proposition, was the necessity of it to sustain the Union as a party press; it being alleged that in no other way could the paper be sustained and kept up. Sir, the appeal was distinctly, and repeatedly, and openly, made to me, as a party man, to do this as a party measure, whereby patronage would be given to that paper, which was a losing concern, and could not be sustained except by profitable jobs of public printing. Appeals were made to me upon that ground, and that ground alone, not merely in connection with this printing, but when Mr. BRIGHT's resolution was reported from the Committee on Printing, to give to Donelson & Armstrong the printing of the Seventh Census, the appeal was made to me upon the same ground by the active friends of the Union, and by one of its conductors in person—I mean Mr. Donelson. I was told that it was necessary in order to sustain the paper, that it must have that printing. Nay, sir, I was told—and I am sorry to have to say it, but it is necessary to my full justification—I was told by one of the most active friends of that press—one who had its interests specially in charge, in regard to this patronage, that unless the printing was given to Donelson & Armstrong, and that, too, within three weeks, the Democratic party would be disorganized and disbanded. The gentleman who told me so, said he had agreed with some fifty others of the House of Representatives, that the proposition should be made a test of the Democratic party organization; and that unless it were conformed to, the party would be disorganized and disbanded.

Whether the gentleman making that declaration to me had the authority to speak for the fifty others, I do not know. I do not know, even, that he was really in earnest, for himself. But the declaration he did make repeatedly, and often most vehemently. My answer to that was in very brief terms. I stated, with perfect candor, that if the integrity and organization of the Democratic party, much as I loved it, depended upon the patronage to be given in the form of profitable jobs of public work to newspapers at Washington, or was to be sustained only by services to be paid for in money out of the public Treasury, I would, at that very moment, vote for its disorganization and annihilation; and further, that if such was the conditions of partisan service to be rendered by the Washington Union, the sooner the Democratic party was clear of it, the better.

I am as thorough a party man as any one upon this floor. I have been devoted to the interests of my party ever since I first took part in the business of life. I do not care what cries may be raised against me—what statements may be made as to my position, or my party associations, or the considerations which control me. I am willing to stand upon the declarations I have just made, as a rule for my conduct in all matters involving my public duties, or party relations. I feel, in my heart, that I have a clean bill of political and party health. I shall trust to it. But, sir, supposing the Union to have satisfied me ever so well as a party organ—supposing its course to have been ever so acceptable to me, as a Democratic press, when it was proposed to me, as a means of sustaining and supporting it, that I should support, also, a paper directly opposed to the principles and the views I entertain—my antipodes in politics, and engaged in the daily denunciation of the party to which I belong, I would have seen the whole concern, and every other paper along with it, sunk into the bottom of the sea, before I would have moved one finger, or said one word in acquiescence—or hesitated to declare, as I now declare, my disavowal and repudiation of all such means or arrangements. Tell me, sir, about Democratic organization, and party fealty, to be manifested by such propositions and arrangements as this! Why, sir, what is it but a coalition with our political opponents? And for what? Not, sir, for political advancement, or party advantage. No, sir, it is political amalgamation, and abandonment of party, with the effect only of giving money to particular individuals—and one of those individuals an active, unscrupulous, vindictive political opponent! To my mind, it has no considerations of propriety to commend it to favor—no item of party advantage to justify it. It is, to my apprehension, neither more nor less than an amalgamation of parties—an utter disregard of all party distinctions, for mere pecuniary gain. Such is my opinion. Let it pass for what it may be worth. I neither censure nor condemn that of others.

And here, Mr. President, lest I be misunderstood, I must do an act of simple justice to an individual. I had heard, from an early period of the session, that an arrangement had existed between the Union and Republic newspapers, to get, and divide the public printing. I was sorry to hear it. The rumor was contradicted. I accepted the contradiction. I heard it again, on what seemed to me pretty good authority, the day before the committee met. This arrangement was made on the 8th of April. On that morning, as I was coming to the Capitol, I met one of the proprietors of the Washington Union—I mean General Armstrong; and I had a conversation with him on this subject. I stated to him, that I understood that this arrangement was about to be made. And, as I expected from him—a gentleman whom I have known for years, and for whom I have ever entertained the highest respect—with an expression of indignation which became him, he said, in substance: "Sir, I know of no such arrangement; and if any such arrangement should be made, I should repudiate it; I love my party; I labor for my party; and any legitimate advantage, in a pecuniary point of view, that I can get in the faithful discharge of my duty to that party, I will receive; but if it is to be obtained by amalgamation and coalition with my political opponents, I would scorn to touch it." I honored him for the sentiment. It was what I expected from what I had known, and what I had always heard, of his course through life. And I do not believe now, that such an arrangement as that of which I have spoken, meets, or can meet, his approval, or would, under any circumstances, be accepted or concurred in by him.

Mr. President, I have said all that I desire to say, in a manner somewhat incoherent and disconnected, it is true, yet, expressing, in substance, the views I entertain. I beg pardon of the Senate for having trespassed so long upon their attention, and am now done.

Mr. SUMNER. May I throw myself for one minute, and only one minute, on the indulgence of the Senate? I also have a personal explanation to make.

Mr. BADGER. I must interpose an objection. Three quarters of an hour have already been taken up on private bill day with personal explanations.

Mr. SUMNER. I only wish one minute.

Mr. BADGER. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. SUMNER. I see by the telegraphic reports in the New York and Boston papers, of what passed in this body on the question of granting lands to the State of Ohio, that the remarks which fell from the honorable Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] are attributed to myself. I am, by that fact, placed, if I may say so, in a false attitude. I am made to say that I would not vote for the bill; and then, upon the yeas and nays, my vote appears as in favor of it. I wished simply to make a correction of that fact, that the inconsistency should not appear before the country. I did not speak on that occasion, but simply voted for the bill, believing that, in doing so, I did an act of justice, at once to the State of Ohio, and no injustice to the old States.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have had some petitions to present, which I wish to get before the committees, and I have been trying for a day or two without succeeding. I want to get through with the morning business. I expect that other gentlemen have petitions as well as myself. I move to suspend the order, requiring this day to be set apart for private bills, until half past one o'clock.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. I must ask the permission of the Senate to make a motion to take up the deficiency bill to-day.

The PRESIDENT. That cannot be done without a suspension of the order.

Mr. HUNTER. Then I move that all prior orders of business be suspended for the purpose of taking up that bill.

Mr. WALKER. Is that in order? We have just decided not to postpone private bills.

The PRESIDENT. This is for a different purpose.

Mr. PRATT. I think it would be much better to have a general understanding that we will meet to-morrow for the purpose of taking up the deficiency bill, if the Senator from Virginia desires it. If there is that understanding, it will produce a general attendance on the part of Senators, and private bills will be proceeded with to-day, as it was expected. The general expectation was that private bills would be taken up to-day, and there are many Senators who desire to vote on the bill, to which the Senator from Virginia refers, who are not in their places, but who would be here to-morrow if such an understanding was had.

Mr. HUNTER. I have no expectation of being able to get through the bill in one or two days, for I have already received notice that it will probably be debated. If it is in order for me to make the motion, I should like to have the sense of the Senate upon it. I have nothing to say. I merely wish a vote.

The PRESIDENT. It will be in order for the Senator to move to suspend the order of business for a specific purpose.

Mr. HUNTER. I submit that motion, for the purpose of taking up the deficiency bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have been trying to get the floor for the purpose of making an appeal to the Senate in behalf of the Territorial bills, which, if not passed by the Senate this week, may not be acted upon in the House of Representatives this session. Seeing that there is a disposition on the part of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the Private Calendar, I am unwilling to ask it to take up the Territorial business to-day, but I ask the Senate to meet to-morrow, and then let us act upon the Territorial bills. Those who do not feel an interest in Territorial business may stay away to-morrow. We will take no exception to it. Those who do take an interest in it are certainly enough to make a quorum, and I hope they will gratify me by coming to-morrow and acting on these bills.

Mr. ATCHISON. If it is in order, I will move, as I find the Senator from North Carolina has neglected his duty, that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT. The motion is not now in order, as there is a motion pending which was made by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ATCHISON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. BADGER. I would suggest to my friend from Missouri to withdraw the latter motion. He need not be alarmed that I shall neglect to attend to my duty.

The motion to lay the motion of Mr. HUNTER on the table, was not agreed to.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would suggest to my honorable friend from Virginia, that it would be better to make the deficiency bill the order of the day for Monday. I am willing to take it up now, and postpone it, and make it the special order for that day. That is the reason why I voted against laying his motion on the table. I know he is in duty bound to press this matter. He is only acting as the chairman of the Committee on Finance ought to act. It is evident that the bill cannot be disposed of this week, and therefore I would suggest that it would be much better, by common consent, to set aside Monday for its consideration.

Mr. HUNTER. I am very reluctant to press this matter, day after day, upon the Senate; but I have received a letter from one of the Departments, informing me that drafts have been drawn upon the Government, and that there are no appropriations to meet them. I believe that every cent of appropriation for the transportation of the Army is exhausted; every cent for forage has been exhausted. I am placed in a disagreeable position. I stand responsible before the country for this delay. All I ask, is for the Senate to give me a vote. If they vote me down, I shall trouble them no more.

The motion to postpone the order of the day was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The Senate accordingly proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill of the House of Representatives, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1852.

It was reported by the Committee on Finance with a number of amendments.

The PRESIDENT. The first amendment occurs in the first section of the bill, and is as follows:

"For completing the floating dry-dock at San Francisco, California, authorized by act of 3d March, 1851, $360,000."

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, it will, perhaps, facilitate the passage of this bill, if I explain its objects and purposes before we enter upon it, and endeavor to define the relations which Congress and the Executive Departments bear towards it. So much has been said elsewhere in relation to the propriety of passing any deficiency bill at all, and so much is likely to be said here in relation to it, that it seems to me that it will perhaps save time if I were to open the consideration of the bill with an explanation of its objects and purposes.

It has been objected that there ought not to be any deficiency bill; that enough ought to be estimated in the beginning and that the Government should confine itself to the appropriations which were then made. Experience will show, if we look back, that the Government has never been able to confine itself to the sum originally appropriated; and, sir, when we look to it, we will find that this capacity in Congress to pass deficiency bills may be eminently useful and serviceable. The deficiency bill grows out of a change in the fiscal year—a change made in the year 1842. Before that time, when appropriations were made for the fiscal year, we used to have constantly—certainly, from 1820—two bills, the first a partial appropriation, the second an appropriation in full. Whoever will refer to the bills of appropriation in the Synoptical Index of the Laws will find abundant evidence of this fact. The first, or partial appropriation, was made that the Government might be supported until the full appropriation was made by Congress, so as to give them time to discuss it. They came then in this order—the partial appropriation first, and the full appropriation afterwards. But when the fiscal year was altered, and made to commence on the first of July, this order was changed; first comes the appropriation, which purports to be a full appropriation for the year, and then comes the deficiency bill, that is to say, the partial appropriation.

Now, I say that this faculty, this capacity to pass a deficiency bill is eminently useful. Without it Congress could not trim down the estimates as they ought to do. Without it, neither Congress nor the Executive could make those experiments towards economical reform which would be practicable, when we know that we can, at any time thereafter, pass a deficiency bill to remedy any mistake or error which would occur. Indeed, the necessity of this capacity to provide for deficiencies I cannot better illustrate than by reference to the history of this very bill. Whatever is indispensable in it originates mainly in this—I now speak of those items which are most essential and important—namely, in the necessity for the military appropriations. The House of Representatives last year were discontented with the estimates for the Navy and War Departments. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means addressed a letter to the Secretaries of the War and the Navy Departments, at the request of the committee, requesting them to diminish their estimates. The Secretaries replied that they could not do so. They did not think their estimates were too high. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means addressed another letter, saying that the committee were determined to reduce, and asking them to designate the items upon which the reduction could be made. The Secretary of War declined, and said that the whole amount was necessary. The Secretary of the Navy did designate some items in his estimates, and the committee made the reductions. In relation to the quartermaster's estimates in the Army, the House cut down one half, striking, as they themselves said, in the dark. Now, I never would (although it is true these bills came up to the Senate too late to give us much time for action) have taken the responsibility of recommending the Senate to pass an appropriation bill with only half the estimated items, if I had not known that if any mistake should occur, we would have the power to remedy it in a deficiency bill. Knowing that, I concurred in the movement of the House most cheerfully, for I believed that the estimates were too large. I believed that the admonition would be wholesome and do good. And I think such was the result, in point of fact. It did good in this: the Secretary of the Navy, for the most part, confined himself within the reduced appropriation. The estimates that are now made for the deficiency bill, added to the appropriations which are made for this fiscal year, do not quite amount to the sum estimated in the quartermaster's department; for instance—there is one large sum of $250,000 for incidental expenses stricken out, for which no estimate is made in the deficiency bill.

But that is not all. I think I shall show, as I proceed in the history of the matter, that whatever reforms have been made—whatever steps have been taken towards reform—and some have been taken—have originated since the criticism on the estimates of last year, and probably originated out of the action of Congress.

But there is another objection to the deficiency bills, and that is, that it is sanctioning the Executive in pursuing a course contrary to law. We pass a law, saying that we appropriate so much; and if we allow the Executive Department to expend more than the sum thus applied, it is said that we sanction them in departing from the law made by Congress, and thus set a dangerous precedent. If that were so, I should acknowledge the force of the objection; but I had occasion the other day to read the section of the act of 1820, in which it was provided—

"That no contract shall hereafter be made by the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, or the Department of War, or of the Navy, except under a law authorizing the same, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment; and excepting, also, contracts for subsisting and clothing the Army or Navy, and contracts for the quartermaster's department, which may be made by the Secretaries of those Departments."

It was obviously necessary that such a power should be reposed in the heads of the Departments, to keep our troops from suffering—to keep them from mutiny, from the want of necessary supplies. These are the most essential items in the bill; and indeed the public service would not suffer greatly, though it would somewhat, if you were to strike out every other item except those in relation to appropriations for subsistence and transportation. Most of those items come under that law. I know there are some things in the deficiency bill which cannot be deemed indispensably necessary at present—some which, in my opinion, ought not to pass; some, again, which were put in it by the committee because they must be paid either in this fiscal year or the next, as they were certainly due, or certainly to be required, during the one year or the other. Some matters included here were omitted in the appropriation last year, and now added, because we shall certainly have to put them either in this bill or in that for the next fiscal year. For instance, we now make the appropriation of $360,000 for the dry-dock in California, instead of providing for it in the regular bill of the next fiscal year. It is put in this, because it will be necessary to provide for it some time or other. The dock was finished sooner than it was expected, and we were asked to put it here, and take it out of the general appropriation bill for the next year. I say, with the exception of items of that character—and one to which I am opposed, that for the Collins line of steamers—the essential provisions of the bill relate to the estimates for the quartermaster's department; for the contracts which they were allowed to make, without any special appropriation, under the law of 1820. So much for that objection.

But there is another objection. It is urged by many—and I believe it is a reason which induced many gentlemen to vote against this bill in the House of Representatives—that the expenditures have been extravagant; and that, if they vote for this deficiency bill, they are admitting that the Executive Departments have made these expenditures properly, and that they are economical; and so believing, they could not vote for it. If I believed that such was the issue upon the vote upon this bill, it would affect my course in relation to it: for I cannot lay my hand on my heart and say, that I believe that the expenditures have been moderate, and proper, and economical. But that is not the issue presented to us upon the passage of this bill. What would be the consequence of our refusing to pass it? Why, the Army would be without forage, or subsistence for the horses, and the necessary means of transportation. They would have to sell the public property, beasts of burden, horses, &c., to get those means; and then, when we come to make an appropriation for the next fiscal year, we shall have to buy them over again—thus subjecting the Government to five times the expense, if we refuse to pass the bill, that we should incur by adopting it, even admitting that many of the items cover extravagant expenditures. It may be asked, then, what is the remedy? Has Congress to sit with its hands tied? Is it to make appropriations when it believes the expenditures have been extravagant? Has it no remedy? There is a remedy: and that remedy is with the people. Let each branch of the Government discharge its duty, within its appropriate sphere. Each is responsible to the common constituency, the people, for the mode in which they have discharged their duties. And what is the duty of Congress? It is to appropriate only to necessary and proper objects; to appropriate to no object which is not necessary and proper. And when the appropriation is made, it is the duty of the Executive so to disburse it, that the Government shall receive the worth of a dollar for every dollar expended.

But suppose that, by lavish and wasteful expenditures, the Government does not receive the worth of the dollar, but only ten cents to every dollar, what is the remedy? It is for Congress to expose the fact before the people; and we have never yet had, in my opinion, and I hope we never will have, the Administration which would not feel the full weight of its responsibility to the people. I believe that this, in the long run, would prove an adequate remedy for abuses of this sort. I acknowledge that the process is slow. But what are we to do, except for each to keep within its appropriate sphere, and discharge its own duties. The theory of our Government supposes a certain discretion to belong to the Executive, and for its exercise he is responsible to those who elected him. Congress is not responsible for the mode in which the money is expended. Could Congress, when it made the appropriations for the year 1849, have foreseen and provided against the fact that an escort was to be sent across the plains to carry Mr. Collyer to California; to carry a collector to his post, at an expense of $34,000 or $35,000, with such a cortège and equipage as might have befitted a Persian satrap, going to his province? Could Congress, when it made the appropriation for the quartermaster's department, for the same year—1849—have foreseen that barracks would be put up in California out of lumber at $500 a thousand? Could Congress provide against the fact that the army in New Mexico would be posted in towns where everything was expensive, and difficult to be obtained, instead of being posted in places where they could have easy access to fuel and provisions, and have the means to obtain them upon cheaper terms? Could Congress foresee or prevent the fact that one quartermaster in New Mexico should have expended, in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1851, for forage alone, $566,892? when, in the year 1844, I believe, the whole of the expenditures for the quartermaster's department was not quite $900,000. (See Quartermaster General's Report for 1850.)

Mr. BRODHEAD. What is the name of that quartermaster?

Mr. HUNTER. His name, I believe, though I am not sure, is Reynolds. The name is not given; but the amount is. He was an assistant quartermaster in New Mexico—not California, as I stated, by mistake.

A SENATOR. Was it at one post?

Mr. HUNTER. There were about seven or eight posts. I will refer to the papers to get at the exact state of the case. I find that this expenditure was for forage in military department No. 9, New Mexico.

I was asked what was the entire expenditure of the quartermaster's department in New Mexico, for the year ending June 30, 1851? I believe it was $806,154. But I will come to that subject presently. I have merely referred to these items for the purpose of showing that it is impossible that Congress can be held responsible for the mode in which the money was expended, and that its sole responsibility was, in appropriating money only for necessary and proper objects, and in providing the sums necessary to carry them out, even although they might be somewhat too large, owing to maladministration. But, sir, I have been asked in private, what is the remedy, if there has been maladministration, and how shall we hold the Executive responsible? Why, sir, we can do so, by exposing the facts to the public. But, it is asked, "How shall we ascertain those facts? There may be abuses, and Congress may not be able to reach one in ten." I admit that fact; and yet, when there has been great expense and extravagance, there will always be a mode of reaching it. One method is, to expose the sum total, to hold up the aggregate result; and if it be of a character calculated to startle the public mind, then the Administration must explain how that expenditure is made. Another mode of reaching and correcting such extravagance is, by going into specific items, and showing that these expenditures were extravagant and improper, as may sometimes be done. I believe that, when we look at the subject in either way, we shall find there has been extravagance and maladministration. Some of these extraordinary expenses might, perhaps, appear to be necessary in the administration of the Government, in distant portions of the country; and it was, at all events, difficult for the Executive to prevent abuses; but these abuses do exist, to a fearful and alarming extent, and I propose, presently, to call the attention of the Senate to some of them.

In the report made a year ago last December, for the year 1850, the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of showing the expenses of the Mexican war, made a table, from which it appears that the average expenses for the years 1843, 1844, and 1845 are taken in one table by way of comparison, and then the years 1846, 1847, and 1848, and then three other years. The average expenses, exclusive of the trust fund expenses in the Post Office Department, and the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt, for the three first years was $25,410,000. The average annual expenses during the years of the Mexican war were $45,729,888. Let us see what is the sum total of the expenditures now. According to his statement, there was expended during the last year $38,028,801, after deducting payments on account of trust funds and the public debt. In the quartermaster's department, there was expended, according to a statement furnished me by its head, $5,286,142 for the fiscal year ending in June, 1851. By a statement furnished me from the Register's office, it appears that of this sum, $5,064,295 were drawn from the Treasury; so that the residue of $1,221,850 was probably derived from Mexican contributions and the civil fund in California. Now, as the statement of expenses in the Secretary's report was taken from the Register's books, we must add this $241,847 to the $38,028,801 to find the real expenditure of $38,270,648 for that year. Such, sir, were the disbursements of one year, and that in time of peace. The estimated expenditures for the present year, exclusive of debt and interest, is $41,533,000, and since that statement, new and large additions have been proposed in this deficiency bill. Now, it will not do to say that this expense was on account of these distant possessions. We had large armies afoot during the Mexican war; and, according to the statements of the present Secretary of the Treasury, the annual expense then, as appeared from the Register's books, was about $45,000,000, or about ten per cent. more than the sum estimated for the present fiscal year. I say, then, that these results show something which requires an explanation.

I find, on comparing the expenditures for the Army proper, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1845, and the year ending June, 1851, that in 1845 the whole expense under that head was $3,155,027; and in 1851 the expense of the Army proper was $8,949,000. When you come to add to that $241,847, to be for expenditures in the quartermaster's department, not appearing in the Register's books, you have an expenditure for the Army proper of upwards of $9,000,000, being about three times as much as it was in 1845. We have the estimate for 10,500 troops in the field; and when we come to take the expense for the quartermaster's department for the last fiscal year, we find it comes very nearly $500 per man under that head alone. In the Army proper, the expense, when the sum of $241,847 is added as above to the Secretary's statement, is about $875 per man. And the whole military expenditures of that year are $11,811,792, as stated in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, $241,847, as appears from the evidence to which I have referred, and $2,062,267 for military pensions would amount to $1,344 per man.

But the fair mode of estimating these expenditures for purposes of comparison, is to take those for the Army proper; and under that head we have, as I have before stated, $875 per man for the last fiscal year. But when we come to look at some of these items, we find they are of a character that must of necessity startle us. During the last fiscal year they spent, in the Quartermaster's Department in Texas alone, $1,040,000; in California, $827,000; in Oregon, $187,000; in New Mexico, $806,154—and how does all this come about? Why, it results from the fact that there has been no elasticity, no flexibility, in the system of administration as applied to new and entirely different circumstances. They persisted in following an old system, designed for an old and thickly-settled country, and applied it to a wilderness. Every other people, exhibiting any administrative genius, and having distant possessions, have adapted their system of administration to the circumstances to which it was to be applied. The old Roman soldier marched with his implements of labor, as well as with his weapons of war, designed to cover himself at night after the march of the day was over. The soldier of the French Imperial Army, when his object was speed, dispensed with the cumbersome equipage of a tent, and found a temporary substitute in the fire of the bivouac. And if something of this sort of administrative genius and talent had been shown in our service, how much might we have reduced the expenditure of the Army at these distant posts! But nothing of this sort was done until very lately. Nothing was done towards making the soldiers help to cover and subsist themselves until very recently. Now, there is a change. On the 8th of January 1851, an order was issued requiring the soldiers to raise provisions for their own use at the posts, and allowing them such prices for them as the United States would have given in the nearest city in which such supplies were usually purchased. This order was but a renewal of one that was originally issued by Mr. Calhoun, when Secretary of War, on September 11, 1818. Why was it allowed to slumber so long, a dead letter on the records of the Department?

We find by reports that this plan is working well. The first quarter from which we have had any account in regard to it is Fort Leavenworth, in which instance we have a cheering report of its good effects. We are also informed that Colonel Sumner intends to execute this order in New Mexico, with a good prospect of effecting a reform in the expenditures, as we are informed by Colonel Swords. (See Quartermaster General's report.) The fact of the change is evidence of the sense of the Department as to its propriety. Have we not a right to complain that this old policy was not sooner renewed?

Another reason of this great expense is, that the army was improperly posted. This, too, is evidenced by the fact, that these posts have been changed, and by the testimony of Colonel Swords. Colonel Swords states that he found the army in New Mexico, posted in towns where everything in the nature of fuel, provisions, and forage, was dear; but they are now taken out of these towns to places where grass grows spontaneously, and the troops may supply themselves on cheaper terms with fuel and quarters. And thus a large expense for forage may, perhaps, be avoided. We also learn that it has been the habit to feed horses with large quantities of grain, and that in a wasteful manner, in a country where corn is sold from $1 60 to $2 80 per bushel. He says that there is one route, especially, which he has been over, on which it is not necessary to feed grain. He mentions an instance of one private train which had been three times across the plains without corn, merely feeding upon grass. He says that he is trying the same experiment successfully, and is feeding in that way. And yet we find this immense expenditure for forage—$600,000 for forage in New Mexico alone—clear in the last fiscal year. We find by his report that the expense of a mule is something like $180 or $190 per year for corn alone, and about $13 50 annually for farriery and medicines. We find the estimate for forage in Oregon, at Steilacoom, to be nearly $20 per month, and at other points $14 36 per month. All this in a country where horses run wild, and mounted Indians ride about with no other support for their horses than the spontaneous growth of the plains. In California the estimate for forage for horses, mules, and oxen, is nowhere less than $20 per month; and in some places, such as Rancho Delcino, the estimate is $40 25 per month, or upwards of $480 per year. In the same estimates we find that at Monterey it is $20 25 per month. And now permit me to read you something in relation to that matter. The estimate for forage at Monterey, California, for the present fiscal year is $20 25 per month, or $243 per annum. I read now from a document from the quartermaster's department, being a report made by Alfred Sully in 1849, while at Monterey. He says:

"For fuel, the country is well supplied with wood on the spot. For forage, the grazing about four miles from here, where most of the public animals are now kept, is pretty good the year round."

So that in 1849 we have an officer reporting to the quartermaster's department that the subsisting of animals by grazing is pretty good the year round, and yet here is an estimate of $20 per month for forage for animals at that point.

But, sir, there is another cause, which I believe has led to a great deal of unnecessary expense. I acknowledge that there are great difficulties in the way. I trust that I am speaking in no captious spirit, but solely with the object of revealing the truth. That other cause which has operated in increasing the expenditure, is the mode in which provisions and other supplies are transported to the army. It is the interest of the subsistence department to purchase provisions, &c., as cheap as they can, and hence they are often purchased at distant places, without regard to the cost of transportation. It is also the interest of the quartermaster's department to have them purchased at points where the transportation will be as little as possible; and in this conflict of interest it is the duty of the Secretary of War to see that the public interest is not thereby damaged. But owing, perhaps, to this conflict of interests, it not unfrequently happens that these stores are transported at a very heavy cost, sometimes at the rate of twenty-two or twenty-three cents per pound, when all things are estimated. Such, I think, was the expense of transporting supplies through Indianola, in Texas, to posts in New Mexico. It is true that the Department is altering this, and, in this respect, I will not say an abuse, but an error, is reforming. They are now contracting for their transportation from Fort Leavenworth, in such a way as to make it cost not more than from twelve to fourteen cents per pound to the contractors, although the expense of escorts and other things swell this rate somewhat. But with respect to all, except a few contracts for transportation made about two years ago, it will be found that these beginnings of reform originated since the criticism of the estimates from the War Department, at the last session of Congress. I do not say that we should not have had them without this, for necessity would have forced them upon the attention of any head of the departments. But one of the great evils is, that the public agents at a distance seem to act without any sense of responsibility to the Government. Sir, we have had cases brought up in which officers of the Army have become contractors to furnish the Army with forage and hay. We shall soon have another case brought before us, in which the Indian commissioner in California undertook to feed thousands of Indians, thereby spending hundreds of thousands of dollars, without the authority of this Government.

Mr. DAWSON. May I ask the permission of the Senator from Virginia to make a remark? He speaks of this case as being brought out by his call; he ought to do the Secretary of War the justice to say that, so far back as the 9th of February, he made a communication to the Senate of that very fact; and asked this body to provide some legislative remedy, as there was no law in existence applicable to it.

Mr. HUNTER. That is certainly the fact. The Senator from Georgia informed me, sir, that the Secretary of War had addressed a letter to him on the subject. I mentioned the call to identify the case.

But, as I was going on to say; these facts show that the hand of authority is wanting to hold the reins with a firmer and more vigorous grasp in those distant portions of our immense empire; that some voice should be raised that would be heard and heeded in those distant regions, or else our agents and officers will act on their own responsibility, without obedience to what is desired or ordered here. But I believe that the expense of keeping up an army in those distant countries must be great—no matter who administers the Government. I believe that there are great and inherent difficulties in the case; and I think that they have not been met in the true spirit of administrative reform. I believe that they did not begin in time; and that, when they did begin, they did not proceed with sufficient vigor. But I am inclined to think that the appropriate committees will have to turn their attention to this subject—for it is impossible that the Finance Committee can attempt it—for the purpose of devising such measures as will enable us to defend these distant possessions at less cost.

Sir, in Oregon we have already made grants of land—why not adopt some system of military colonization, so as to promote the settlement of the country, and render its defense more cheap? some plan which would in fact make the public lands in that Territory support this expense, and in a mode which would facilitate their settlement? This system of military colonization was one of the modes by which the old Romans defended their distant possessions.

Austria now subsists seventeen of her best regiments on her "military frontier," where they furnish not merely military service to the Government, but supply their own rations in consideration of the occupancy of the land. I mention these facts as instances of the modes in which other nations conform their systems of administration to the circumstances of the case, not as examples to be strictly and exactly followed. What should be the system that we should adopt I do not pretend to say. It has been suggested that something is necessary, and I think the subject is worthy of careful consideration. In California General Jesup has recommended, on account of the evil resulting from the desertion of the troops rendering it difficult to defend the country, that a portion of the men should be employed in working in the mines of gold, nearly the whole of which belongs to the Government; and some portion might, perhaps, be thus employed so as to furnish the means for defending the country. How far this suggestion may be worthy of consideration I do not know; but I think it may be of some importance. I understand that the Pueblo Indians, in some places, have been driven away, and are now swelling the bands of the roving tribes who were menacing the frontiers of California. How far these Indians may be made to subserve the general object I cannot say, either by working the mines, or as an auxiliary force in keeping down the Indians—wild hordes who threaten the peace of the country. But I believe it will be better to employ them than to do as the Indian commissioners have done, by attempting to support and feed them at the expense of the Government. If we are to keep peace among them, so as to prevent their destruction by war, and furnish them also with food to support them, it is obvious that they will increase faster than the whites, and the more we do the more trouble we shall have. It seems to me that something in relation to this matter must be done, and done speedily, in order to diminish these expenses.

But I pass from matters merely conjectural and speculative, and come to some facts which are more immediately connected with this bill. I say that the Department ought to push still further the measure it has commenced towards making the troops support and cover themselves.

Before, however, I pass from these matters, I must say, in justice to General Jesup, that I do not think he is responsible for most of the errors to which I have referred. He could not post the army, if the troops were placed in towns, instead of places where fuel and forage were convenient. He could do nothing less than transport the supplies as ordered. If he was ordered to transport supplies by way of Indianola to Santa Fé, he was obliged to do it, if it did cost twenty-two or twenty-three cents per pound to effect it. I believe he did not use the means in his power quite as well as he might have done; but it is very easy to criticize at this distance of place and time—much easier, I know, to criticize than to do; and I, at least, shall not attach any censure to that officer for the matters to which I have referred. I also say, in justice to the head of the War Department, that I think he has been endeavoring to reform abuses; he has been making efforts to do so; but my object is to point out the errors of the Administration, not for purposes of attack, but in order that they may be remedied. There is a class of difficulties to which we are exposed, in regard to which I must say, I think there is a want of efficiency in the quartermaster's department. The accounts of the quartermaster are in arrear ever since the last quarter of the year 1847, and have not been fully settled for five years. For that the quartermaster is not responsible; but I went to the office of the Third Auditor, and I found that there were great and intrinsic difficulties in the way of settling them, from the want of a proper promptness and accountability in the quartermaster's department itself. There was a system commenced during the war—a system of drafts—under which quartermasters draw on each other. Instead of requiring that these drafts should be paid where drawn, within a reasonable time, they were made payable anywhere, and without giving any notice to the accounting officer here. They were made payable, in fact if not upon their face, anywhere, and, I believe, have been paid at other points than those upon which they were drawn; if drawn on New Orleans, they might be paid in New York; and thus they floated about the country as a kind of bills of exchange; whereas it should have been ordered that they should be made payable at a certain place, and within a certain and proper time. Under these circumstances, it became impossible to settle the quartermaster's department. If accounts are not presented and settled at proper times and at fixed periods, it is impossible to make the rests and strike the balances often enough for strict accountability.

It is indispensable that rests and balances should be made periodically, and every exertion should be made to cause them to report promptly. It is a much more important matter than it seems to be; for without it there can be no due degree of responsibility. I was shown, at the Third Auditor's office, a pay roll upon which a clerk signed his receipt for his pay by making his cross mark. Another person, a teamster, signed his in the same way; and yet there was a certificate stating his account, in which his name was signed in a good clerical hand. I was also told that, in one account there was found an error of $25,000 in addition. Another quartermaster brought in, during the Mexican war, the accounts for at least eleven, and perhaps thirteen quarters at one time. The consequence is; that the accounts are all behindhand, and no man can tell what the real amount of the deficiency is. I do not believe there is a man inside or outside of the Department who can pretend to make even a reasonable approximation to the real amount. Accounts of deficiencies have come in from California since this bill was reported which will probably add largely to the amount already estimated. I asked General Jesup how much these would add, and he said he could not tell till the accounts were settled. I know that it is a difficult thing to enforce order and strict regularity in those distant States and Territories, and it is a matter to be accomplished by degrees. It is, however, time to endeavor to enforce a strict and prompt accountability. Without it the Executive cannot know the condition of the public Treasury, nor can Congress know in what manner and in what sums to appropriate money, as I shall show more fully presently. As long as this is the case, they are indeed striking in the dark, as was said in the House of Representatives, when they cut down an appropriation one half. And who can blame them for striking in the dark under such circumstances? for move with what care we may, we are compelled to act without proper light and information.

But why is it that these quartermasters' accounts are in arrears in the Third Auditor's office since the year 1847? I know that Auditor to be an honest, industrious, hard-working man, and that he found the accounts in arrears when he came in, and has not had force enough since to enable him to bring them up. He told me that it was useless to give him any additional force, unless he could have that kind of experience which was required to make out these accounts. How can we know what force to add, or where to add it, unless we have some assistance from the Executive Department? It is now more than a year since the Senate, on my motion, ordered a call upon the Executive to present some plan for equalizing the salaries in the same grade of service, and for reorganizing the clerks in the several Departments, for the purpose of making the force more efficient; and up to this day we have had no answer to the call, although these facts and others were staring them in the face.

I know something about the clerks in the Executive Departments. Some of them, I know, have genius and talent and character enough to fill any post in those Departments, from the highest to the lowest. I know that incompetent and idle men are also to be found there—men who encumber the Departments, and live as useless pensioners upon Government. Good men are laboring there, toiling sometimes by night as well as by day, under the heart-sickening consciousness that no degree of merit can insure them promotion, or always preserve the places which they already fill; but that idle and incompetent men may be placed over them merely because they can command more political influence. If these Departments were reorganized—if their modes of transacting business were more systematized, and the machinery so adjusted as to show by its working both the competent and incompetent hands which it employed—and, above all, if this organization held out a proper prospect of reward and promotion to merit—the public business would be better performed, and by fewer persons, and at less expense.

Sir, let the clerks once know that merit will be rewarded, and that idleness will be punished, and you will soon see another and a different spirit animating them. There is talent enough in these Departments, if they were properly organized, to make them such models of business establishments as any Secretary who presided over them might well contemplate with pride and pleasure. But, sir, to effect this desirable end these Departments must be so organized as to do justice; the employees must know, as every American citizen in any other occupation knows, that the road to promotion is open to them, if they are industrious and honest and capable; and that if worthless and incompetent, they must leave the places for better men to supply. In doing this, we would not only insure at less than the present cost a much more efficient service, but we should elevate the character and respectability, and increase the happiness of the corps of clerks themselves; and I submit if this be any small object. Is not a corps of efficient and experienced clerks as essential to the good government of our country as an army or a navy? And yet, sir, notwithstanding these circumstances, which appeal so strongly not only to the sense of policy, but to the humanity of those who administer the Government, the call to which I have referred has been slumbering in the Executive Departments for more than a year, and no answer has been given to it as yet. Sir, surely the condition of these Departments calls for some amendment and reform. The Third Auditor requires some additional force, and we ought to give him force enough to settle the current accounts promptly as they come in, and to bring up the old arrearages of accounts as rapidly as can well be done. It is a shame that with an overflowing Treasury we cannot state what is its true condition, or settle promptly the accounts of our public servants. What is so likely to demoralize the public service as the want of strict and prompt accountability on the part of the agents of Government?

But, Mr. President, this is not the only difficulty. There have been innovations upon old usages, in my opinion upon old laws, which have been highly detrimental. I do not say that these innovations originated with this Administration. Some of them were ready-made to their hands, and some of them, so far as I can ascertain, did originate with this Administration—abuses which Congress ought to suppress. I shall show you some of the reasons for the present confused state of our public accounts, and how it is that we cannot act intelligently in relation to them.

We all know that in 1795 a law was passed, requiring all balances of appropriations, with certain exceptions, which were unexpended after two years from their date, to be carried to the surplus fund. Then, in 1820, we passed a law covering cases in which these appropriations were drawn by the Secretaries of the War and Navy, and requiring that they should be returned to the fund within two years. Well, how have they regarded that law? They have been acting on it, I am told, for eight years past, under the idea—and how they derived it I know not—that unless the Secretary of War, or of the Navy, said the purpose was accomplished for which the appropriation was made, it would not go into the surplus fund; and that in opposition to a lucid and cogent opinion of an Attorney General, given upon the very case to which I refer. I mean that of Mr. Berrien, Attorney General of the United States, on the 13th March, 1831, when his opinion was taken in reference to this very matter, and in which he gives it as his clear and decided opinion, that the money must go into the surplus fund. It is too long to read here, but I wish I had time to do so; and I submit that every person who does read it, must come to the conclusion that it is the correct construction of the law.

But, permit me to go one step further before I proceed to illustrate how this practice of reserving appropriations from the surplus fund, after the two years have expired, is working in the Departments. We all know, that when the system of specific appropriations was adopted, there was nothing about which Congress showed so much jealousy as the power of transfer. It was a power that they confined to the President, alone. It was a power that they restricted to certain appropriations for the War and Navy Departments. In this same act of 1820, there are two sections, (three and four,) which forbid a transfer of any appropriation made for one year in a succeeding year, and allowing a limited power of transfer within the year for which the money was appropriated; (see act, May 1st, 1820;) but this power was vested in the President alone, and strictly guarded. But, in 1842, when the present President was chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means—at a time when they were very anxious to restrict executive discretion, and when everything was being done to diminish it;—for at that time the Committee of Ways and Means was not very favorable to the acting President—they passed an act entitled "An act legalizing and making appropriations for such necessary objects as have been usually included in the general appropriation bills, without authority of law, and to fix and provide for certain incidental expenses of the Departments and offices of the Government, and for other purposes."

But observe, Mr. President, that this was passed for the purpose of limiting Executive discretion, to fix everything by law, and to allow as little discretion as possible as to these incidental expenses. Towards the end of the act, in the twenty-third section, it is provided, that "In case the sum appropriated for any object shall be found more than sufficient to meet the expense thereby contemplated, the surplus may be applied, under the discretion of the head of the proper Department, to supply the deficiency of any other item in the same Department or office."

This was obviously designed to apply to the objects mentioned in the act itself. But the Secretaries now undertake to transfer, upon their own authority, from any one head to any other in their own Departments, and this under the very provision designed to restrict and curtail the Executive power as much as possible. The consequence is, that, with this construction of power in relation to the surplus fund, and this claim of power in relation to transfer, we never know what is appropriated; and all attempts to limit expenses by specific appropriations have been perfectly vain and futile.

Let me come back to a case that will illustrate the mischiefs, both from the construction of the surplus fund clause and from the power of transfer, as it is now claimed: There was a case from Florida, of the steamer Watchman. A bill was rendered for service in 1835 and 1836. The Third Auditor reported on the case in 1850. There was nothing to pay the claim, in the event that it was allowed, except by using an old appropriation, which ought to have passed to the surplus fund, and then by transferring it to a different object from that which was originally designed. There was an old appropriation for the payment of Florida militia men, in 1839 and '40. Under the act of 1820 no such transfer could be made even within two years from the date of appropriation, and accordingly this twenty-third section of the act of 1842 was invoked for the purpose. The Secretary of War drew a transfer warrant upon this old appropriation, made in 1839-'40, transferring it to another head, and paying the claim of $24,750, a claim which, I believe—I will not speak positively—was for the use of a steamboat for fifty-five days. You now observe, that if this appropriation, which was made in 1839-'40, had gone to the surplus fund, as it ought to have gone, they could not have used it for the purpose of paying that debt. I examined the case of the transfer of that appropriation, and I found there were two opinions—one in which the Secretary of War showed, as I think, that the power did not exist; and the other, in which the Attorney General said it did. The Secretary of War said, however, that he felt bound to defer to the opinion of the Attorney General.

Well, what is to be the result of all this? In the first place, every old appropriation which has not been carried to the surplus fund, constitutes a source of strong temptation to the clerks to sell their knowledge to persons who work for such claims, and every facility is afforded to easy and pliant, or to corrupt public officers, should such exist, to allow these claims, and pay them in a mode which would scarcely ever attract public observation with such practices as these in regard to these surplus fund and transfer warrants. How is it in the power of Congress to limit the expenses? Of what use are specific appropriations? We make a specific appropriation that we may spend so much under such a head, and yet it turns out that it is no limitation at all; for the Departments go to some old appropriation, which has not been passed to the surplus fund, and transferring it under the act of 1842, they thus swell the amount far beyond what we dreamed of when the old appropriation was made. Allow me to illustrate this. The appropriations actually made for the year 1851 for the Quartermaster's Department, as far as I can ascertain them from the House documents, amounted to $3,915,912. Now, by a statement obtained from the Register's office, as to the whole sum expended under appropriations and repayments, and transfers, I find that it amounted to $5,064,295; but the amount actually expended, according to General Jesup's statement, was $5,286,142. So that we commenced with an appropriation of $3,915,912 for the year 1851, and expended actually $5,286,142. This amount was composed of Mexican contributions, of appropriations made for that year, of balances of old appropriations, and of transfers to the amount of $730,000.

Let us see where some of these transfers came from. One of them came from an appropriation for paying the regular troops, made the 18th of March, 1847, amounting to $150,000, an appropriation which ought long since to have gone to the surplus fund. Another case is that of an appropriation made for extra pay, in August, 1848, of $380,000, which was transferred also, making in all, of these old appropriations, $530,000. These transfers were made in April, 1851.

Sir, how can Congress limit expenses by limiting the appropriations, while the Departments are thus allowed to refer to old appropriations and transfer them ad libitum?

Thus we see that in every way we are mystified, and that it is impossible to restrict expenditures by specific appropriations, as we neither know what is wanting nor how much is already applicable to the particular service under old appropriations.

Now, I do not charge this on the Administration as having been designed. I say that these abuses have been accumulating, some for eight years past, and some within the last four years. The present construction of the act of 1842, and the practice of transfer under it, originated, I believe, under the present Administration. In relation to the abuses, or what I believe to be abuses, as to the surplus fund, the Administration is responsible not for originating, but continuing them. Certain it is that these practices ought either to be abandoned, or we should give up the system of specific appropriations. The two cannot coexist without a manifest contradiction. I know that they excuse it by saying when an appropriation is made for an object which is not completed, it is useless to pay money into the surplus fund which has not been expended within two years, because it may be required to satisfy existing contracts. But how easy would it be, after the expiration of that period, to pass it to the surplus fund, and then get it reappropriated.

What, sir, was the object of the provision? The Attorney General (Mr. Berrien) said that one object was to enable the Government to have its means at its disposal. But there was another and a more important object, which was, to create periodical rests and balances, so as to enable the Government to know the true state of its accounts; to know how far certain objects were already provided for by existing appropriations, and how far new appropriations would be necessary. In short, sir, such a system of rests and balances was indispensable to accomplish the objects proposed by the mode of specific appropriations.

Now, sir, a word or two in relation to the present estimate for deficiencies in the quartermaster's department. If I were to express an opinion in regard to those estimates and the real deficiency—and I do not believe that any man can speak of the amount of the deficiency with anything like certainty—I should say that the estimate is under what will be wanted. I find, when we come to add what is estimated for deficiencies to what is already appropriated for this fiscal year, that the sum is about $900,000 less than was expended last year. I know, too, that there are many unsettled accounts that remain to be adjusted; but I do not know what they will disclose. I think it probable, however, that they will disclose still greater deficiencies; and, under these circumstances, I think it is not only proper, but necessary that we should appropriate the amount which is asked for these objects. I wish, sir, I could believe that the amount estimated would pay all demands under the present deficiency bill. If that were so, I should be glad to pass these estimates, and take a receipt in full. But, however that may be, there is one thing to which we think Congress should turn its attention, and that is, to the adoption of such laws as will enforce a strict and prompt accountability of the Departments. The Executive, too, should take such steps, and call upon us, if necessary, to pass the measures proper for adapting our system of military administration to the circumstances of the country in which it is to be applied. I think, too, that a strict accountability and obedience to orders ought to be exacted from our officers and agents who are acting at a distance from the seat of Government.

Sir, this thing of officers undertaking to pledge the credit of the Government, and to incur large expenses without authority, is a matter which it seems to me should be promptly put a stop to. But these are affairs which more properly belong to the Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and to the Senator from California, as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. These are matters of reform which I beg to commend to their attention; for I believe they are grave enough to demand their attention, and that of the Executive too. I regret, sir, that I have had to trespass so long upon the time of the Senate in making these remarks; but I thought that it would facilitate the progress of the bill if I did so. I felt it due to myself, because I advocate the passage of the deficiency bill now, and because some of my friends think that it is sanctioning a spirit of extravagance to do so. I wished to place the matter upon the true ground, and to defend myself against all such imputations.

I had another reason: it was my duty to make an exhibit of the state of the Treasury in relation to these matters, as far as I could do so, and as clearly and as explicitly as I could. I regret that I was not able to obtain all the information necessary to enable me to make a clear and explicit statement of our financial condition. The state of our public accounts is such that I do not believe any man can do it; and any person who attempts to straighten the tortuous thread of the discourse of our Executive Departments will find that he has a tangled yarn to deal with. It was once said by a distinguished Frenchman, that "words were made to conceal ideas;" I think I might say, with greater truth, that our system of public accounts has been perverted so as to conceal facts. I do not charge this on the heads of departments, for I am speaking now, not so much of persons as of a system. So far as I know them, they are clever gentlemen; and it is not my purpose to wound or disparage them. I believe, that so far as they are concerned, they inherited some errors; that they have made large additions of their own to the stock on hand; and that, when they come to transmit the inheritance, it will be sadly incumbered.

I know the difficulty surrounding the whole subject, and I feel that more allowances should be made for errors in applying a system to a new country, than in administering it to an old one. In short, my opinion is that "the times are out of joint;" and I do not feel quite sure that these gentlemen "were born to set them right."

Mr. GWIN. I wish to say something to the Senate in reference to some of the remarks which have been made by the Senator from Virginia, but as it is a matter of importance that we should have an Executive session, I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed till to-morrow, in order that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of Executive business.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish the gentleman would withdraw the motion, to allow me to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GWIN. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not read the bill, but I wish to know from the gentleman from Virginia whether he proposes any remedy to obviate the abuses, and to repeal the obnoxious laws of which he has spoken?

Mr. HUNTER. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky, that it is my design to try the sense of the Senate by an amendment on that question. Some of these things did not come to my knowledge until after the bill was reported.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to make a few remarks, if they would not interfere with the Executive session asked for by the Senator from California. I shall conclude directly, so that he can take the floor and occupy it when the bill comes up in the morning. I asked the chairman of the committee whether there were any propositions in this bill to remedy the evils of which he complains, and he tells me there are not; but with that quickness which belongs to him, foreseeing, I suppose, that the attack upon the Administration was altogether misplaced, unless there was a proposition pending to remedy the evils of which he complains, he notifies me that he intends, before we get through the bill, to offer amendments for the purpose of meeting the objections which he has pointed out.

The tenor of the remark which he has made has been to place the fault upon the Administration, in many respects, when the fault, as I conceive, belongs to Congress. Where did that system of abuse, of which he has complained, in respect to the inefficiency of the clerical corps of the Department originate? I admit that it exists. But it originated in that system of removals from office which had its origin in an Administration, which we all know ought to be charged with it. The system has been continued. The system exists; and if it does continue, it will, in my humble opinion, render totally inefficient the operations of the Government here. Who can rely upon holding a clerical office in any of the Departments? The man that gets an office, expects, upon a change of Administration, to lose his office. What incentive has he to qualify himself for the station? What motive has he to be faithful to the country? What hope can he have of advancing himself by promotion? What chance of promotion ahead is there to stimulate him to do his duty? None whatever. As for the gentleman's complaints in respect to the system of an inefficient clerical corps here, he must attribute it to the party with which he is identified—with which he associates—and not to the party now in power in the Executive branch of the Government. Sir, all my life, I have been for reforming these abuses. All my life I have been against this system of things; and I commend to the country the remarks of the honorable gentleman when he says that he is in favor of a system of things which shall hold out some hope of promotion to the individuals who are thus employed in the performance of clerical duties in the Departments here. Let them be put upon the footing of the Army and Navy. I will go for that. He will find me standing at his back, when he brings forward a system by which something like security, permanence, and promotion shall be held out to these individuals, to stimulate them to do their duty. Sir, if there be an object upon the face of the Almighty's earth deserving of sympathy, it is the condition of a poor clerk, with a wife and starving children, which administration after administration has deprived of office, without any fault on his part, and turned upon the world to starve. I know of instances of this sort. I know of Democratic instances of this sort that have been made victims to Whig administrations. This state of things is not confined to Whigs alone. Sir, I know of individuals acting with the Democratic party, who have received this treatment; though many more on the other side have received it, from those to whom I am politically opposed. It is a system every way warring against the public interests, and which ought to be broken up; and the man who can do it, be he of what party he may, will deserve the thanks of the country for accomplishing it.

The gentleman speaks of the condition of the Departments; but who is to blame for that? Time and again, session after session, year after year, I have occasionally got up and suggested the propriety of appointing committees to go and inspect these Departments, and see how their business is conducted, and to inform the country how it is carried on, and what is the condition of the various bureaus. I have not even got one respectful listener to a proposition of that sort, much less have I been able to find an individual willing to cooperate in such a scheme. Never has a response been made on the part of a member of this body or of the other House, so far as I know, to institute these examining committees, which every State Legislature in this Union is in the habit of appointing in relation to the administrations of the various States. It is no wonder, then, that we should hear complaints as to our total ignorance of the manner in which the public business is conducted in the Departments. You will not examine; you will not take the steps necessary to get that information, either for yourselves or for the country; and then, when you do not do it, you speak of your total ignorance of what has been going on in the Departments, and the bad manner in which they conduct their business.

A word, now, in regard to some of the abuses which are alleged to exist. A year or two ago, I proposed a plan by which we should endeavor to arrive at them. It was to get annual reports of the prices of labor, of the prices of every kind of agricultural produce, and to get this information at every part of the country. I submitted a series of resolutions, to get all that information expressly with a view to enable us to form some idea, when the Departments reported, as to the contracts for supplies for forage and subsistence, &c., whether they had exceeded that reasonable economy in the management of the public affairs which an individual would observe in conducting his own business. Yet, a celebrated gentleman, on the opposite side, when such resolutions were brought up for consideration some years ago—the late Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Benton]—endeavored to convert the whole proposition into ridicule; and so far succeeded that nobody thought of adopting it. The inefficiency of this body and the other House, in taking the necessary steps to watch over every Administration, is the great fault why the public business is not better managed.

Now, in reference to these abuses which are complained of, can the gentleman tell me how much cheaper any given amount of work could have been performed by the quartermaster's department than it has been performed for? You cannot tell whether there has been an abuse; you cannot tell whether the quartermaster's department has paid more than it ought to have paid for any given article, unless you can tell me the prices at which the article had been furnished, and the cost of transportation to the place where it was wanted. How can you get up and make a general denunciation in reference to the abuses of any of these departments, unless you can specify the prices and show the difference between what the thing could have been furnished for and what it was furnished at? There is no possibility of telling whether there has been extravagance or not. You require a given amount of service; you say that so many rations shall be placed at a given point in California, for instance. You say this thing, that thing, and the other shall be done. Of course, you include the means of doing it. Then you can only tell whether the Executive Department has performed the duty in a proper manner, and at a proper price, when you are furnished the data on which the contracts were made. Now, is it right to indulge in denunciation without having that data? Can anything of that sort be tolerated? Give us the data. Show the thing which the law required to be done. Show the thing which the public service required to be done. Show the price at which it was done, and then show, by satisfactory evidence, how much less it could have been done for. When all this information is given, we can see whether it has been done properly, correctly, and economically.

Mr. PRATT. The Senator from Virginia, I believe, suggested the idea of starving the Indians, to prevent them from multiplying, in order to save expense.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, sir, that idea has been suggested.

Mr. HUNTER. I have advanced no such idea. I said it would be better to employ them in work, than to feed them in idleness. I did not say that they would starve by being employed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was about to borrow the idea; but if the gentleman disclaims it, of course, I will not do so. I believe I will not follow out the train of remark which, perhaps, I might indulge in, and which it might be well enough for me to indulge in. But these remarks can be suggested when the honorable Senator from Virginia shall offer the amendments which he contemplates to offer, and which I am glad that he intends to offer. I shall most assuredly vote for everything that shall tend to put proper restrictions upon every Administration. I hold to the doctrine of specific appropriations; and if the Departments are in the habit of committing abuses, by transferring appropriations, or in any other way, so as to cover up the facts, I shall, most assuredly, vote for that remedy which will make them exhibit the facts, and enable us, by looking, if we will look, into the accounts kept at the Departments, to ascertain what are the facts. I think that all these appropriations, after a given time—and you may shorten it, if it is not short enough already—which go into the surplus fund, ought to constitute a part of the mass in the Treasury, subject to specific appropriations; and that the discretion of the Departments ought to be taken from them after a given length of time. Some little latitude must be allowed to all Administrations. You cannot get along by exact rules without some little discretion. The public service will require some discretion to be lodged in the Departments. But I am for allowing as little discretion as possible, in reference to money and its appropriation for specific objects. If the system is found to work well, I regret that those who are charged with the financial concerns of the country—those committees of the two Houses of Congress, whose business it is to look into that subject, (and it has never been mine—and I have sometimes been sorry that it has not been,) should not have corrected those laws which admit of the abuses of which the Senator from Virginia has complained.

Mr. PRATT. It was at my suggestion, made in a laughing manner, that the Senator from Kentucky referred to the Indians. Now I understood the Senator from Virginia distinctly to say, that if the United States continued to furnish the Indians with bread, they would multiply faster than the whites, and consequently would occasion trouble and expense to the Government. That was his argument. So, of course, the sequitur from it is, beyond all doubt, correct, that the better plan would be to starve them, or, still better, perhaps, shoot them, and get rid of them in this way.

Mr. HUNTER. What I said was, that certainly it would be better to employ them in work than to feed them in idleness.

Mr. PRATT. Perhaps that was what the Senator meant to say.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not know that we are under obligations to feed everybody who is hungry. I do not know that any obligation rests upon us to support all the Indian tribes. I am not aware that this is a part of the obligations that rest upon us. I did say, that if we are to support every idle and wild Indian who rides over the plain, and give him as much as he wants, and then pay to keep the peace for him, and prevent any man killing him, the Indians would probably increase at this rate faster than the white men who are to support them. The difference between the Senator from Maryland and myself is this: he has more sympathy for the Indian who rides about doing nothing, and I have most sympathy for the white man whom he would make labor to support the Indian. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRATT. I did not attempt to express any sympathy or opinion of my own. I only stated what the Senator from Virginia had said, not what he meant to say; and I appeal to every one who heard him first, whether I did not, in words, state verbatim exactly what he did say, that if the Government of the United States furnished the Indians with bread, it would necessarily occasion their multiplication beyond the whites, and would bring with it, as a consequence, increased expense to the Government. That is what he said.

Mr. HALE. I listened to the Senator from Virginia with a good deal of satisfaction. But I want to say this, not so much for his benefit as for the benefit of the country, that he may expose just as many abuses as he pleases, but the idea of getting Congress to remedy them at this time, is perfectly idle. I will tell him the reason why it is so. He belongs to the dominant party—not exactly, however, for the parties are so fixed now, that it is hard to say which is dominant—but he belongs to the dominant majority in this body, and the Senator from Kentucky belongs to the friends of the Administration. Let the honorable Senator point out as many abuses as he pleases in the Administration—does he suppose that the Democrats will reform them now? No, sir; they will take care to see that they are properly used by their friends, who are ready to come into power so soon. That is the result. There will not be one of those abuses reformed by any enactment of Congress at this time. Gentlemen are exceedingly opposed to them; but there is not time to reform them. Besides that, it is very inconvenient to reform them, when the party practicing them are going out, and the other party are shortly to have the benefit of them.

But if the honorable Senator from Virginia thinks that he has brought to the consideration of the Senate, at this time, the most glaring abuses which exist in the Administration—which exist palpably with the light of the sun shining upon them, so that everybody can see them—he is exceedingly mistaken. I hold in my hand a report submitted to this body by the Secretary of the Navy, near two years ago, by which he discloses to the Senate the fact, that he is expending and disbursing thousands upon thousands of dollars of the public money annually, not only without law, not only in abuse of law, but in the direct face of the law.

I refer to the Senate Executive document No. 51, of the first session of the Thirty-first Congress, laid upon our tables on the 28th of May, 1850, by which it appears that the Secretary of the Navy, by virtue of an order issued on the 20th October, 1842, and subsequently on the 30th of September, 1848, (and I wish the members of the Senate would read it,) is paying annually thousands upon thousands to every officer of the Navy who is attached to a navy-yard, in the shape of allowances, which he regulates and graduates in the face of a provision of the law of March 3, 1835, which enacts that the pay there provided shall be in full of all compensation, and shall exclude all allowances under any circumstances whatsoever. Now, while we know this, and while the Secretary of the Navy comes here and tells us that he is paying out, not only without law, but against law, and in spite of the law, this amount of money, what is the use of talking about abuses? Let us see, first, that these things, which are palpable, and which are not abuses of the law, but direct violations of the law, running in its very face, can be remedied. After that has been done, let us attempt to remedy abuses; and until that is done, it will be idle to attempt it.

I rejoice exceedingly that the attention of the Senate, and of the country, has been called to these abuses; but I want to call the attention of the country to the state of things that will exist. Congress will adjourn at the end of this session, and will finally conclude its labors on the 3d of March of next year, and there will not be the first letter of a law passed that will remedy one single one of these abuses; but they will stand, and the next year they will increase and will be larger. Instead of the Administration being more efficient in regard to them, it will be more loose, and the abuses will increase and go on just exactly as long as the present system of things continues.

Mr. CASS. Does the Secretary in his report say that he makes the allowances against law?

Mr. HALE. No, sir.

Mr. CASS. Is it a question of construction?

Mr. HALE. I will read the law.

Mr. BADGER. Give us the items for which the payments are made.

Mr. HALE. I will give the items. The act to which I allude was passed on the 3d of March, 1835, and it is entitled "An act regulating the pay of the Navy." The second section of the act (and I call the attention of the Senate to it) is in these words:

"And be it further enacted, That no allowance shall hereafter be made to any officer in the naval service of the United States for drawing bills, for receiving or disbursing money, or for transacting any business for the Government of the United States; nor shall be allowed servants, or pay for servants, or clothing or rations for them, or pay for the same; nor shall allowance be made to him for rent of quarters, or for rent for furniture, or for lights, or for fuel, or for transporting baggage. And it is hereby expressly declared, that the yearly allowance provided in this act is all the pay, compensation, and allowance that shall be received under any circumstances whatever by any such officer or person, except for traveling expenses, when under orders, for which ten cents a mile shall be allowed."

In the face of that provision, which, it seems to me, does not admit of very great latitude of construction, by an order of the Secretary of the Navy, of September 30, 1848, there is allowed to every commandant of a navy-yard—

There is thus an increased pay allowed to these officers, under the order of the Secretary of the Navy, in the face of the law, I should think something like six hundred or a thousand dollars a year. This provision is made not only for the commandants, but also for the commanders, lieutenants, pursers, surgeons, masters, assistant-surgeons, boatswains, carpenters, sail-makers, and God knows who; I do not, sir. This fact has been before the Senate for nearly two years. In the face of the most direct and positive prohibition that the English language, by any possibility, is capable of, this order of the Secretary of the Navy is allowed to exist—raising and increasing the compensation of these officers thus much. Now, if we allow such things; if we say nothing about such things, why should we talk about abuses? If the compensation of these gentlemen is not enough, raise it, until it is enough. But while such is the law, and while such is the prohibition expressed in as plain a manner as the English language can make it, and the Secretary of the Navy comes in with his order, and increases the compensation ten, fifteen, or twenty-five per cent., what is the use of talking about abuses? The fact is, that the administration of these various Departments practically, is above any legislation we can have here; and, until there is some efficiency in seeing the laws that we pass executed, it is perfectly idle to pass them. If a system of accountability, or something else, cannot be established, which will give efficiency to the laws that we pass, it is idle to undertake to talk of reforming anything by the passage of laws.

Mr. BADGER. The remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire afford a striking instance, how easy it is to assert that one thing is in direct opposition to another, and that it is clear, plain, certain, inevitably and indisputably opposed to the other; when perhaps on a little examination it may appear, that there is no inconsistency between them at all. Now, so far from my being able to perceive that there is any opposition between the law, which the Senator has read, and the order of the Secretary of the Navy in 1848, they strike me as relating to subjects of an entirely different kind, and that the order is perfectly consistent with the law. The law of 1835 gives an increase of annual compensation to the officers of the Navy, graduating it in each grade according to the particular service upon which they were placed; and it declared that the compensation should be in full of all pay and allowances to them, with the exception of the allowance for traveling expenses. What is all this long list of "pokers," and "sofas," and "sideboards," and "shovels and tongs," and "carpets," which the honorable Senator has read? What has that to do with the provision of the law? Those pokers, and shovels and tongs, and other articles are not given to the officers—not at all. It would be just as much in place, to allege inconsistency, if he were to say that a commodore, who is in command of a seventy-four which has sofas and chairs, and beds, and other articles of the kind, on board, which are put there for the accommodation of the commodore, and also other accommodations put there for the convenience and advantage of the lieutenants, and for the convenience and advantage of the subordinate officers, and of the men, are compensations made to them in violation of law. Sir, it is not so. The law has no application to it.

The Government has certain navy-yards. They build houses to accommodate the officers and the men who are to be stationed there. I wish to ask the Senator if the use of the houses, in addition to the pay and allowance, is forbidden by the act? Why, certainly not; no more than the use of the ship which shelters the officers, and is to them a floating house, is a violation of the act of 1835. The Government puts furniture on board the ship, or floating house. Is that any violation of the law? Why, certainly not. It is not a bit more a violation of the law than to say that the planks which form the floor of the cabin, which are paid for by the Government, and upon which the officers walk, or the deck which covers their heads, and forms a roof to protect them from the weather, is an additional allowance, and in violation of the law. What the Government does with regard to the floating house upon which the officer is put, it does with regard to the stationary house upon shore, in which the officer is put. It does not take an officer and send him to these navy-yards, where he is to stay, according to the regulations, for two, or at best three years, and compel him to expend thousands of dollars from his own money to furnish the house in which he is to live—which would be just as reasonable as to require him to build the house in which he is to live. He is a temporary occupant, according to the regulations, having to go to some other station every two or three years. Therefore, it was thought just and reasonable that the house on shore should be furnished, in which a man lives who is to command a yard, as that the house at sea, or ship, should be furnished. But the furniture does not belong to him. It belongs to him no more than the ship or house at sea belongs to him. It is Government furniture. It is put there for his accommodation when he is ordered to a station. And when he is transferred somewhere else, and does not need the use of it, it belongs to his successor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Like furnishing the President's House.

Mr. BADGER. I thank the honorable Senator for the illustration. The Constitution of the United States declares, that the compensation of the President, fixed by law, shall be neither increased nor diminished during his continuance in office. Congress cannot, without violating the Constitution, add one dollar to his salary; but, I pray you, did it ever enter into any man's head that we were increasing the compensation of the President, in violation of the Constitution, when we voted a sum of money to pay for the furniture of the President's House? Why, Mr. President, did you, or did any gentleman imagine that he was violating the Constitution and increasing the pay of the President when, in the course of the last session, we made appropriations for carrying gas-lights into the President's House, a convenience which he had not had before? Now, are not the two cases precisely parallel? That law is a rule of conduct to the Departments, and the Constitution is the rule of law to us. If we may furnish the President's House without violating a provision of the Constitution which inhibits us from increasing his salary, surely it is equally true that there is no violation of that law when the Secretary of the Navy fixes the rule by which furniture shall be put into the house to be occupied by the commander of the yard. The Secretary's order was in every respect a correct one. It was the usage of the Government to furnish these houses. It was the duty, and properly the duty, of the Government to furnish them. That order, so far from being liable to censure, is, in my judgment, entitled to great praise. It was to prevent extravagance in furnishing these houses. It was to have furniture suitable, decent, creditable, and proper to the rank of the individual, and, at the same time, prevented any charge on the Government which might be considered extravagant or ostentatious. That was the whole matter. It seems to me, therefore, that if this is the only additional case the Senator has to present of a plain, palpable violation of the law, he has been very unsuccessful in the search.

My friend from Maryland reminded me, and the Senator from New Hampshire will know whether it is correct or not, that at a former session, the Senator moved some provision or limitation to the naval appropriation bill, prohibiting money being paid for these expenditures.

Mr. HALE. I do not remember ever having made such a proposition. I know that I moved a resolution which called out the report from which I have read.

Mr. BADGER. We were under that impression, however; and we also supposed that that had been voted down. If that was so, why we have the construction of Congress coinciding with the construction of the Secretary. But there is the law. It is nothing more in conflict with what the Senator has read than the Constitution, in regard to the compensation of the President, is in conflict with what we have done from the foundation of the Government. The practice to which the Senator refers did not date in 1848. It was coeval with the act of 1835. It existed then. It has existed continually since, and I apprehend that nobody but the Senator from New Hampshire has supposed that there was any conflict between the law and that practice. But the Secretary of the Navy, by his order of 1848, intended to restrict the amount of the allowance and prevent abuses. That is, I take it, the whole matter.

Mr. HALE. I am glad to hear this explanation. I think the Senator from North Carolina has satisfied everybody of the wide diversity of the case he has taken to illustrate the matter, and the one I have brought before the Senate. He illustrates the order of the Secretary without law and against law; for when I am talking about the English language I can talk as plain as anybody, to an appropriation made by Congress to furnish the President's House. I am not going to discuss the constitutionality of that provision. I produced an order of the Secretary of the Navy, made, I say, by the plainest construction of language, against the law, and it is likened to an appropriation made in pursuance of law—an appropriation made by law.

I am glad that this matter has come up. I do not expect to reform these abuses. I only expect that they will be increased by the next Administration. Let me, however, give an illustration. Our compensation is fixed at eight dollars a day. Suppose some gentleman here should go and hire a house in the city of Washington, and call upon the Secretary of the Senate to give an order to the upholsterers and cabinet-makers, and other gentlemen who keep wares that are suitable for furnishing a house, and the Secretary issues an order for some $1,500 or $2,000 worth of furniture—not to be furnished to the Senator—oh, no, sir, the Senator is not to have a dollar's worth of it, but it is to be put into his house, and he is to use it—the United States all the time owning it. According to the argument of the Senator from North Carolina, that would be no abuse. It would be no violation of the law. The Senator would not have received more than eight dollars a day. To be sure there would have been some property paid for; but the United States would own it, and he would have had but the use of it. It is said that this constitutes no compensation, pay, or allowance of these officers. Why? Because the Government own the furniture all the time, and he has had nothing but the use of it.

I have nothing to do with the argument that this is exceedingly convenient. If the compensation paid to the officers of the Navy is not enough, I am willing to go ever so far to increase it to what is necessary. If it is necessary that this allowance should be made, let them have it; but let them have it under the law, and not against the law. That is my complaint. It seems to me that the Secretary of the Navy, when he made this order, was perfectly sensible of the impropriety of it; for I will tell you how it reads: "The allowance of furniture to the several houses provided 'by the Government, at navy-yards, stations, and hospitals, occupied by officers and others, in the service of the Government,' shall be so and so." The Secretary of the Senate might make an allowance to the houses that we occupied, and furnish them at the expense of the Government, and then, of course, there would be no increase of pay, allowance, or compensation to us. We should be receiving only eight dollars a day, and have this in addition.

This system of extra compensation and allowance for rent, for furniture, quarters, traveling expenses, &c., prior to the passage of the act of 1835, had got to be an enormous abuse. By the act of 1835, if I am not exceedingly mistaken, the average pay of these officers was raised nearly one hundred per cent. It was nearly doubled. I think that will be found to be the fact. It produced a good deal of opposition, and a good deal of discussion; but whoever will read the reports at that time will see, that to obviate the objections that were raised against it, and to make this thing palatable to the body who passed it, and satisfy them that the door was to be shut against the abuses which had grown up under the extra allowances for these very things—for fuel, for rent, for quarters, for furniture, for servants, &c.—this very sweeping clause, to which I have called the attention of the Senate, was put in, providing that—

"It is hereby expressly declared"—mark the very pungent manner in which it is expressed—"It is hereby expressly declared, that the yearly allowance provided in this act, is all the pay, compensation, and allowance that shall be received under any circumstances whatever, except for traveling expenses according to orders, for which ten cents per mile shall be allowed."

The Senator undertakes to compare this to the furniture of a ship. Why, there is no comparison at all. Not the least in the world. We all know what a ship is; and we all know what a house is. A ship is a place where a man is ordered for duty, and it is connected with his duty. It is as much a part of the instruments with which he executes his duty, as is the fire-arm which is put into the hands of the soldier or the sailor. Not so with a house and furniture. It may be said that it is convenient for gentlemen to have these things, and that they cannot live without them; that they cannot discharge the duties assigned by the Government without them. The same argument would apply to the officer's food. He cannot go to a navy-yard, and discharge the duties imposed upon him without eating, without drinking, without being clothed. And the argument of necessity, upon which the Senator from North Carolina would justify this abuse—for I must call it so—I must speak from the dictates of my own understanding—the same process of reasoning which would justify this, from the necessity of the case, because the officer cannot otherwise discharge his duty, would apply to all his personal expenses. It would apply to his food; it would apply to his clothing, and to every single article of expense which it is necessary and convenient for him, in order to enable him to discharge his duty.

Let me not be misunderstood. I have no objection to gentlemen in the Navy receiving this allowance, and receiving it twice over, if it is necessary, or fourfold, if it is necessary; but I do ask that it shall be done by some semblance of law; that it shall not be in its very face a contradiction to the plainest construction which the simplest understanding cannot help putting upon the law. That is what I complain of. I repeat again, that if it is possible for the human intellect to discover variance as wide apart as the two subjects could possibly be, it is the express, pungent, stringent, unequivocal provisions of the law, and in the circular of the Secretary of the Navy, issued, as I contend, by the plainest force of language in contravention and in contradiction of it. Now, I say, while you have such things as these staring you in the face—while you have the construction of an executive officer of the Administration repealing, setting aside, nullifying, and trampling upon a provision of law, it is not, it seems to me, very much worth while to be talking about reforming some abuses which have grown up under the law. Let us learn first to make our laws respected. Let us see that laws are executed where they are plain as language can make them. Then, and not till then, let us begin to talk about reforming abuses.

Mr. BADGER. For the purpose of illustrating the meaning of the proviso which the Senator from New Hampshire has read, he has informed us that it is "expressly provided." Now, I suppose those terms do not help us to understand what is provided; and nobody has ever imagined that what is put down in a statute, and written there as a proviso, is an implied proviso. I think every man must admit that the force of it would have been just the same if the word "expressly" had been left out. It is "expressly provided;" then the question comes up, what is expressly provided? That what is paid to the officers shall be in full for their services, and that no other pay, compensation, or allowance shall be made to them under any circumstances. What is the meaning of that? The pay which is given to them is a sum of money paid into their pockets to be used for their own benefit. It is in full of what? Of all compensation, pay, and allowance. Then, those words must mean something analogous to that thing which is given to them as a substitute for all these matters. I think that is clear. The furnishing of a house for an officer of a navy-yard is not making any addition to his pay; it is not giving him any additional compensation for doing his duty. It is not making any allowance to him at all; not the least in the world. If it is, then the furnishing of the President's House is making an allowance to him; and, if that is making an allowance to the President, then we increase his salary in violation of the Constitution.

But the Senator reiterates over and over again, with a large collection of epithets which do not add exceeding force to what he says, and certainly do not tend to show that what he says is reasonable, that all this is in plain, unquestionable opposition to, and defiance of law. That is the Senator's opinion; is it that of anybody else? Is there a single member of this Senate, but the Senator from New Hampshire, who believes that there is any opposition to law in the order which was made by the Secretary in 1848? I apprehend there is not a single one. The Senator says there is no analogy between the two cases of furnishing a ship and furnishing a house. He says the officer is ordered to the ship to perform a certain duty there, and that the ship is a necessary means of enabling him to perform the duty. That is very true; but do these officers go and quarter themselves at the navy-yards of their own will and pleasure, and for their own accommodation? Is not each and every one of them ordered to the station to which he goes, whether on sea or on shore? An officer who is living in New Hampshire or Massachusetts receives an order from the Navy Department, to proceed to Norfolk and take command of the navy-yard there. He goes there, and the Government has provided a house for him to live in; is it not necessary to have the house? The Government has built it. The honorable Senator does not object to that. The Government builds the ship. But the Senator says the furniture of a house does not bear the same relation to the house that the furniture of a ship bears to the ship. Why not? The only furniture of a ship that the Government wants for its own purposes, are the guns, and means of making the ship an instrument of defense and annoyance. The sofas, the mirrors, the chairs which are put there—

Mr. CASS. A chair is a chair, wherever it is.

Mr. BADGER. Yes, as my friend from Michigan says, a chair is a chair, whether on board a ship or in a house—I say all these are put there to be used by the officer, and the Government gets no benefit from them. The cases, therefore, are analogous; and if the argument of the Senator from New Hampshire be true, in every instance in which a chair, or any other furniture, has been provided for the use and accommodation of an officer on board a ship, or in which anything has been put on board the ship except what was necessary as means of war, that law of 1835 has been violated. But no man will be so absurd as to maintain that; and, therefore, no man will be—I will not say absurd, but so mistaken—as to maintain the other.

I dislike to see these things raked up to the Senate, for the purpose of casting reflections on the reputations of gentlemen who were at that time at the head of the Department, but who are no longer here. Besides, the Secretary necessarily makes his estimates every session of Congress, in which he states what he wants for this purpose, and the sense of Congress has determined the interpretation which they give to the statute, because they have yearly voted to give the supplies for this as for other purposes.

Mr. BERRIEN. I have been struck with the peculiarity of the discussion with which we have been favored from the chairman of the Committee on Finance upon the subject of deficiency bills. I was gratified at the explanation which was given of the origin of such bills. It was perfectly satisfactory, I have no doubt, to the Senate. But I had little expected, in the discussion of a bill, the object of which was to supply deficiencies to meet the present exigencies of the Government, to have found a general arraignment of the Administration. Sir, I am not prepared to enter into a discussion of that sort at this moment; and I note it merely for the purpose of having it understood by the country that this Administration is capable of a defense when the proper moment arrives for making it.

But I rose particularly for the purpose of replying to the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire. So far as regards the perfect analogy of the cases which have been stated by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. BADGER.] I think there is not an individual who hears me who doubts it. But one place of refuge was left to the Senator from New Hampshire. It was that, while the appropriation for the furnishing of vessels, and for the furnishing of the President's House, were made by law, and had received the sanction of Congress, this act was done at the sole will of the Secretary of the Navy, entirely without law, and opposed to law. When that suggestion was made, it at once occurred to me that the Secretary of the Navy could not, of his own funds, pay for these articles of furniture; that he must have been furnished by Congress with the funds which were necessary for such a disbursement; and, consequently, that the articles of furniture must be found mentioned in the estimates of the Secretary of the Navy, made to Congress, and had, therefore, received their approbation. I asked, therefore, for any one estimate of the Secretary of the Navy, in order to test that fact; and I now offer it to the Senate. It is the general estimate from the Bureau of Yards and Docks for the year ending June 30, 1850, in addition to the balances remaining unexpended on the first of July, 1849, "for contingent expenses which accrued during the year, for freight and transportation of materials, for stores, for yards and docks," &c. I need not read them all; but it goes on and says, "for postage of letters on the public service, for furniture for Government houses." There is the precise appropriation, acting upon which the Secretary of the Navy has endeavored to limit this expenditure. Congress has, therefore, authorized the expenditure of this appropriation anterior to the time.

Mr. HUNTER. One remark of the Senator from Georgia renders it necessary that I should say a few words. He complains that I have made a general arraignment of the Administration. I have not meddled with the economy of the Administration, except so far as it is connected with this bill. I was obliged to show—it was my duty to show, so far as I could—what was the deficiency; and, for that purpose, it was necessary to ascertain what it was for. I was obliged, also, to allude, in reference to this matter—because it has been largely canvassed—to the question whether the expenditures were economical. I was obliged to show how far we were responsible, and how far the Administration was responsible. I submit that, in all this, I have not departed from the line of my duty in relation to the deficiency bill. I have not touched the conduct of the Administration in regard to any matter, which was not intimately and immediately connected with this very bill.

Mr. BERRIEN. It was not my purpose to call in question the correctness of the conduct of the honorable Senator. It was my purpose, not to charge him with any departure from his duty, but to express my surprise that the argument by which the Senate would be induced to vote for the deficiency bill should be one which would show the wrong conduct of the Administration under which the deficiency occurred.

Mr. ADAMS. I wish to inquire if there is any existing law authorizing the furnishing of houses for officers?

Mr. BADGER. I cannot answer that. All I know is, that it has been the uniform custom of the Government.

Mr. DAWSON. Money has been frequently appropriated for it.

Mr. BADGER. Yes; every year appropriations have been made for furnishing the houses. I now make the motion to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. BADGER. I desire now to submit the motion that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next. My friend from Missouri, [Mr. ARCTURUS], this morning, charged me with neglect of my duty to do it; but I now make the motion.

Mr. CASS. The honorable Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on the Territories, [Mr. DOUGLAS], has been called away by an indispensable engagement which he could not break. I promised him to renew to the Senate his wish that they should meet to-morrow to take up territorial business. I believe, myself, it should be done, and therefore shall vote for it, and in obedience to my promise have mentioned it to the Senate.

Mr. ATCHISON. I shall vote for the motion to adjourn over. I know of nothing that is so pressing in relation to the Territories. There is one bill, in relation to them, that has yet to be reported, which I consider highly important. But that has not been reported, and cannot be acted on to-morrow. Therefore, I feel no interest in it, except a general interest to adjourn until Monday. [Laughter.]

Mr. CASS. The honorable Senator from Illinois stated—and I believe such to be the fact—that if we do not meet to-morrow, the time assigned by the House for the consideration of territorial subjects will have passed away, and the opportunity to take them up will be lost. He mentioned three or four things, not of any special interest to me, but of very great interest to the Territories that require the action of Congress. I hope this will be a sufficient reason for meeting to-morrow.

Mr. ATCHISON. I have not heard from the chairman of the Committee on the Territories, or from any member of it, a proposition to take up any measure connected with the Territories heretofore; but now the matter, all at once, is of very pressing interest, because Monday has been set apart by the House for the purpose of acting on such business.

Mr. CASS. The honorable Senator from Illinois mentioned it half a dozen times.

Mr. ATCHISON. I do not recollect it.

The motion to adjourn over was agreed to.

REPORTS AND PETITIONS.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. If in order, I desire to make a report.

The PRESIDENT. It can only be done by unanimous consent, as the rule is that private bills shall be considered on Fridays.

Mr. JONES. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of Susan Campbell, to report it back, and ask for the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petition and accompanying documents be transmitted to the Commissioner of Pensions, and that the committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. As it may not be in my power to be here on Monday, I will now, as instructed by the Committee of Claims, report a bill for the relief of Hodges & Lansdale, and the legal representatives of Rinaldo Johnson, deceased.

The bill was read a first time, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Hiram Paulding; which was read a first time and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRATT. An officer in the Navy—Lieutenant Pinckney—who is just ordered to sea, has sent me a memorial which he is very anxious to have presented to the Senate. It represents that in the publication of the account of Commander Wilkes's exploring expedition, great injustice, detrimental to his character as a professional man and officer of the Navy, has been done him. He first applied to the Navy Department on the subject; and a letter affixed to his petition from the Secretary of the Navy, states that inasmuch as this book has been published by order of the Senate, the Navy Department could not assume jurisdiction of the matter. There is also a letter of Commander Wilkes, written in 1839, when a memorial was presented by the same gentleman, in which he promised that in future editions of the work the necessary corrections should be made in order to make it conform to the truth as represented by this officer. He now says that whilst he was at sea two editions of the work have been published without making the promised amendments. I ask that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

It was so referred.

Mr. UNDERWOOD presented the petition of George Morris, a soldier who had been taken prisoner and kept with the Indians three or four years, asking a grant of land as compensation for the detention; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAPERS REFERRED.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Early in the session I made the motion to refer the petition of the heirs of Isaac Shelby to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims; but by some means the proper entry has not been made. I now renew the motion to take the papers from the file and refer them to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

H. B. DORSEY.

Mr. GWIN. The memorial of H. B. Dorsey was referred to the Committee of Claims, and reported upon adversely by that committee. I have ascertained, by inquiry of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that it is a claim that properly belongs to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I wish now to move to refer it to that committee.

The PRESIDENT. When was it presented?

Mr. GWIN. It was presented this session, by myself. It was referred to the Committee of Claims, and reported back adversely, and is now on the table for consideration. It went to the wrong committee. It is a claim which has arisen out of Indian depredations. My motion is to refer it to the Committee on Indian Affairs, that it may have the administrative examination of the bureau, under the law.

No objection was made, and the motion was agreed to.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. BADGER gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to prohibit the public execution of criminals within the District of Columbia.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. MALLORY, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to regulate the surveying and sale of lands belonging to the United States, in certain cases; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the report of Captain Stansbury upon his expedition to the Great Salt Lake, which was ordered to be printed at the last special session of the Senate, be executed, together with the extra numbers ordered during the present session, under the special direction of the Topographical Bureau.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform the Senate how many officers of the Navy, if any, are receiving greater compensation than is provided by the act to regulate the pay of the Navy of the United States, passed March 3, 1835: if any officers are receiving such greater pay, the amount thereof, their names, the time during which they have respectively received such pay, and the laws or authority by which they received it.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. GWIN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened,

And the Senate adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 16, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. LITTLETON F. MORGAN.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

The SPEAKER stated, as the first business in order, the motion to lay upon the table the report and resolutions in reference to the printing of Congress, on which motion the yeas and nays had been ordered on yesterday.

Mr. EDGERTON moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Many VOICES. "Oh! no; finish the printing business."

The question was then taken on Mr. EDGERTON's motion, and on a division, there were—ayes 35; noes not counted.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question recurring upon the motion to lay on the table,

Mr. GORMAN moved that there be a call of the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I presume that the object of that motion is merely to have a call of the roll, in order that members may have time to come in; and I therefore ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the question being put, it was decided in the negative—yeas 39, nays 106.

So a call of the House was not ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay upon the table; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 81, nays 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Willis Allen, William Appleton, Thomas H. Bayly, Bartlett, Bowie, Bowne, Briggs, Brooks, Burrows, E. Carrittong Cabell, Chastain, Clark, Cobb, Cullom, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Disney, Dockery, Dunham, Faulkner, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Gentry, Gorman, Hamilton, Hammond, Haven, Hendricks, Higginson, Andrew Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, George G. King, Landry, Letcher, Lockhart, Mace, Martin, McCorkle, McLanahan, McMillin, Meacham, Miller, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morehead, Nabers, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Polk, Porter, Price, Riddle, Ross, Russell, Sackett, Savare, Seimensmerhorn, Schoolcraft, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Ongen S. Seymour, Skelton, Staudt, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stone, St. Martin, Sutherland, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Ward, Watkins, Wells, Alexander White, Wilcox, and Yates—21.

NAVS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, John Appleton, Ashe, Averett, Barrere, Beacock, Bragg, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Joseph Cable, Lewis D. Campbell, Carter, Caskie, Chandler, Chapman, Chugman, Curtis, Dinmick, Doty, Eastman, Edgerton, Edmundson, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Giddings, Goodenow, Goodrich, Green, Grey, Grow, Hall, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Denn, Hibbard, Horsford, Houston, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Jackson, James Johnson, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurz, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, McDonald, McNair, McQueen, Meade, Millson, Miner, Molony, Morrison, Murray, Newton, Olds, Orr, Andrew Parker, Peaslee, Pennington, Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Rantoul, Robbins, Scudder, Smart, Smith, Snow, Benjamin Stanton, Thaddeus Stevens, Sweetser, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Washburn, Addison White, and Woodward—89.

So the House refused to lay the report, and the motions in reference thereto, upon the table.

Mr. ORR demanded the previous question.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio, moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. ORR. Which of those motions takes precedence?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, the motion to go into a Committee of the Whole House takes precedence.

Mr. ORR. I desire to inquire of the Chair what would be the effect, if the motion of the gentleman from Ohio should prevail, and the House should go into a Committee of the Whole House, and this question should not be reached to-day? Would not this subject go to the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. ORR. Then, when would it come up?

The SPEAKER. It would come up as the unfinished business to-morrow morning.

[Cries of "Let us finish it now."]

Mr. POLK. I would like to know of the chairman of the Committee on Printing, whether it will not facilitate the action of that committee, if the House act upon this subject at once, without deferring it by a reference to a committee?

The SPEAKER. That interrogatory can only be made by unanimous consent.

[Cries of "Object!" and "Let us take the vote."]

The question was then taken on Mr. STANTON's motion, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurring on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. STANLY. I ask what is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. There is a motion pending, to refer the report of the Committee on Printing to the Committee on the Judiciary, with certain instructions.

Mr. STANLY. Is there no other motion pending?

The SPEAKER. Yes; there is a motion pending to refer the report to the Committee on Printing, with the same instructions; and there is a motion also pending to amend the instructions.

Mr. STANLY. I hope the several propositions will be read.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the papers will be read.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, objected.

Mr. STANLY. I must know what I am called to vote upon, and therefore I move that the propositions be read.

The motion was put, and agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to ask a question, before the reading commences, and before the previous question is seconded. I understood the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Orr] to propose to strike out "the Judiciary Committee," and to insert "the Committee on Printing," and that that amendment was accepted by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown.] Is that so?

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. No; I did not accept it.

Mr. ORR. That amendment is now pending.

The Clerk then read the various propositions.

The question being upon seconding the demand for the previous question, it was put, and, on a division, there were—ayes 84, noes 53.

Mr. BRIGGS demanded tellers on the second.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. Brooks and Hall were appointed; and the question being put, the tellers reported—ayes 86, noes 43.

So the previous question received a second.

The question being, "Shall the main question be now put?"

Mr. DOTY demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. FITCH. I am confident there is a misapprehension as to the effect of the main question. It brings us, I believe, first to vote on the proposition to strike out "the Committee on the Judiciary," and insert "the Committee on Printing."

The SPEAKER. The first vote is on the amendment to the instructions.

Mr. FITCH. That is, on the adoption of the bureau bill.

The SPEAKER. On the adoption of the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FLORENCE.]

Mr. FITCH. That is the bureau bill—is it not?

The SPEAKER. It is. When that question is decided, the Chair will put the question on referring this whole subject to the Committee on the Judiciary; and if that fails, then upon the motion to refer it to the Committee on Printing. That is the order in which the Chair proposes to put the questions.

Mr. FITCH. Are the instructions imperative? I understand not.

The SPEAKER. They have been read several times.

Mr. HALL. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. If these instructions are all rejected; will it then be in order to move additional instructions?

The SPEAKER. It will not. Under the operation of the previous question, no new matter can be introduced.

Mr. HALL. Will not the previous question be exhausted, when all these resolutions are rejected?

The SPEAKER. Not until the whole matter is disposed of.

Mr. ORR. With all due deference to the Chair, I have a different opinion with reference to the order of questions. My proposition was a motion to strike out "Judiciary Committee," and insert "the Committee on Printing;" and I submit that the question must first be put upon my motion.

The SPEAKER. Our rules provide that, when motions are made to refer a matter to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or to a Committee of the Whole House, and to other committees, it shall be the duty of the Chair to put the question upon sending it to the Committee of the Whole first, and then on the motions to refer to the other committees, in the order in which they were made. The Chair thinks that the most convenient mode of reaching the object of the gentleman from South Carolina is, to take the vote upon the reference to the two committees in the order in which they were proposed. The result will certainly be the same.

Mr. POLK. Is it in order now to move to lay this whole matter upon the table? We are getting into such confusion, that I desire to submit that motion.

[A message was here received from the Senate by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., their Secretary.]

Mr. POLK. I will withdraw my motion for the present.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a point of order. I desire to inquire if it will be in order to move to postpone this matter to a day certain?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order during the pendency of the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. I beg to call the attention of the Chair to a decision made by him on the 27th of February upon this very point. When the bounty land bill was up before the House, it was decided that, after a demand for the previous question upon the final passage of the bill, a motion to postpone to a day certain was in order. From that decision an appeal was taken, and the Chair was sustained by the House.

A MEMBER. The Chair has since reversed that decision.

The SPEAKER. The decision of the Chair was, that a demand for the previous question, or the ordering of the main question, did not cut off a motion to postpone to a day certain. Since that time, however, the Chair has reversed that decision, for reasons which he then briefly stated. The Chair is now very clear in the opinion that after the demand for the previous question has been made, a motion to postpone to a day certain cannot be made.

Mr. BROOKS. Do I understand the Chair to decide that a motion to postpone to a day certain is not in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not, for the reason that the demand for the previous question is pending.

Mr. BROOKS. But that decision of the Chair was reversed the other day.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from New York will allow the Chair, he will say that the gentleman has not stated the decision to which he alludes correctly. That was not a case equivalent to the present one. There was then a motion pending to postpone to a day certain, pending which the previous question was demanded and seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put. The Chair then decided that the previous question did not cut off the motion to postpone. That was the decision to which the gentleman refers, and the circumstances of the case were totally unlike the present. No such motion was pending in this case when the previous question was demanded—none whatever. The decision of the Chair is, that no new motion can be made to amend, to commit, or to postpone while the previous question is pending.

Mr. BROOKS. After the main question has been ordered to be put, will it not be in order then to make the motion?

The SPEAKER. It will not. No such motion can be made during the operation of the previous question. In the other case, which has been alluded to, the question was, whether the ordering of the main question affected a motion pending before it was ordered. Since that time, however, the Chair has become satisfied that his decision was incorrect according to parliamentary law.

Mr. BROOKS. I have no doubt the decision of the Chair is correct. I wish only to know how to be guided in future.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is willing to have his decision criticised, corrected, or exposed to the House.

Mr. DOTY. I will withdraw my demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I desire to inquire of the Chair, whether, if the main question is not ordered to be put, the question will not come up again to-morrow and every succeeding day, until it is disposed of?

The SPEAKER. It will come up to-morrow. Mr. MARSHALL. Then it cannot alter the question at all, if it is postponed.

The main question was then ordered to be put—ayes 104, noes not counted.

Mr. POLK. I believe now, that by the decision of the Chair, a motion to lay the whole matter on the table is in order. I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. As there has been no action by the House affecting the proposition before the House, since a similar motion was made and voted down, the Chair repeats the decision made some weeks ago, by him, upon that point, that the motion is not, at this time, in order.

Mr. POLK. If I am not mistaken, there has been two distinct votes taken since the other motion, to lay upon the table, was voted down.

The SPEAKER. There has been no amendment voted on, no vote upon sending it to a committee, nor anything which would be likely to change the disposition of the House with reference to it; and upon that ground, the Chair decides that the motion is not in order. That has been his decision heretofore, and he is disposed to adhere to it, unless overruled by the House.

Mr. STANLY. Is it not now in order to move to postpone to a day certain?

The SPEAKER. Not in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. As we have progressed thus far in this business, and as we have been always taking steps backward at every opportunity, I move to reconsider the vote just taken, by which the main question was ordered to be put, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table—if the motion is in order—so that we cannot retrograde in our action.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

The question was put, and the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. Speaker, I propose to address the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to one hour to close the debate.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I rise to a point of order. The Chair will recollect that it has been twice decided, the present session, that, upon a motion to refer, that right did not arise. I also make the further point, that the gentleman from Indiana, yesterday, declared to the House that he had made no report from the Committee on Printing, and if such was the fact he has no right to close debate.

Mr. HOUSTON. But the House decided that he did make a report.

Mr. POLK. I desire to say to the gentleman from North Carolina, that he appealed to me yesterday, and I withdrew the motion to lay upon the table, in order to give him an opportunity to make a speech.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am aware of that. I know that it is a well-settled question, that the chairman of the committee has the right to be heard before the question is finally disposed of; but I doubt whether he can do so upon the motion to refer.

The SPEAKER. The 34th rule provides that "No member shall occupy more than one hour in debate in the House or Committee; but a member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee may open and close debate."

The Chair thinks that, under this rule, he has no discretion, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I appeal from that decision, and upon it I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I move to lay the appeal upon the table. The Speaker has decided this matter as his predecessor did.

The question was put, and the appeal was ordered to lie upon the table.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. GORMAN. I did not intend again to address the House upon this subject, after the brief explanation I gave when I made what has been determined by the House to be a report. A disposition upon the part of the House was manifested to hear what the Committee on Printing had done in relation to this matter. Whispers went round this Hall, that there was something behind the committee did not desire to have made known. My own honor, as I then stated, and the honor of the committee, demanded that I should report the facts of the case to the House, for its information. I was not instructed by the joint committee to make that report, and I did not intend that it should be considered as a regular report from that committee. I do not propose now to go into the general merits. I have a few things, however, that I desire to say, and I shall endeavor to confine myself as much as possible to the points which I desire the House to hear me upon.

What is the state of things in relation to this matter now? The Committee on Printing, under the law which has been read over and over again during this debate, have the power to remedy any neglect that may occur on account of the inability of the public printer to execute his contract. That committee, by a unanimous vote, as has been stated to the House, declared that Mr. Hamilton, the public printer, had failed to execute his contract in almost every particular, and there was no remedy left them but to adopt such measures as their judgment in the premises might dictate. Under the power given them, they did execute that judgment in the best manner they could under the circumstances. But it so happened, as the committee was constituted, that no one could command the votes of a majority of the committee; and, consequently, the printing which the public printer had neglected to execute, was not taken from him. We found that some seventy-six of your reports, which had been placed in the hands of the public printer, had never been touched; we found that of all the work which had been presented to the committee for their examination, not a single copy came up to the requirements of the contract. In view, then, of the total failure of the public printer to execute his contract, the committee deemed it their duty to adopt measures to get some one else in his place to do what he could not or would not do. This, I suppose, will sufficiently explain the reasons for our action.

Now, Mr. Speaker, of the motives which have been attributed to that committee, I have something to say; and, if I deal in words which bear as strongly upon others as the implications of others have upon this committee, I trust gentlemen will bear with me. And, if the language I shall use towards them shall hurt, they know where it comes from. That is understood.

It has been said that this committee acted with a view of accomplishing a party purpose to plunder the public Treasury; not that the committee proposed to plunder the public Treasury themselves, but that Donelson & Armstrong, and the editor of the Republic, proposed a coalition to this end. That is what I understand the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] to say. Now, sir, I do not know what understanding may have taken place between the editor of the Republic and the editors of the Union; but I wish to say to the gentleman from North Carolina, that the Committee on Printing never consulted with Gideon & Co., not one word was ever heard from them. No one was consulted with, except Donelson & Armstrong, from the beginning to the end, so far as my knowledge extends, unless some Whig member of that committee may have consulted with others in private. If they did, it never came to the knowledge of the committee, as a committee, nor to me individually. This subject of public printing, therefore, has always been a bone of contention before the country. Now, I say again, that that committee have been acting upon this matter for two months. They have been trying to adopt some measure to remedy this neglect for more than two months. For myself, I can say to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] that I have, from the beginning, and until the last final vote was taken, voted against the Republic. That last and final vote was given the day before I reported what I did to this House. I have continued rather faithful against them, than faithful for them, for I had been voting for others to have that patronage from first to last.

Whatever Boyd Hamilton could not do under his contract—whatever he would fail to do—that part, and that part alone, did I ever think we had a right to give to anybody else. Now, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] says that we undertake to impose upon this House a public printer without consulting them. Is that the record? We undertake to propose to certain printers in the city of Washington to do—what? To do some work which the public printer has failed or neglected to do. How do you know says my honorable friend from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN] that he has failed? Have we not examined the specimens? Have we not examined the copies which he furnished to us? Have we not examined the character and style of the printing, the impression, the ink, the paper? That is our business, and if we had failed in that, we should have been derelict in our duty, and I should have failed to recognize in myself a principle which I would apply to others, and I should have failed to do that myself which I denounced others for not doing, if I had not looked to the type, the press-work, the ink, the paper, and everything; to see whether or not it complied with the contract. Then, have we undertaken to elect a public printer? I understand that when you propose to elect a public printer, you propose to give into his hands the whole printing of Congress. We have made no such proposition. A decided majority of the Printing Committee, so far as I have understood them, are in favor of giving the contract system a full and fair test; and, from the indications in this House, I should judge that there is a majority in this House in favor of giving that contract system a fair test. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] insists that it will not be giving it a fair test. He tells the House that the action of the committee will destroy the contract system, when that committee comes up and says that this public printer shall have every job that he can do in accordance with his contract. When we show in that report that he has failed to do it—when we show that we do not propose to give to any one else a single job, except what he fails or neglects to do, in the language of the law, we also say that we intend to hold him to a strict accountability upon his bond. We say that the next remedy is, to put that bond in suit, to recover whatever excess we have to pay. We are carrying out the letter of the law, precisely as you have directed us. The law of the land has prescribed those duties. It says that your public printer shall be held responsible for any excess paid for printing, which he has failed or neglected to perform, over his contract price. We propose to hold him responsible for this excess, if we have to pay any.

But the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] in the face of these facts, says to the House that we are undertaking to destroy the contract system, and that if we are not undertaking to destroy the contract system, he says the practical effect of our action will be to destroy it. How can that be the effect of our action, if we hold this man responsible, as the law requires? But gentlemen upon this floor from that side of the House, come to me and say, if we hold this poor man to his contract, under the law, he will be ruined, and other innocent persons will be ruined. We have come up to the stern letter of the law, and have cast aside all questions of clemency and mercy, supposing that mercy to be in your hands, but not in ours. We have met the question boldly in the face, and we have said that the contract shall be carried out in accordance with the instructions which that law lays down. Yet this House has been told that we have attempted to do away with the contract system. We deemed that we had no power to do so.

In the next place the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] says that we have offered a resolution which the former chairman of the Committee on Printing [Mr. BORLAND] reported, but that we adopted another and different course. Certainly we did; and had the gentleman exercised his usual sagacity, he would have seen the reason for it. When the proposition was first made to give the future printing to some one beside the contractor, the question immediately sprung up, whether or not we had the power to do that. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] one of the members of the committee, who has the reputation of being as good a lawyer as any other in the country, suggested that it was doubtful whether that power could be exercised by the committee. What did we do? Persist in doing a thing about which there was a doubt of our power to do? No! We conceived, therefore, that we had no power to make this transfer for the future printing. Whatever the contractor fails or neglects to do of the printing that is ordered now, according to his contract, we may make arrangements to have done. That was our argument there; it is our argument here, and I am satisfied it convinces everybody here. The gentleman himself must know that that motive operated upon us.

If the motive had operated upon us to go contrary to the law, and to carry out a resolution which the gentleman says was contrary to our power, then he would have come up here and have said that we exercised a power not granted by the law, and he would have sustained it, too. But we discovered the error ourselves. We retraced our steps. We adopted the very language of the law, and reported that to the country, "to remedy any neglect of the public printer to comply with his contract." There we stopped. That gentleman and this House is convinced that we controlled our action precisely according to the letter of our power, and went not one inch beyond it. Our powers as a committee are laid down clearly in the law of 1846, which reads as follows:

"And be it further resolved, That a committee, consisting of three members of the Senate and three members of the House of Representatives, shall be chosen by their respective Houses, which shall constitute a Committee on Printing, which shall have power to adopt such measures as shall be deemed necessary to remedy any neglect or delay on the part of the contractor to execute the work ordered by Congress, and to make a pro rata reduction in the compensation allowed, or to refuse the work altogether, should it be deemed inferior to the standard; and in all cases, the contractor and his securities shall be responsible for any increased expenditure consequent upon the non performance of the contract. The committee shall audit and pass upon all accounts for printing, but no bill shall be acted upon for work that is not actually executed and delivered, and which they may require to be properly authenticated."

Now, sir, after carefully perusing this law, and the powers granted, and the duties enjoined, it would take more than the gentleman's declaration, here or elsewhere, to convince me that there is a man upon this floor, of any party, who believes that the committee has transcended its powers in any single point, or in any contingency. I do not believe a word of it, when the pretense is set up that we exceeded our powers. You do believe, in my opinion, that we have done exactly what the letter of the law authorized us to do. He says, that, for political purposes, we undertook to give it to Donelson & Armstrong.

Mr. CLINGMAN, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. GORMAN. If I have misrepresented the gentleman, I will.

Mr. CLINGMAN. My remark as to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] being influenced by political bias, was founded upon a statement which I read from the Congressional Globe. It is from the gentleman's speech upon the census printing. I will read but a few sentences:

"I ask my friend what more there is in this transaction? Donelson & Armstrong are to do it, and it is complained because their names are inserted here. I tell you, if that contract can be given them, so far as my influence and vote go, they shall have it. Why will I select them in preference to other Democrats? I will do so, I tell my friends, because they are the organs of the Democratic party. Is that plain enough? Is that understood?"

These are the grounds upon which I based my remarks.

Mr. GORMAN. I repeat them now, and I never uttered a sentiment more true than that. The gentleman has not driven me from the record. I stand there yet, and the man who tells me that he is not a party man, he is, as I stated before, a kind of animal that I have not often seen in human shape in this country. But I had the candor to come out on that occasion, and state boldly that I would give it to a political friend, where I could do it upon terms equally fair as those offered by a political foe, in preference to that foe. And I apprehend that there is not a man upon the Whig side of the House, who would not have done the same thing, if the consideration upon each side were equal.

But to the point. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] says I was actuated by political motives. The first motive which actuated me was to discharge my duty, and to place the public printing before the country. The next motive was to look about and see whom we could get to perform the work, as the public printer had failed to perform it in obedience to his contract. Was that a legitimate step? What other step could we have taken, than to look about and see who could perform the duty that your public printer had failed to perform? Was not that the next legitimate duty of the committee? It was. Then comes up the question, to whom shall it be given? First, the committee considered and proposed to give it to A, B, C, &c. To whom could we give it? Almost every printer in the city of Washington was proposed. There could be no concurrence of opinion. As a matter of course, in obedience to what I said before, in my speech upon the census printing, I preferred to give the contract to a political friend, instead of to a political foe, where the terms were equal. I acted upon that principle, and I shall continue to act upon that principle.

In the next place, what did we do? We laid down the prices that we agreed to give. Those prices were those contained in the recent bid of John C. Rives. The gentleman says that John C. Rives's bid was higher than that of Towers. I have said that I proposed Towers's bid; but I was satisfied, by a calculation, by deducting the sixty-nine per cent. upon the long numbers, that Rives's bid was the cheapest to the country, and acting under that conviction, I accordingly agreed to that bid.

What next, sir? Why, it is now stated in this morning's Globe, by Mr. Rives, that his bid was higher than Towers's. If it is, Mr. Rives led his friends, and myself particularly, into an error; for he published, over his own signature, and in his own paper, of 13th December, 1851, as follows:

"As I am the lowest bona fide bidder for the greatest portion of the printing of Congress, and have made ample preparation to execute all that may devolve upon me, I have felt it my duty to assert my claim; and I herewith tender as security, Messrs. John W. Maury and George Parker, of this city—as sufficient men as can be found anywhere—who are prepared, as you will see by the inclosed, to enter into bond for the execution of this work, according to the terms of your advertisement and my bid."

"I am ready to verify the statements of this note by testimony before you. But if, as agents for letting the printing of Congress, you should not determine to set aside a sham bid in favor of the bona fide injured bidder, (according to the usage in the Executive Departments of this Government,) but choose, rather, to submit the matter to the body immediately interested, I beg leave respectfully to solicit, through you, an investigation of the case by a committee of Congress."

I can say to you, and to this House, that if my vote controls it, that contract goes to no man that does not agree to do it as cheaply as any responsible bidder under the law. Gideon & Co., or Donelson & Armstrong, have never proposed to have a stipulated price over and above either Rives's or Towers's bid. They did not ask the committee to give them this or that price. They only asked the committee for the printing, if any one but the contractor got the work. Indeed, Gideon & Co. never asked the committee for anything, that I know of. I asked the committee, in behalf of Donelson & Armstrong, for it. But I tell this House that Gideon & Co.'s hands are clean of this. They never talked to me, and I did not know Mr. Gideon until after the final vote was taken. If there has been any coalition on the part of the Printing Committee, they could, and more readily would have coalesced, as a matter of course, with some other printer than that of the Republic.

But, sir, let me look one moment at this question, as presented by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] and the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN;] for I conceive, of all the speeches made upon this subject, that gentleman [Mr. CLINGMAN] has presented the most unfair issues. He has presented them with that degree of force which usually characterizes his ability upon the floor, but he did it in that kind of iron-heeled way which would seem to carry that imperium in imperio manner that I do not think proper to submit to. When any gentleman undertakes to charge coalition, their hands should be clean. It is said, sir, in law, that when you come into a court of justice for equity, you must come in first with clean hands. Now, sir, how did we give this printing to these two men? The National Intelligencer was one of the public presses of the Whig party. The Southern Press was a kind of "quasi" organ of the South, of what is called State-Rights men; and I have one word upon that question of State-Rights to say, at the proper time. I believe the Southern Press is composed of one Whig and one Democratic editor. I believe Mr. De Leon was always a Whig, and I have never heard that he has changed. Now, as to this coalition, if there had been a disposition on the part of the committee to make a coalition they had the opportunity tendered them by the Southern Press. I state to the gentleman from North Carolina, from information, that a distinguished and worthy Southern gentleman, the editor of a newspaper in Columbus, Georgia, came to this place, and propositions and arrangements were upon foot, as I have understood, for the purpose of making him editor of the Southern Press. I have also understood that he was to come out and declare his acquiescence in the compromise, and declare himself in favor of the nominee of the Democratic party. He used the above words in conjunction with Southern men I learn. Could not there have been an alliance here that would have suited part of the opposition of this House? and could not part of the public printing have been given to them? Could we not have made such an arrangement as that? I say we could, as I have been informed.

But, sir, that gallant man, General Armstrong, who has stood the fire that tried men's souls, and who bears upon his person the marks of his country's foes, rejected it. Not because the association would have been disagreeable personally, but because he wanted to avoid any combinations that might be charged as coalitions. I, sir, was opposed to any alliance with any press, North or South, East or West, but the Democratic organ. You would have had an alliance here, if you had taken the editor of the Columbus Times, as I learn. If you could have had him at the head of the Southern Press, you would, in my opinion, have been satisfied, and we would not have been compelled to answer the charge brought against us here, of bargaining and coalescing. The extremes might then have been satisfied. Possibly the Abolition organ's friends—the National Era—might have yet been refractory without a slice. That is the first start of all this coalition, and the first thing I ever heard of it was, that it was rejected by one of the proprietors of the Union. On the other hand, I did not hear of Mr. Fisher, or Mr. De Leon making a suggestion in reference to this matter; but I afterwards learned that such suggestions were being made quietly in the rotunda, at the National Hotel, and in the street. The proposition crept to the ears of gentlemen upon that committee, that Fisher would like to have a slice. And now, sir, owing to that failure, possibly, I see the two gentlemen from North Carolina, and some other gentlemen on this floor, whom I could name, of extreme opinions upon the doctrine of State-Rights, attacking Donelson & Armstrong, right and left, and for no other reason, as I am induced to believe, than that they had opposed the action of the Nashville disunion convention, and would not submit to the doctrine of the right of secession without cause, and at the will and pleasure of a State.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] would not have me call him a Disunionist, for I suppose that he would deny it in its offensive sense. But the gentlemen who have been known as Secessionists or State-Rights Secessionists, it seems are determined to proscribe the friends of the compromise if they can. I know that most of the so-called State-Rights men are sound and thorough Democrats. But, sir, we ought not and cannot submit to be ruled or ruined by a small section of the party any more; we have felt this before, and have been defeated by it, and yet have tolerated their recreancy; but I bid adieu to the hopes of success if it has to be purchased at the expense of our long-established principles. Defeat is much better than success, if we are to be dragged into a toleration of factions and fanatics, North or South. The gentleman from North Carolina led off the last Congress with denunciations, strong, loud, and burning against this glorious Union. Sir, the first voice that was heard here last Congress sending denunciations against this Union, and the action of this Government under the Constitution of the country, came from that gentleman from North Carolina. That war he has kept up with a perseverance worthy of a better and more patriotic cause; up to this hour he stands here ready to destroy the harmony of both the great parties of the country, his object being seen only in the distance. Sir, parties are essentially necessary in a liberal Government like ours—they hold in check the usurpation of power; they check the extravagance of Government; they act as censors over each other's error; and are calculated to stimulate all to a higher national patriotism. He may say he loves this Union, but he has a very exalted opinion of a Southern Confederacy. His acts, his record, his conversation, are all to that point, and have been ever since I have known him. I would like to know now where is the combination? I see a cordiality between these extremes that is big with meaning whenever any question comes up involving, directly or indirectly, or even by implication the compromise measures of the last Congress—my friend from New York, [Mr. KING,] with GIDDINGS & Co., and the Southern extremes, cheek-by-jowl, in fraternal coöperation, to proscribe and put aside Donelson & Armstrong, who are known to be as true men and as true Democrats as any in the land. Sir, if these elements are to triumph, and every Democrat is to come under their ban, defeat is preferable by far. It is folly to hearken to professions of acquiescence in these measures, if it is to give them power to proscribe whom they please. In this coalition the venerable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] has been faithful, and promises fair to keep the faith. Keep the faith, my venerable friend! [Laughter.] Be faithful to your instincts.

Sir, where is the next coalition? The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] who prides himself upon his ultra Southern views, after he had made his speech the other day, and had charged coalition upon this subject, who came up and almost enveloped him in their eager arms? Why, the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. PATTERSON KING,] the leader of the Free-Soil party, and the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. RANTOUL,] and the honorable gentleman over the way, [Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania.] All were cordial to him indeed, and after he concluded his remarks, their cordiality seemed most delightful, and the association highly agreeable. What coalition is this, sir? A coalition of gentlemen, not to break down the Republic—for when I come to Democratic gentlemen of these ultras North and South, and ask if they will sustain Donelson & Armstrong, proprietors of the only Democratic press of the Metropolis, if we give out a portion of this printing to them which the printer fails to execute, and which we have under the law the power to give, they answer invariably No, no, no. Of course Whig gentlemen, upon that side, will not vote for them alone. Now, they say, they will not agree to give patronage to friend or foe, unless they let them alone in their extreme doctrines; especially do they propose to vote against Donelson & Armstrong, who are known to be sound, consistent, faithful, talented Democrats. Where did you learn that Democracy that would not permit a committee of your House to give a fair contract, at reasonable prices, to a political friend on equal terms with others? But if it is too high or too extravagant a price, you have a right to object to it as guardians of the public Treasury of your country. But, sir, do you deny that the Abolitionists upon this floor, and such gentlemen occupying such extreme grounds as the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] and my friend Mr. VENABLE, and such gentlemen on the other extreme of this House, intend to break down Donelson & Armstrong?

Mr. VENABLE. I would simply ask my friend—

Mr. GORMAN. I meant you as well as the others; but do not take much of my time.

Mr. VENABLE. I rarely take anybody's time. I will merely say, sir, that if the Free-Soilers and Southern-Rights men would combine and keep people from plundering the Treasury, that they are a more honest party than those who combine to let men in the Treasury, either at the gable-end or at the door.

Mr. POLK. Does the gentleman intend to make the slightest imputation that that was done by the other party?

Mr. VENABLE. I made no allusion to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. POLK. I ask the question—having voted that way—and I demand to know.

Mr. VENABLE. As to the demand made to me, I have just this reply to make to it: My friend from Indiana tells me that he alluded to me as one willing to break down the Government.

Mr. GORMAN. The Union office, I said; and pretty nearly the Union, too.

Mr. VENABLE. I am responsible to my constituents, and to no one else, upon that subject.

Mr. GORMAN. I am speaking to them, too, and I wish them to hear what I say.

Mr. VENABLE. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee, that I do not impute any improper motives to him. I seek no collision, personally, with any individual. But I say to my friend from Indiana, if he has undertaken to make a coalition between Free-Soilers and those whom he is pleased to call extreme Southern-Rights gentlemen from the South, whose purpose is that the public money should not be wasted for the public printing, I shall be proud to coöperate with anybody who will save the hard earnings of my constituents from any such operation. A grave old man in my country had an account to settle with one of his neighbors, who, meeting him one day, said: "Caleb, you are a cursed rascal, and I can whip you." "No," replied the old man, "I am no rascal; and supposing that I am a rascal, and you can whip me, that does not settle the account. Let us settle the account before we settle the other two questions. Whether I am a cursed rascal, or not, you will have to settle the account at last." And all I ask of you, is to settle the account. Who does the printing cheapest? If the Free-Soilers and State-Rights men are unwilling to put it out to the highest bidder, and, instead of that, will give it to the lowest bidder, and are willing to save the hard earnings of the working people, I will follow in that company.

Mr. GORMAN. The gentleman is highly patriotic on this especial occasion. But I was upon the point of saying, what I now will carry out, that it is the determination of the gentlemen composed of what is called the Disunion and Secession, or State-Rights party—I care not by what name they go—to break down the organ of the Democratic party, so called, edited by Donelson & Armstrong, because they oppose the doctrines of the Nashville Convention; and if they fail, I say I will fall with them. I tell gentlemen, I go for the doctrine of State-Rights as far as any party who understand themselves, that are not inclined to be disunionists per se. How far do I go? I hold "That a State, or any other great portion of the people, suffering under long and intolerable oppression, and having tried all constitutional remedies without the hope of redress, may have a natural right, when their happiness can be no otherwise secured, and when they can do so without greater injury to others, to absolve themselves from their obligations to the Government, and appeal to the last resort. The existence of this right, however, must depend upon the causes which may justify its exercise."

And, "I admit the right of a State to secede for just cause, to be determined by herself."

"Being a party to the compact which the Constitution forms, she has the right which all other parties to the compact possess, to determine for herself when, where, and how the provisions of that compact have been violated. The right of a State to secede in case of oppression or a gross and palpable violation of her constitutional rights as derived from the reserved sovereignty of the States, I am prepared to recognize."

"In such case 'each State,' in the language of the Kentucky and Virginia resolutions of 1798 and 1799, 'is to be the judge, not only of the infractions, but the mode and measure of redress.' In the next place, would the citizens of the seceding State be liable to the penalties of treason? I answer, no. 'In my opinion no man commits treason who acts in obedience to the laws and authorities of a regularly organized Government, such as we recognize our State governments to be.'"

In reply to my friend, [Mr. ASHE,] whether the General Government can use force to compel such a State to submission, involves too many other material questions which my time will not allow me now to answer as I would desire. I will, however, say that the other States would certainly have a right to levy war upon her as she would upon any other foreign Power.

Therefore, in this view of the case, the exercise of this right by any one or two States of this Confederacy must necessarily involve them and the other States in a war. On the other hand, I utterly deny the right of secession by a State without just cause, or merely at her own will and pleasure; for example, I utterly deny the right of a State to set up as an excuse that she can form a better and more advantageous alliance with a foreign Government, and for this cause secede, or merely by saying she is tired of the association. But she must exhaust all her legal and constitutional remedies for redress before this right begins. If it were otherwise, our constitutional Government would be a mere rope of sand, liable to fall to pieces at any moment.

Mr. VENABLE. That is good State-Rights doctrine enough for me.

Mr. HULLYER. That is my doctrine.

Mr. FREEMAN. That is my doctrine.

Mr. GORMAN. Here, Mr. Speaker, is State-Rights men and Union men all around me, saying that this is good enough State-Rights principles for them. Then, pray, what do they differ about? This is the doctrine of the Washington Union; this is the doctrine of General Jackson; this is the doctrine of Governor Cobb, of Georgia; for the above quotations are from General Jackson and Governor Cobb, copied word for word. Where is the man who goes further? Does any member upon this floor? I suppose there are a few extreme men of the South who do, but I apprehend they are not very numerous.

Now, sir, although these facts are, or ought to be, known to these Southern men, yet they seem determined to proscribe the Democratic press at this national capital—the Union—because the editors of that paper have not seen proper to go as far as some men upon the subject of secession. I deny the right of a State to secede at will. She is to be the judge herself of her wrongs, in accordance with the natural right which every people possess. And I say, that the very doctrine I have laid down here, is laid down in the Washington Union, verbatim et literatim, and my Southern friends come up here and denounce it. They refuse to read, it would seem, what the editors have said upon that subject. My honorable friend from Virginia [Mr. MEADE] was present when I expressed my sentiments in this manner once before, in the presence of the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, [Governor Cobb,] and in that doctrine he concided fully. Another gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BOCKEL,] entertaining extreme views, says that he acquiesces in this position. It is sustained by the "Washington Union." It is the doctrine of Jackson, Jefferson, and Madison. Yet, sir, they have undertaken to break down Donelson & Armstrong, and they have done it under the supposition or pretense that this paper is not advocating the sound State-Rights doctrine. I say that that paper has advocated State-Rights in its true sense, and to the full satisfaction of nearly all, when properly understood, excepting those who affirm the right of secession as an absolute, unconditional right at will. That, I apprehend, many of you have never done. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOGGS] says that they have not done it. Sir, if secession is to be tolerated as a right, to be exercised at will, and without first resorting to all constitutional remedies, you have got no bond of Union whatever, nor have you any security for the permanency of this Union for a day.

Mr. FREEMAN. The Nashville Convention adopted a resolution that a State had the right to secede at its own pleasure; and the Southern-Rights party adopted it as their platform.

Mr. GORMAN. If they had added "for cause" after exhausting all constitutional remedies for redress, it would have been well enough. Can Southern-Rights gentlemen expect to force me or the great body of the Northern Democracy into a support of doctrines so intolerable as the right of secession at will, without just cause? They ought not to try it. I am confident that my political friends do not desire it. I will not act with any party—I will not be recognized as being connected with any party—which recognizes the right of secession at will, without cause. That is the disunion doctrine and policy. Gentlemen entertaining those opinions are the ones to whom I allude, when I assert that it seems to me that he is a disunionist per se who promulgates such intolerable heresy. Now, what is proposed to be done? The compromise has been passed and acquiesced in by the most extreme men in the South. The "Washington Union" has acquiesced in it, and the Democratic party have acquiesced in it from Maine to California—from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Do you expect to obtain harmony in your ranks if you attack Donelson & Armstrong for the reason that they do not agree with some of you upon the right of secession? I say that they do, however, in its true sense, as understood by Jefferson, Madison, and Jackson; and that the whole Democratic party of the North will stand substantially by the declaration that I have made, which is in the language of General Jackson. Donelson & Armstrong have been the steadfast, firm, uncompromising advocates of the finality of the compromise. From whence do members upon this floor see this attack emanate? From Free-Soilers and Abolitionists, who have with a vengeance been howling upon the track of the editors of the "Union" ever since this proposition has been introduced into the House. Every man advocating extreme doctrines upon the right of secession has howled on their track ever since this matter was hinted at; and if they do not make war to the knife, if driven to the wall—if they, Donelson & Armstrong, do not die like gallant Democratic men, I will denounce them as unworthy the name of sound national Democrats. If they are put down, the country will understand that it has been for that reason. You know it. You have put the handwriting upon the wall too plain. It cannot be misunderstood. Your ire was kindled up with renewed vengeance at the "Republic's" being associated with them in this printing, which has also advocated the finality of the compromise. The onslaught was first commenced by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. VENABLE], by saying that Major Donelson was the administrator of General Jackson's opinions. God grant that I may be following the lead of such old fogies as General Jackson; and if Major Donelson only administers the old hero's opinions faithfully, he will hold a high seat in the affections of the good old time-honored Democracy.

Mr. VENABLE. I said that he was the administrator of General Jackson's opinions in his own wrong.

Mr. GORMAN. I thank God that I have followed such a lead. I will continue to do so. You might as well undertake to tell me that you can dam up the Mississippi with your hand, as to tell me that you can convince the country that you do not intend to break down Donelson & Armstrong, because they advocate and have advocated these compromise measures. They did not agree to the extreme doctrines of some of the Southern-Rights men running for office in the States of Mississippi and Georgia. That has given offense to some. Sir, put them down, and you strike a blow at the success of the Democratic party. So help me God! I will wield whatever of influence I may have in their support. I will die hard. I wish them to know, that struggling for this glorious Union and for our glorious Democratic party, that they will be surrounded by those who will stand forward as martyrs to the last hour. I hold no political association with men who are disunionists per se. I hold no political association with men who undertake to proscribe this press because its editor will not say that the fugitive slave law ought not to be executed, and is all wrong. The opposition and assaults come from that quarter, also. That is true in every word and syllable. I have some little right to speak to my Southern friends; for no man went further than I did in the last Congress upon the doctrine of State-Rights, and of opposition to the Wilmot proviso and all exclusions of the Southern people. I have the right, therefore, to say, that if the friends who have acted with me in this matter are to be proscribed, we will die hard. I say, when we go down, we will pull into a common grave some others in our firm embrace. I am not to be told by the gentleman from Mississippi that my action here may lead to worse consequences than the emptying of the Treasury, or the dismembering of the Democratic party. I am not to be told by the gentleman that it may lead to the dissolution of these United States, without a reply, such as I have made. What did he mean when he spoke of the one hundred thousand men who followed or patronized the principles of the Southern Press—the one hundred thousand men for whose action he would not be responsible when the Democratic party organizes at Baltimore. As I understand him, he means distinctly that he will not be responsible for their action, and that the consequences of our action may lead them off from the Democratic party, by proscribing the Southern Press. Who proposes, or ever proposed to proscribe that press? If any one ever did, I never heard of it. If they do go off from the Democratic party, it will be upon a question of public printing, involving indirectly the compromise, and nothing else. It will be because they could not kick Donelson & Armstrong out of position for their compromise opinions. The country will understand of what materials these opponents were composed, and the country will apply the corrective. Mark that! Do they want to go off? We can only suffer defeat if they do. And let it come rather than that compromise men shall go down for such reasons, when eighteen twentieths of the sound Democracy are with them; when we know they have stood firm for the last three years trying to settle this vexed question of slavery. The time, I sincerely pray, has gone by forever when a mere handful of partisans shall again successfully attempt to force the great body of the Democratic Republican party to tolerate their factious or fanatical views.

Mr. McLANAHAN. I think that it becomes necessary that I should interrupt the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN], at this stage of his remarks; and, as the first question before this House is the reference of the bill under consideration, I beg leave to state that, in my humble judgment, to take this business out of the hands of the joint committee, which has been constituted by Congress for the purpose of attending to this special subject, would be highly discourteous. The business of the Judiciary Committee is defined in the 87th rule: "It shall be the duty of the Committee on the Judiciary to take into consideration such petitions and matters or things touching judicial proceedings, as shall be presented, or may come in question and be referred to them by the House."

Mr. SWEETSER. Will the gentleman allow me to propound a question?

Mr. GORMAN. I cannot. This colloquy may take up my time.

Mr. McLANAHAN. Here we have the duties of the Judiciary Committee defined by the 87th rule. There is no judicial question here. It is a question of fact; a question of fact properly submitted to the joint committee, constituted in virtue of the law of 1846. That committee had the plenary power either to curtail the amount of compensation, that the law authorizes them to give to the public printer, or they had still further and fuller power to annul and abrogate the contract. If, in the exercise of the power thus delegated to the committee, they do an act of injustice to the contractor, the contractor's remedy is an application to the equity of Congress. If the contractor does injustice, and fails to fulfill his contract, the remedy of the United States is an action at law against the contractor and his sureties. The action of the committee, within the power thus delegated to them by the law of 1846, is an action full, complete, and effectual for the purposes for which that law was intended. If Congress wish to stop that committee in their action, it must, by a joint resolution, annul and repeal the law. If this House think that this committee, in the exercise of the powers thus delegated to them, are doing injustice either to the contractor, or are failing to do justice to the interests of the United States, it is competent for the House to declare, by resolution, that the committee shall be discharged, and the matter referred to another committee. It has been suggested, with a good deal of skill, I admit, that the respective Houses should choose the committee; but I submit to this House that, although the Speaker constituted the committee, and the House acted through the Speaker, yet it is too late for the House now to repudiate the act of the Speaker. That committee thus constituted, in the fulfillment of their duty, have entered into a contract, and the printing done under that contract is now lying around upon our tables. It is impossible for the House to go behind the action of the committee. If that action, as I have said before, does injustice to the contractor, his remedy is an appeal to the equity of Congress, and it can be done in no other way. In my opinion, it seems, then, that the committee have not transcended the powers delegated to them by law.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order. I wish to know, if it is in order for the gentleman who has the exclusive privilege of the floor for an hour, to give way to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee to make a speech upon an independent question, without any person having a chance to answer it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided some days ago, that the gentleman upon the floor had a right to yield for explanation to others. It has been done by members of the House, from time to time, and the Chair cannot fix his limit.

Mr. McLANAHAN. The gentleman need not press it. I neither belong to the Abolitionists or Secessionists, and I did not suppose he would raise such a point.

Mr. MARSHALL. I thought it was out of place.

Mr. GORMAN. When I was interrupted, I was speaking upon the subject of our political relations to this question. If I have not taken the proper view of it, it has not been done for the want of any personal respect to the gentlemen with whom I differ, and with whom I am associated—an association which has always been agreeable to me. But facts, and actions, and votes, speak louder than mere words sometimes, and the record upon this occasion has shown to the country, and I hope that the vote which has been taken, and the vote which is to be taken, will show the country, the true secret of this attack on the Democratic organ, although I know there are associated with the opposition many gentlemen who differ with me upon various points connected with this question, other than those before stated. But those gentlemen, in a body, who have held extreme opinions, North and South, have been acting together for the same common object.

Mr. VENABLE. I rise to a point of order. In speaking some time ago about printing the census, I was called to order for saying not one tenth part of what was said by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN], and I was ruled out of order, and made to sit down.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is not properly in order.

Mr. VENABLE. I thought it was not right to make fish of one and flesh of the other. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to-day, as he did yesterday, that when a gentleman upon the floor is called to order, the Chair is bound to enforce the rule.

Mr. CLINGMAN. When a gentleman is replying to remarks, I do not think he is out of order.

Mr. VENABLE. With regard to the question of order, I wish simply to be understood, that I have no disposition to stop my friend from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN]. I have permitted him to go on for more than half an hour. I wish to suggest it, as I had been borne down under the rule. I thought it might operate gently upon others, as well as myself.

Mr. GORMAN. I shall not go on out of order, and I will not disobey the suggestion of the Speaker. In conclusion, I will say to the House, that I shall be perfectly satisfied to see them take any course they may think proper in their wisdom and judgment in referring this matter back to the committee, with any instructions they may desire. The committee, however, have their powers defined by law, and any instructions given by this House without first repealing the law, cannot control their action in the case of the present contractor, or the present printing. The House committee will faithfully and respectfully reflect the wishes of this body; and it is their duty to do so, provided it is consistent with their views of public interest. If it should be inconsistent with our views of the interest of the country, they can report that fact to the House for future action. I have no kind of objection, as I said before, to referring it back to the Committee on Printing; and it would be perhaps out of place and indelicate for me to say what my feelings would be, provided you were to take it out of the hands of the Committee on Printing after such a long-protracted and tedious debate, and place it in the hands of the Committee on the Judiciary. I frankly confess that I should not feel it compatible with my own honor and my own self-respect longer to remain in my position in that committee; but anything which this House may ask me to do as one member of that committee, I shall cheerfully do to the best of my judgment and ability. I have this to say in the little time left to me. There is an element in this printing question—a patronage which has always been a bone of contention in this Government, and always will be in every Government constituted as ours is, and it will always be entering more or less into and becoming a part of the motive in the action of parties. There is an element in this question of patronage, connected as it has been with the politics of your country, that is dangerous to the organization and harmony of the Democratic party. It will be regarded by the country, in spite of whatever you may say or do to-day, as a proscription, marked out and aimed at one who has stood upon the watchtower as a faithful guardian of the Democratic party, and of the measures known as the compromise measures of the last Congress. I say to the country, that if this question is decided in such a manner as to proscribe this press, you cannot keep the country from believing that you did it from those considerations when they analyze the vote throughout upon this subject. If you refer this matter back to the Committee on Printing, the committee will pursue the even tenor of their way, and they will proceed to make a contract with some person to do the remainder of the printing at such prices as we may regard reasonable and just. I can assure the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. CLINGMAN,] that the next proposition we shall make will be Towers's bid; and we will take that as a standard, and proceed accordingly. If this matter is referred back to the committee we must act, or we must not do our duty, which you have ordered us to do.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am for referring it back if the committee will make up their minds to this, and take it fairly. I will vote to refer it back.

Mr. GORMAN. "If we will take it fairly!" Every kind of insinuation seems to be pointed at the committee, as if they will not do right. I shall not pledge myself at any time, or in any place, to do right. I will do right independent of any such pledge, so far as my judgment goes. I shall act fairly, independent of pledges, so far as I am capable. I leave the matter to the judgment and wisdom of the House.

Mr. POLK. If it is now in order, I move to lay this whole matter upon the table, and call for the yeas and nays. I suppose the House is well satisfied that—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. FITCH. I believe that the Speaker has decided that question to be out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it is now in order to move to lay upon the table. Debate has taken place, which, in the opinion of the Chair, might influence the judgment of the House, and it is in order to make the motion.

Mr. HOWARD. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. STANLY. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The SPEAKER. There having been no action at all upon the part of the House, and no discussion an hour ago, the Chair decided that it was not in order to repeat the motion to lay upon the table. The Chair now decides that, as discussion has been had, it is in order.

Mr. WOODWARD. I would inquire of the Chair what would appear upon the Journal immediately before this motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair believes the motion made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] would appear, and the decision of the Chair that it was not in order.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I desire to ask the Chair if the rule is not that two motions to adjourn cannot be made until business has intervened? And whether, after a motion to adjourn has been voted down, and a speech made, it is not in order again to move to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. There can be no question about that; and the Chair has confidence in the correctness of his decision.

Mr. STANLY. It has been so decided in this House fifty times.

The SPEAKER. The House, however, may differ with the Chair.

The question was then put on Mr. STANLY's motion to lay the appeal upon the table, and it was decided in the affirmative.

So the appeal was laid upon the table.

The question recurring on the motion to lay the report upon the table,

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then put, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 82, nays 88, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. J. Appleton, W. Appleton, T. H. Bayly, Bowie, Bowne, Briggs, Brooks, Burrows, Chandler, Chastain, Clark, Cobb, Cullom, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Disney, Dockery, Dunham, Faulkner, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Gorman, Hamilton, Hammond, Haven, Hebard, Hendricks, Hillyer, Ingersoll, Andrew Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, George G. King, Landry, Letcher, Lockhart, Mace, Martin, McCorkle, McLanahan, McMullin, Meacham, Miller, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Murray, Nabers, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Penn, Polk, Porter, Price, Riddle, Ross, Russell, Sackett, Savage, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Stanly, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stone, St. Martin, Sutherland, Sweetser, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, George W. Thompson, Ward, Watkins, Wells, Alexander White, Wilcox, and Yates—82.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, Ashe, Averett, Barrere, Bococek, Bragg, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Joseph Cable, Lewis D. Campbell, Carter, Caskie, Chapman, Clingman, Conger, Curtis, Dimmick, Doty, Eastman, Edgerton, Edmundson, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Gamble, Giddings, Goodnow, Goodrich, Grey, Grow, Hall, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Henn, Hibbard, Horsford, Houston, Howard, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Ives, Jackson, Jenkins, James Johnson, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Preston King, Kulms, Kurtz, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, McDonald, McNair, McQueen, Meade, Millson, Molony, Morehead, Morrison, Newton, Olds, Orr, Andrew Parker, Peaslee, Pennington, Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Rantoul, Robbins, Scudder, Smart, Snow, Benjamin Stanton, Thaddeus Stevens, Thurston, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Washburn, and Woodward—88.

So the House refused to lay the report upon the table.

The question recurred on the amendment moved by Mr. FLORENCE to the instructions proposed by Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. Would it be competent, at this stage of the proceedings, for me, as the mover of the resolution, to strike out the Judiciary Committee and insert the Committee on Printing?

[Loud cries of "No, no!"]

Mr. POLK. Would that be in order?

The SPEAKER. Has the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi been drawn to the rule controlling the case?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir, it has not.

The SPEAKER. The 45th rule is in these words:

"After a motion is stated by the Speaker, or read by the Clerk, it shall be deemed to be in the possession of the House, but may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment."

The Chair thinks the gentleman may modify his motion.

Mr. BROWN. Well, sir, I am willing that the Judiciary Committee should be stricken out—

Mr. STANLY. What was the decision of the Chair? I did not understand it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi proposes to modify his original proposition; and as there has been no decision on it, or amendment, the Chair is of opinion that the gentleman has a right to do so.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. What is the previous question?

The SPEAKER. Is that a decision upon the subject-matter?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would suggest to the Chair that the gentleman from Mississippi does not propose to withdraw his resolution, but he proposes to make it a different resolution from that upon which the main question has been ordered. He can withdraw his resolution before a decision or before it has been amended; but that is a very different thing from changing the character of the proposition and bringing us to vote on a question different from the one on which we have ordered the main question.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. To get rid of this difficulty, I withdraw my application to amend or modify my proposition, simply remarking that I do not care whether the Judiciary Committee is stricken out or not.

Mr. JONES. If I understand this question as it now presents itself to the House, we come first to vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] to the resolution of instruction proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN.]

The SPEAKER. That is the first question.

Mr. JONES. If that is voted down, we come then to vote upon the resolution referring this report to the Committee on the Judiciary, with certain instructions. If that is voted down also, I understand that we then come to a vote upon the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ORR] to recommit the report without instructions, for the gentleman offered no instructions. Those are the three propositions before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the last proposition differently.

Mr. JONES. Well, sir, the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina must either be in that shape or else it does not come in at all. There was an amendment to the resolution pending at the time he made his motion, and it would therefore have been in the nature of another amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina distinctly proposed to strike out the Judiciary Committee and insert the Committee on Printing.

Mr. JONES. Then I submit that he could not make that motion to amend the original resolution while the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] was pending. It could only come in in the nature of an independent motion to recommit. The gentleman from South Carolina could have offered an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but he could not, while that amendment to the original resolution was pending move to amend the original resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the House his understanding of the propositions before the body. In his opinion, the vote will first be upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the instructions originally offered by the gentleman from Mississippi. Then will follow the vote on referring, with those instructions, to the Committee on the Judiciary. If that fails, the Chair proposes, as the most convenient order of disposing of the various propositions before the body, to put the question on referring to the Committee on Public Printing with instructions.

Mr. JONES. Those instructions would have been voted down if we rejected the proposition to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the House to instruct him on this point, for it is but a matter of convenience. If the decision of the Chair in this respect is overruled, the Chair supposes it will be in order for the gentleman from South Carolina to amend by striking out one committee and inserting another. The Chair is convinced, however, from his experience here, that the mode he proposes is the most convenient mode of disposing of this matter.

Many MEMBERS. "No doubt about it," and "Put it in that order."

Mr. HAMILTON called for the yeas and nays on Mr. FLORENCE's amendment to the instructions; and they were ordered.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask for the reading of the first part of those instructions. I want to know whether they are positive instructions, or merely instructions inquiring into the expediency, and so forth.

Mr. FLORENCE. Merely to inquire into the expediency.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Let the original instructions be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes there will be no objection to the reading of the first clause of the instructions.

There being no objection,

The Clerk read the resolution, which is as follows:

Resolved, That the report on the Committee on Printing be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report upon the whole subject, and to recommend for the adoption of Congress, such a system for the execution of the public printing as they may deem most expedient; and that they especially take into consideration the plan for a printing bureau, for the execution of the work under the supervision of a Government officer."

The question was then taken on Mr. FLORENCE's amendment to the instructions, (which has been heretofore published, and which proposes to append to the instructions submitted by Mr. BROWN, a bill for the establishment of a printing bureau,) and it was decided in the negative—yeas 61, nays 105, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, Ashe, Averett, Barrere, Bragg, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Joseph Cable, Lewis D. Campbell, Currier, Chapman, Clingman, Conger, Disney, Doty, Eastman, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Gaylord, Giddings, Goodenow, Goodrich, Grey, Grow, Sampson W. Harris, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Ives, Jenkins, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kulsns, Mace, Mann, McLanahan, McQueen, Millson, Newton, Orr, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Pennington, Perkins, Phelps, Rantoul, Robbins, Scudder, Snow, Thaddeus Stevens, Thurston, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Addison White, and Woodward—61.

NAYS—Messrs. John Appleton, William Appleton, T. H. Bayly, Boocock, Bowie, Bowne, Briggs, Brooks, Caskie, Chandler, Chastain, Clark, Cobb, Cullom, Curtis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dimmick, Dockery, Dunham, Edgerton, Edmundson, Faulkner, Ficklin, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gorman, Hamilton, Hammond, Haven, Hendricks, Hillyer, Ingersoll, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, Jas. Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kurtz, Landry, Letcher, Lockhart, Humphrey Marshall, Mace, Martin, Mason, McDonald, McMullin, McNair, Meacham, Miller, Miner, Molony, Henry D. Moore, Morehead, Murray, Nabers, Olds, Outlaw, Peaslee, Penn, Polk, Porter, Powell, Price, Riddle, Ross, Russell, Sackett, Savage, Schoolcraft, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard B. Stanton, Stone, Sutherland, Sweetser, Taylor, Benjn Thompson, George W. Thompson, Ward, Watkins, Alexander White, Wilcox, and Williams—105.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BRIGGS moved that the House do now adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. CABELL moved that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. DEAN called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would ask the gentleman from Florida if it would not be better to sit to-morrow, and then adjourn till Tuesday? Monday is always a dead day, when no business is done.

Mr. CABELL. No. I will adhere to my motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. JONES demanded tellers on Mr. CABELL's motion; which were ordered, and Messrs. JONES, of Tennessee, and FOWLER were appointed.

The question was then put, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 77, noes 56.

So the motion was agreed to.

The question was then taken on the motion to adjourn, and disagreed to—ayes 23, noes not counted.

The question then recurred upon referring the report to the Committee on the Judiciary, with the instructions moved by Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi.

Mr. FITCH. I have a point of order which I wish the Chair to decide.

Mr. POLK. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. FITCH. I am upon a point of order. A vote has been taken upon an amendment containing instructions to establish a printing bureau; now, I want to know whether, after this has been rejected, it is in order to vote upon another proposition embodying the same provision?

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Chair cannot tell but the House, after rejecting the amendment, will adopt the original resolution. At least it is not for the Chair to determine what should be the vote of the House.

Mr. FITCH. Will the Chair decide whether it is in order to ask for a division of the instructions? They contain two propositions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine them.

Mr. JONES. If gentlemen will look at the resolution, they will find that if the resolution is divided, and the first portion rejected, there will be no intelligible proposition left.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Indiana indicate the precise point at which he asks a division?

Mr. FITCH. The resolution proposes, in the first place, to instruct the committee to report such a system for the execution of the public printing as they shall deem expedient; and in the second place, it instructs them, especially, to take into consideration the plan for a printing bureau. I desire that the resolution shall be divided after the word "expedient."

The SPEAKER. The first part of the resolution would then read—

Resolved, That the report of the Committee on Printing be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report upon the whole subject, and to recommend for the adoption of Congress such a system for the execution of the public printing, as they may deem most expedient."

That would stand as an intelligible proposition. The other proposition would then read—

"And that they especially take into consideration the plan for a printing bureau, for the execution of the work under the supervision of a Government officer."

This could not stand by itself as an independent proposition. The Chair decides that the resolution is not divisible.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desire to suggest a question of order. An amendment was offered by myself, directing the committee to take into consideration, especially, a bill which accompanied it. Now, I learn that gentlemen around me understand that amendment as directing the committee absolutely to report that bill. I only desire to say that such was not the case. It did not so instruct them.

[Cries of "Too late for that." "Your amendment has been rejected."]

Mr. MEADE. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether, if the amendment be rejected, it will then be in order to move a reference of the report to the Committee on Printing?

The SPEAKER. It will not be in order during the operation of the previous question.

Mr. KING, of New York. I understand that is precisely the motion now pending.

The SPEAKER. The resolution before the House is to refer the report to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions. If that motion be voted down, the question will then recur upon the motion to refer to the Committee on Printing, with instructions.

Mr. MEADE. But if that motion be voted down, I wish to know if it would be in order to move to refer to the same committee, with different instructions?

The SPEAKER. After the previous question has been exhausted it will then be in order for the House to take such action as to them shall seem proper.

Mr. MEADE. When will it be exhausted?

The SPEAKER. As soon as a vote has been taken upon the motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary, and upon that to refer to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to reconsider the vote by which the last amendment was rejected, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I now move to lay the whole subject upon the table.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. VENABLE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put, and the House refused to adjourn—ayes 18, noes not counted.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the question being put, the result was—yeas 78, nays 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Appleton, William Appleton, Thomas H. Bayly, Bowie, Bowne, Briggs, Brooks, E. Carrington Cabell, Chandler, Chastain, Clark, Cobb, Cullom, Cullom, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Disney, Dockery, Dunham, Faulkner, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gorman, Hamilton, Hammond, Haven, Hendricks, Hillyer, Ingersoll, Andrew Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, George G. King, Landry, Letcher, Lockhart, Mace, Martin, McLanahan, McMullin, Meacham, Miller, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Murray, Nabers, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Polk, Porter, Price, Riddle, Ross, Russell, Sackett, Savage, Schoolcraft, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Skelton, Stanly, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard B. Stanton, Stone, St. Martin, Sutherland, Sweetser, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, George W. Thompson, Ward, Watkins, Alexander White, Wilcox, Williams, and Yates—89.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, Averett, Barrere, Boocock, Bragg, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Joseph Cable, Lewis D. Campbell, Carter, Caskie, Chapman, Clingman, Conger, Curtis, Dimmick, Doty, Eastman, Edgerton, Edmundson, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Floyd, Fowler, Gamble, Gaylord, Giddings, Goodenow, Green, Grey, Grow, Hall, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Henu, Hibbard, Horsford, Houston, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Ives, Jackson, Jenkins, James Johnson, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Preston King, Kurtz, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Mace, McDonald, McNair, McQueen, Meade, Miller, Miner, Molony, Morehead, Morrison, Olds, Orr, Andrew Parker, Peaslee, Pennington, Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Rantoul, Robbins, Scudder, Smart, Snow, Benjamin Stanton, Thaddeus Stevens, Thurston, Tuck, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Washburn, Addison White, and Woodward—89.

So the motion to lay upon the table was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of Mr. BROWN's resolution, to refer the whole subject to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions.

The yeas and nays were demanded and ordered, and the question being taken, the result was—yeas 41, nays 118; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, Barrere, Albert G. Brown, Joseph Cable, Lewis D. Campbell, Carter, Chapman, Clingman, Conger, Doty, Eastman, Fowler, Gentry, Giddings, Grey, Grow, Harper, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Ives, Jenkins, Daniel T. Jones, Preston King, Kulsns, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, McQueen, Newton, Perkins, Powell, Rantoul, Robbins, Scudder, Thaddeus Stevens, Tuck, Venable, Wallace, and Washburn—41.

NAYS—Messrs. John Appleton, William Appleton, Averett, Thomas H. Bayly, Boocock, Bowie, Bragg, Brenton, Briggs, Brooks, E. Carrington Cabell, Chandler, Chastain, Clark, Cobb, Curtis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dimmick, Disney, Dockery, Dunham, Edgerton, Edmundson, Faulkner, Ficklin, Fitch, Florence, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gamble, Gaylord, Green, Hall, Hamilton, Hammond, Isham G. Harris, Hebard, Hendricks, Henu, Hibbard, Hillyer, Houston, Howard, Ingersoll, Jackson, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, John Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, George G. King, Kurtz, Landry, Letcher, Lockhart, Martin, Mason, McDonald, McLanahan, McMullin, McNair, Meacham, Meade, Miller, Millson, Miner, Molony, Henry D. Moore, John Moore, Morehead, Morrison, Murphy, Murray, Nabers, Orr, Outlaw, Andrew Parker, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Pennington, Phelps, Polk, Porter, Price, Riddle, Ross, Russell, Sackett, Savage, Schoolcraft, Scurry, David L. Seymour, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Smart, Snow, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard B. Stanton, Stone, St. Martin, Sutherland, Sweetser, Taylor, Benjamin Thompson, George W. Thompson, Thurston, Walbridge, Ward, Watkins, Alexander White, Wilcox, Williams, Woodward, and Yates—118.

So the resolution was not adopted.

The question then recurred upon the motion to recommit to the Committee on Printing, with instructions the same as those proposed to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. GORMAN. I suppose we shall have unanimous consent to refer the subject back to the Committee on Printing.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

Mr. DEAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken by which the House refused to commit to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. I now rise to a question of order. I desire to inquire whether it is competent for the House, by its own resolution, to instruct a joint committee of the two Houses? That committee cannot be instructed without a joint resolution adopted by both Houses of Congress, and approved by the President.

Mr. LETCHER. Is it in order to move to lay the whole subject on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. LETCHER. I make that motion.

Mr. VENABLE. We have voted down that motion three times already, and we will do it again.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a privileged question. I want more time to consider upon this subject. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put, and the House refused to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were then ordered on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. LETCHER. I will withdraw the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. JONES. I now desire again to submit the question to the Chair whether it is competent for this House to instruct a joint committee, except with the concurrence of the Senate? I also submit further, if the whole duties of this committee are not specified by the joint resolution of 1846, by which this committee was constituted. I submit that it is not a committee appointed under the rules of the House, nor of the Senate, but by a joint resolution passed by both Houses, and approved by the President; and that their duties are defined by law.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Tennessee, upon the ground that it is not the province of the Chair to decide what the effect of the proceedings of action of this House will be. That is a question for the House to decide.

Mr. JONES. Well, I will call for a division of the question, so that the vote shall first be taken upon the question of reference, and then upon the instructions. I believe it is competent for us to do that.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee is not in order, because the question is indivisible. If you take a vote upon the first half of it, and reject it, you cannot vote upon the second part as an independent proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that, according to the uniform practice of the House, so far as it has come under his observation, the division asked for by the gentleman from Tennessee cannot be made. The question must be taken upon the motion as a whole. The gentleman can, however, have a separate vote upon the motion to print, which is pending, if he desires it.

Mr. JONES. Is there such a motion pending?

The SPEAKER. There is; unless a separate vote is demanded upon the motion to print, the question will be, "Shall the report be recommitted to the Committee on Printing, with instructions?"

Mr. HALL demanded the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

Mr. BROWN asked for tellers; which were ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If this question to recommit to the Committee on Printing be voted down, will not the previous question be then exhausted, and will it not be in order to move to recommit without instructions?

The SPEAKER. The previous question will be exhausted when this question is taken, and the vote upon printing.

Mr. STANLY. The question is now upon referring this matter to the Committee on Printing, with instructions to report. Is that the question?

The SPEAKER. The proposition is to refer to the Committee on Printing, with the instructions proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN.]

Mr. STANLY. Does that include the printing bureau?

[Cries of "Read the resolution!" "Read the resolution!"]

The SPEAKER. The resolution is very short, and, unless it is objected to, it will be read.

No objection being made, the resolution was accordingly read, as previously inserted.

Mr. STANLY. That is the only proposition that is to go to the Printing Committee?

The SPEAKER. It is proposed to send the report back to the committee, with the instructions just read.

Mr. POLK. Is it in order to move to divide the resolution, with a view to laying the instructions upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. POLK. One is clearly a question of reference, and the other of instruction. The instructions may include something that is objectionable.

The SPEAKER. When the House shall have refused to recommit, (if it shall so do,) I should like to know what becomes of the instructions? Are there any legs or feet left for it to stand upon?

Mr. FLORENCE. I rise to a point of order. If the motion to refer to the Committee on Printing is passed, does it take the bill which I offered with it?

[Cries of "No!" "No!" "No!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's bill has been lost.

Mr. FLORENCE. I was perfectly aware of that; but I supposed that when the resolution referring the subject to the Committee on the Judiciary was not concurred in by the House, and the question came up upon referring it to the Committee on Printing, with the same instructions, that it would take that proposition along with it. I rose for information, and I am sorry to learn that it does not.

The SPEAKER. It does not. It was voted down by the House.

Mr. PARKER. I rise for the purpose of making an inquiry. It is certainly a matter of wisdom for us, when we take a step, to see where we are to land. The object is now to refer to the Committee on Printing, with instructions. Suppose the committee refuse to obey?

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!" all over the Hall.]

The SPEAKER. Upon the motion to commit with instruction, tellers were ordered.

Mr. ORR. I called for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was never apprised that there was such a call till this present moment. The Chair has no doubt of the fact that the gentleman has a right to tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Mr. ORR. But that question has not been put.

The SPEAKER. There was not a sufficient number up to demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. ORR. I suggest that there were a sufficient number up.

The SPEAKER. The Chair distinctly said there was not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays were not ordered. If the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR,] or any other gentleman, asked for tellers upon the yeas and nays, the Chair certainly did not hear it. The Chair's recollection is, that several amendments intervened, and the vote was about to be taken, when some one called for tellers, upon the proposition to refer to the committee, and tellers were ordered upon the recommitment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move that the House do now adjourn; which motion was not agreed to.

Messrs. STANTON, of Tennessee, and VENABLE were then appointed tellers, on the motion to refer the resolution, with instructions, to the Committee on Printing.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 82, noes 74.

So the resolution, with the instructions, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution, with instructions, was recommitted to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. VENABLE. And I move to lay that motion upon the table.

Mr. BAYLY. And I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CARTTER demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, and HIBBARD were appointed.

The question was then taken, and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 67.

So the House adjourned, to meet again on Monday next.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Sergeant Leonard Skinner, reported it back without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the memorial of Julius A. Pratt, praying to be employed to clear out the river San Antonio, in Texas, asked to be discharged from the further consideration thereof; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to which was referred the several memorials relating to the amendment of the charter of Washington, reported a bill to amend the charter of the city of Washington; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. UPHAM, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the petition of Samuel F. Butterworth, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the memorial of the Legislature of Tennessee, praying the establishment of a marine hospital at Memphis, have directed me to report adversely thereon. I desire to say in this connection, that the memorialists do not really ask for the establishment of a marine hospital, but for a State or county poor-house, and such most assuredly is not within the view of the law. There is a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the matter. I move that it be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWSON, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to which was referred the petition of William R. Nevins, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the memorial of Jonathan Lewis, reported a joint resolution for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. BRADBURY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the petition of C. E. Gredendux, reported a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. GWIN gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to grant the right of way through the public lands of the United States for the construction of the following railroads, to wit: From Benicia, by the way of Sacramento City, Marysville, and Shasta City, to Shasta Balle City; from San Francisco to San José; from Sacramento City to Nevada City; from Sacramento City, via Coloma, to Placerville; from Stockton to Mokelumne Hill; from Stockton to Sonora; from Stockton to Agua Fria; from Monterey, via San Juan, to Agua Fria; from San Pedro to Los Angeles; from San Diego, via San Luis Rey, Los Angeles, San Juan, to San José; and from Los Angeles to Agua Fria.

Also, a bill supplemental to the act of Congress approved March 3, 1851, to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California.

Mr. DOWNS gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill, providing for the issuing of patents for a certain class of confirmed private land claims in Louisiana.

Also, a bill for the relief of Leonard Dyson, as assignee of Edward McLaughlin, or his legal representatives.

Mr. BRODHEAD gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Mary E. Davis, widow of E. W. Davis.

Mr. GEYER gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river, and the navigable waters leading into the same.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GWIN, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill, to provide for a monthly mail from San Francisco, via the Sandwich Islands, to Shanghai, in China; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIONS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BADGER, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to prohibit public executions in the District of Columbia; which was read the first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. BADGER. I ask the Senate, by unanimous consent, to permit that bill to be now read the second time; and if, after it is read, there be no objection, I hope the Senate will agree to put the bill immediately upon its passage. There are circumstances that render the bill not only proper, but, if proper in itself, proper to be passed immediately.

There being no objection, the bill was read a second time, and the Senate proceeded to consider it, as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that persons now under sentence of death, and who shall hereafter be adjudged to suffer death within the District of Columbia, shall be executed within the walls of some prison in the District, or within a yard or inclosure adjoining said prison, and not elsewhere; that the marshal of the District, or one of his deputies, (with such officers of the prison, constables, and other peace officers as the marshal or his deputy shall deem proper,) shall attend at said execution. It also provides, that the marshal, or his deputy, shall invite the district attorney, two or more physicians, and twelve respectable citizens, to be present at every such execution, and, at the request of the person to be executed, shall also allow any ministers of the Gospel, (not more than three in number,) his or her counsel, or any of his or her near relatives, to be present thereat; but no person or persons other than those mentioned in the act, and no person whatever under the age of twenty-one years, shall be allowed to witness any such execution.

Mr. HALE. I want to make a single suggestion to the honorable Senator from North Carolina. I see that the bill, as it now stands, makes it imperative on the marshal to request the presence of the district attorney; and he is to request the attendance of the prisoner's counsel, if the prisoner shall desire it. I wish to transpose the words "his or her counsel," so as to make them come in immediately after the words "shall invite the district attorney;" so that it shall be incumbent on the marshal to invite the district attorney, and also the prisoner's counsel, without the request of the prisoner. I hope there will be no objection to this change. I propose an amendment to transpose the words I have indicated.

Mr. BADGER. I have no objection to it. I put the bill in its present form because I hardly supposed it would be proper to invite the prisoner's counsel unless the prisoner desired it. But I have no objection to the proposed change.

The amendment was agreed to; the bill was reported to the Senate as amended; the amendment was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was subsequently read a third time and passed.

MARINE HOSPITALS.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby directed to cause such an investigation as he shall deem necessary, to ascertain if any of the marine hospitals erected by the United States Government, are used for any purpose other than for the relief of sick and disabled seamen, and other persons by law entitled to relief; and if it shall be found that said hospitals are used for any purpose except such as specified by law, that the Secretary be directed to adopt such rules as shall prevent said abuse.

UMPQUA AND ROQUE RIVERS.

Mr. GWIN submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War communicate to the Senate a copy of report and survey in reference to the Umpqua and Roque rivers of Oregon, made by Lieutenant Williamson, captain topographical engineers.

ORPHANS' COURT OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. SHIELDS submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing the compensation of the judge of the orphans' court for the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, upon an equality with that of the judges of the district court for said District.

PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. SHIELDS submitted the following resolution; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the second section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of revolutionary and other pensions of the United States, for the year ending 30th June, 1848," approved 20th February, 1847, as to extend the compensation allowed by said section to pension agents for services rendered since the passage of said act, to all pension agents who had rendered similar services previous to the passage of said act.

COAL USED IN THE NAVY.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. COOPER, the 2d instant, in relation to the qualities of the several species of coal used by the Navy; and it was agreed to.

PAYMENTS TO NAVAL OFFICERS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. HALE, the 16th instant, in relation to unauthorized payments to naval officers; and it was agreed to.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

The engrossed bill to provide for the ascertainment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens, for spoiliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801, was read a third time.

On the question, "Shall this bill pass?"—the yeas and nays were demanded by Mr. BRODHEAD, and ordered; and it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 26, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Badger, Berrien, Borland, Bradbury, Clarke, Cooper, Davis, Dawson, Downs, Fish, Geyer, Hale, Hamlin, James, Mangum, Miller, Pearce, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Smith, Spruance, Sumner, Underwood, Upham, and Wade—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Atchison, Brodhead, Cass, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Felch, Gwin, Hunter, King, Norris, and Walker—13.

Mr. RUSK rose when the roll was about to be called, and said: I simply wish to say that I should vote against that bill, but the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. SOULE] having gone home, I agreed to accommodate him by pairing off with him. He would have voted for the bill, if he had been here. I mention this fact as my reason for not voting on this bill.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. A similar request was made of me by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. PRATT,] who is now absent, as we are on different sides of the question in relation to this bill, he having determined to vote for it, and I against it.

Mr. BROOKE. The Senator from California, [Mr. WELLER,] who is absent, requested me to pair off with him on this bill, and I have agreed to do so.

Mr. BORLAND, on his name being called, said, I vote "aye," under protest.

Mr. MANGUM, when his name was called, said, I vote "aye," under instructions.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, it was not my purpose to make any remarks in reference to this bill, except to explain some of the amendments which have been offered by the committee on Finance. But the discussion which took place on Friday last has made it a duty on my part to present some facts to the Senate, which I shall do as briefly as possible. Although I dissent from the chairman of the Finance Committee in some of the positions assumed by him in opening this discussion, I should, nevertheless, have remained silent, but for a remark which fell from the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BERRIEN.] That Senator stated that he was struck with the peculiarity of this discussion, with which we have been favored, from the chairman of the Finance Committee, on the subject of deficiency bills. And he went on to state that he was not now prepared for the discussion; but he added:

"I note it merely for the purpose of having it understood by the country, that this Administration is capable of a defense, when the proper motion arrives for making it."

Now, here is a notice given to us, that the Senator intends to defend this Administration at the proper time; and, in order that he may have additional materials to those that were furnished by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] I will give him some other items which will demand explanation from the champions of the Administration. I shall commence by calling the attention of the Senator to this provision of the Constitution of the United States:

"No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office."

I will then ask him to refer to a letter from the Secretary of State, which he will find in the documents accompanying the President's message, on California and New Mexico, addressed to the Hon. Thomas Butler King, who was, at the time, a member of Congress elect from the district, I believe, in which the Senator resides. The Secretary of State says:

"The President, reposing full confidence in your integrity, ability, and prudence, has appointed you an agent for the purpose of conveying important instructions and dispatches to our naval and military commanders in California."

At the close of this letter he says:

"Your compensation shall be at the rate of eight dollars per diem, from the time of your departure on the business of your mission, until your return home; and you will be allowed your traveling and other expenses during your absence."

Mr. DAWSON. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. GWIN. It is dated April 3d, 1849. Mr. King was at that time a member of Congress from Georgia. He had been elected, I believe, the previous October. His term had commenced; and here he receives one of the most important appointments, as I shall presently show, ever conferred upon any individual, from the beginning of the Government to the present time, still retaining his seat in Congress, and receiving compensation at the rate of eight dollars a day, and his traveling expenses, in addition to what he might receive as a member of Congress. Now, what was Mr. King's mission? He had placed under his control the whole power of this Government on the Pacific coast, or that portion of it included within the Territory of California. He had placed at his disposal the army, navy, and Treasury of the United States. I have the documents to prove what I state. I read from a letter from General Smith, who was in chief command in California, addressed to the Secretary of War. He says:

"Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication, by the hands of the Hon. T. Butler King."

"With the view of affording him every possible opportunity of acquiring information relative to California, its present situation, its capabilities and prospects, I have prepared the means of making a journey over the most part of the Territory that is inhabited—going from the upper part of the Sacramento along the foot of the Sierra Nevada to the upper waters of the San Joaquin, and returning by a route nearer the coast, after visiting the country north of this bay, near the sea. Several officers of the staff will accompany us; and an experienced geologist, Dr. Tyson, of Maryland, has promised to go along. Commodore Jones will also be of the party, if he finds he can be spared from the court. We shall leave as soon as the steamer is dispatched."

Now, this expedition is one of the items that has within a few years swelled the expenditures in the quartermaster's department to such an extraordinary amount. It was fitted out by the quartermaster at great expense, and Mr. King was escorted by the general and commodore in command of the army and navy on the Pacific coast into the interior of California, accompanied by an armed escort. The authority by which Mr. King controlled these movements, emanated from the President of the United States. There was no discretion left to the military commanders in California. I will show now what Mr. King did as to the navy. He delivered his instructions to Commodore Jones, in command on that station, who writes a letter to the Secretary of the Navy as follows:

"Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 7th of April, handed to me on the 5th instant by Lieutenant Ringgold of the Navy, in company with the Hon. T. Butler King. A more acceptable visitor than Mr. King could hardly have been sent to California; nor could his arrival here have been more opportune, being himself the bearer of the first authentic intelligence of the failure of all efforts in Congress to extend the laws of the United States over this Territory. Mr. King will doubtless report by the first steamer the state and condition of affairs here as he found them. It is very gratifying to that portion of the army and navy serving on this station, to find that the measures they have adopted for the security of persons and property, and for the collection of duties on foreign imports, are approved by Mr. King, as we hope they will be by the President."

To show what unlimited power was conferred on Mr. King, I will read a letter addressed by him to Commodore Jones, dated

SAN FRANCISCO, August 13, 1849.

Sir: In carrying into effect the views and policy indicated in the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, which I had the honor to deliver to you on my arrival in this place, it has become necessary that I request you to dispatch the steamer Edith, as soon as practicable, to St. Diego, touching at the intermediate ports, and to return to Monterey by the 1st proximo. Please to have her supplied with stores, &c., to accommodate some twenty persons in her cabin. As she is now, I am informed, undergoing repairs, I must beg that you will not hesitate to employ such force as will insure her being ready for sea, if possible, by Saturday next.

I have the honor to be, with very great respect and esteem, your most obedient servant,

T. BUTLER KING.

Commodore T. A. C. JONES, &c., &c., &c.

Commodore Jones, on the first of September, notifies the Secretary of the Navy of this order:

"Sir: The steam-propellers Edith and Massachusetts have been transferred from the War to the Navy Department—the former to the squadron and the latter to the joint commission. The Edith was in a very unserviceable condition—that is, her propelling machinery, which has been repaired at a very considerable cost, ($3,500;) and she is now in charge of Lieutenant McCormick, with two engineers hired for the occasion, and has gone to leeward upon a requisition of the Hon. T. B. King, to bring the members elect from San Diego, Los Angeles, and Santa Barbara, to Monterey, where the convention for forming a State constitution will this day meet."

On the 12th of September, he writes another dispatch to the Secretary as follows:

FLAG SHIP OHIO, SAN FRANCISCO, }
September 12, 1849. }

SIR: The inclosed copy of a letter from Lieutenant James McCormick will inform you of the shipwreck and total loss of the United States steam propeller "Edith." My letter (No. 65) of the 1st of September last informed you of the object for which the Edith was dispatched to leeward, which will be better understood by the accompanying copy of a letter from the Hon. T. Butler King, to me addressed. I am pleased to say that, notwithstanding the loss of the "Edith," the object of her visit below has not been defeated, as all the members elected to the convention from the southern districts, with a single exception, were in attendance at Monterey when the convention organized for business on Monday, the 3d instant, and, by last accounts, were proceeding harmoniously in their great work.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your obedient servant,
THOS. AP C. JONES,

Commander-in-chief U. S. Naval forces, Pacific ocean.
Hon. WM. B. PRESTON, Secretary of the Navy.

It will thus be seen how this vessel was lost, that cost, I believe, $120,000, and thus lost in the exercise of authority conferred on Mr. King, giving him the control of the army and navy of the United States, who originated an expedition that turned out to be wholly useless, as the delegates, with a single exception, had proceeded to the convention independent of it. The vessel could have rendered important service at that particular juncture, in carrying supplies from one part of the country to another. Its total loss makes another large item in the expenditures of the Government, which have been so enormously increased of late.

I will progress a little further. I wish it distinctly understood that I speak on this subject without the slightest intention of reflecting on anybody—certainly not upon Mr. King. What he did he conceived to be in the discharge of his duty to the country. But I intend to hold this Administration responsible for the expenditure of public money that has taken place in California, and which is now creating a prejudice against necessary appropriations for that State; and I intend to show that the expenses heretofore incurred in that State, with the concurrence and sanction of the Administration, have been, in some instances, wholly unnecessary, and a waste of the public money. I will proceed with Mr. King; and I wish to call the particular attention of the honorable Senator from Georgia, who is prepared to defend this Administration, to another fact. Mr. King returned to the United States, and made a report on California.

Mr. BERRIEN. With the permission of the Senator from California, without disclaiming a disposition to defend the Administration when I think proper to do so, I beg to say that the Senator has totally misconceived the declaration which I made the other day. I said that this Administration was capable of a defense, when the proper occasion should arrive. I have not said (as the Senator now says) that I was prepared to make that defense. But I desire to say that there was nothing in the remark which I made the other day that authorized the Senator from California to appeal to me in the manner in which he has done.

Mr. GWIN. I am very sorry that I misunderstood the Senator. I certainly understood him to make a general statement to the Senate, that he was very much surprised at the course of remark pursued by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BERRIEN. So I was.

Mr. GWIN. I understood him to say further, that he was not then prepared to go into a defense of the Administration, but that it was capable of defense; and I drew the inference that it was his intention hereafter to make that defense. If the Senator's attention had been turned to what I said in the opening of my remarks, he would have discovered that I stated I would give items to be defended additional to those which the Senator from Virginia had presented to the Senate, for I thought the Administration needed a defense on these subjects. I was merely calling the attention of the Senator from Georgia to these facts, because he had, as I conceived, on the part of the Administration, thrown down the gauntlet, and I was prepared to take it up.

I will proceed very briefly to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to one fact. Mr.

King, after his return to the United States, and during the recess of the Senate, was appointed to the important office of collector of customs for the district of San Francisco—the second appointment conferred upon him during the time for which he had been elected a member of the Thirty-first Congress. He proceeded to San Francisco, and, instead of remaining there to discharge the duties of his office, he repaired with dispatch to the seat of Government, and became a candidate for the Senate of the United States. He spent weeks at the seat of Government, keeping "open house," electioneering for the office of Senator, while the duties of the office of collector were left to be performed by persons inexperienced at least, if not incompetent. The incumbent of this high office of the Government, enters the political arena with all the power it conferred—power that he used on that occasion, if I am not misinformed, to promote his election to the Senate; for one of the most important considerations with some who sustained him was, that they expected to get his place in the event of his election to the United States Senate. He carried on that contest during one hundred and forty-two ballots for Senator with a spirit and energy rarely if ever before known in this country. The Legislature adjourned without making an election. Mr. King, holding this high Executive office, went before the people of California as a candidate for the Senate. It was charged—and I have not seen it contradicted by authority—that a large number of individuals were employed in the custom-house who traveled through the State of California, and endeavored in every way they could to carry the election in favor of the present Administration, and especially to secure a Whig majority in the Legislature in favor of the election of Mr. King to the Senate.

We have seen, in the newspapers, a good deal of credit given to the Treasury Department, because it had recently greatly retrenched the expenses of the custom-house at San Francisco. I wish to bring to the notice of the Senate, and I wish the inquiry answered at the proper time, whether or not these expenses had not been increased to an extraordinary extent, to accomplish political objects; and when there was no necessity for these additional forces for these objects, the election being over and the Whigs defeated, then the retrenchment took place; and, to divert public attention from the fact, credit is given to the Administration for this evidence of reform. Under the unlimited power that we have given to the Treasury Department, to exclude California from the operation of the general law, which makes it necessary to report the expenditures appropriated in collecting the customs; for, owing to the great distance of that country from the seat of Government, I have reason to believe that the expenses of collecting the revenue there has increased to treble what they were under the de facto Government; when the price of everything in that country was higher.

There is another fact which, if in order, I wish to bring to the notice of the Senate and the country. That the nomination of Mr. King, which it was known to the Administration would be contested on constitutional grounds, was withheld from the Senate, so that we could not act upon it, until after the 4th of March last, when the time for which he had been elected a member of the Thirty-first Congress expired—thus giving this coordinate branch of this Government in making appointments to office no opportunity of passing upon the constitutionality of the appointment.

The Senator from Virginia referred the other day to the extraordinary expense that was incurred in sending Mr. Collier, the first collector, to California. He stated that from official papers in his possession he knew that there was nearly $35,000 expended for that purpose, furnished by the quartermaster's department. What became of the property? Was it, or any portion of it, ever returned? Certainly not. Here was an expenditure of near $35,000 of public money in sending a collector to California, when he could have gone there by Panama in five or six months less time for $500, and should have paid his own expenses. He had as long a tail in his escort as a comet. A number of them, when they got to California at the expense of the Government, went their way—some to the gold diggings, not connecting themselves with the Government at all. I do not wish to do an injury to any person, but it is my duty to state these facts, when, as I believe, the malpractice of the officers of the Government in California is likely to do great injury to that State in the appropriations which she now asks, and so much needs. It is a painful duty to arraign any individual, but I must state that this collector notoriously violated the law, in seizing the cargoes of French vessels; that he confiscated those goods, and, in further violation of law, peddled them through the country; sold them here and there, and never made any return of the proceeds of the sales of these goods, or none that was intelligible. When his acts were disavowed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and he was ordered to return these goods, they had been thus disposed of, and we were compelled, in order to do justice to the citizens of France, to pass a law to pay them from the Treasury of the United States. Claims thus arising from the illegal acts of this collector to the amount of a million of dollars, as I was told by the French consul at San Francisco, have been presented to this Government, and have and now are being paid at greatly reduced estimates by the Secretary of the Treasury. Was not this a great abuse of power, which has resulted in a great loss to the Government? In addition to this, it was charged against this officer by members of his own party that he had, in violation of the sub-treasury law, used the public funds that came into his hands for speculative purposes, which should subject him to criminal prosecution. Notwithstanding these violations of law, the knowledge of which was in possession of the Administration, when the districts were changed; the same individual, with these heavy and grave charges hanging over him, was again renominated to the Senate for the very important office which he had before held. But such was the effect produced on the Senate by the rehearsal of these facts that he was almost unanimously rejected. The official records of the country prove that this gentleman, on whom I wish to inflict no injury, stands charged on the books of the Treasury as being in default to the Government for hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. DAWSON. Will the Senator from California give the name of the officer to whom he alludes?

Mr. GWIN. I have already stated that these charges are against Mr. Collier, the first collector of San Francisco. I do not wish to inflict any injury on him, or prejudice him in the defense of his case; which is now undergoing investigation in the courts. I will state another fact. I want the Senate to bear in mind the dates of these transactions. Mr. King's appointment was in April, 1849, immediately after the coming in of the present Administration; for I look upon it as being but one Administration from the 4th of March, 1849, to the present time. The date of Mr. Collier's appointment is coeval with that of Mr. King's. I have read from official documents to show that the whole of the military and naval power of the Government on the Pacific coast were put under the control of Mr. King. I will now show, from the same documents, that the collector holding the revenues of the Government was subject to a similar control, as I stated some time ago:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 2, 1849.

SIR: This will be handed to you by the Hon. T. Butler King, if there should be in his opinion occasion for so doing. The object of this letter is to impress upon you the desire of the President that you should, in all matters connected with Mr. King's mission, aid and assist him in carrying out the views of the Government as expressed in his instructions from the Department of State, and that you should be guided by his advice and counsel in the conduct of all proper measures within the scope of those instructions.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. M. MEREDITH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

JAMES COLLIER, Esq.,
Collector of the Customs, Upper California.

About the same time, in 1849, a gentleman from the State of Missouri, General John Wilson, was appointed an Indian agent for Salt Lake; and he, also, was furnished with an extravagant outfit and escort to conduct him to his agency.

He went to the Salt Lake, and stayed there long enough to write a letter or two. He then went to California with his family, his books, and his baggage of all descriptions. He was an emigrant, moving at the Government expense. He landed in the valley of the Sacramento about the commencement of the winter season, could carry his effects no further; buried them, and hurried on with his family: By an order that emanated from the Secretary of War, a detachment of the army was ordered out the following spring to bring in the private property belonging to the Indian agent, transported for him at Government expense by the Salt Lake to California. I was told by the assistant quartermaster, who fitted out the expedition, the principal object of which was to perform this service, that the cost was little less than $100,000. This is another of the items that creates the necessity of deficiency bills, and charged as an expenditure in California. After General Wilson got to California, he resigned his agency, but no censure was cast on him for having passed through the country where he was assigned to duty, and emigrating, at such an enormous expense to the Government, to another part of the country; but he was actually appointed to another office in California. He was made navy agent at San Francisco, an office of great importance, the emoluments of which he received for a long time without giving the bond required by law; and he never did give bond that was accepted, and the office was abolished to get clear of him. This same gentleman is one of the high priests of the Whig party in California. He lately presided over one of the largest Whig conventions ever assembled in that State.

I allude to General Wilson in no spirit of unkindness, but to show where a large amount of the public money charged to California has gone. I put it to the account of a mal-administration of this Government, which commenced in the spring of 1849.

I will now go back and show the origin of the abuses of which I complain, which is inflicting such deep injury upon my State; for I believe that there was never such recklessness known since this Government was formed in the expenditure of the public money, as has been exhibited there.

It was an important era in the history of this country, when, on the 4th of March, 1849, a successful General was installed into the office of President of the United States—one who had been all his life, from early manhood, in the Army of the United States—who had never voted, and possessed no knowledge of civil affairs.

This important event has laid the foundation of the subsequent recklessness and disregard of law in expending the public money, especially in the military department of the Government. I speak for my own section of the Union. Let others speak for theirs.

In order that I may be fairly understood by the Senate, when I am speaking of events that occurred in California, which may not be so familiar to other members as to myself, I will read an extract from a letter addressed by Colonel Mason, Military Governor of California, to the Secretary of War, after he received the news of the peace with Mexico. After stating that he had anticipated the instructions in regard to the peace, he says:

"The first part of the Secretary's instructions were therefore anticipated, and I have now only to fulfill the latter part, viz: 'to take proper measures with a view to its (Upper California) permanent occupation.'"

"The above are the only instructions I have received from the Department to guide me in the course to be pursued, now that war has ceased, and that the country forms an integral part of the United States. For the past two years no civil government has existed here, save that controlled by the senior military or naval officer; and no civil officers exist in the country, save the alcaldes appointed or confirmed by myself. To throw off upon them or the people at large the civil management and control of the country, would most probably lead to endless confusions, if not to absolute anarchy; and yet what right or authority have I to exercise civil control in time of peace in a Territory of the United States? or, if sedition and rebellion should arise, where is my force to meet it? Two companies of regulars, every day diminishing by desertions, that cannot be prevented, will soon be the only military force in California; and they will be of necessity compelled to remain at San Francisco and Monterey, to guard the large depôts of powder and munitions of war, which cannot be removed. Yet, unsupported by military force, or by any positive instructions, I feel compelled to exercise control over the alcaldes appointed, and to maintain order, if possible, in the country, until a civil governor arrive, armed with instructions and laws to guide his footsteps."

"In like manner, if all customs were withdrawn, and the ports thrown open free to the world, San Francisco would be made the depôt of all the foreign goods in the north Pacific, to the injury of our revenue and the interests of our own merchants. To prevent this great influx of foreign goods into the country duty free, I feel it my duty to attempt the collection of duties, according to the United States tariff of 1846. This will render it necessary for me to appoint temporary collectors, &c., in the several ports of entry, for the military force is too much reduced to attend to those duties."

Here is an honest avowal that he has no authority to exercise civil control in times of peace in a territory of the United States. The necessity of the case may have justified this assumption of power, but never that of levying duty by his simple edict under the tariff of 1846.

Thus at the close of the war with Mexico, this officer, who was in command of the Army in California, notified the Government, that to prevent anarchy, a de facto government must be maintained until Congress established a legal one. He also, under the tyrant's plea of necessity, extended the revenue laws of the United States to California. Before Congress acted at all, he decreed that the tariff of 1846 should be enforced there, and under this decree duties were exacted. When this letter reached the Secretary of War, the assumption of civil authority was overlooked, as the emergency arising from the neglect of Congress to create a government justified it. The Secretary of State, Mr. Buchanan, in a letter to Mr. Voorhies, post office agent, justified the formation of this de facto government. The question as to the power to collect duties, which had been assumed by Governor Mason, was referred to the Secretary of the Treasury. On the 7th October, 1848, he issued a circular, in which he stated explicitly that there was no power to collect duties in California. I will read it:

"On the 30th of May last, upon the exchange of ratifications of our treaty with Mexico, California became a part of the American Union; in consequence of which, various questions have been presented by merchants and collectors for the decision of this Department."

"By the Constitution of the United States it is declared that 'All treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.' By the treaty with Mexico, California is annexed to this Republic, and the Constitution of the United States is extended over that Territory, and is in full force throughout its limits. Congress, also, by several enactments; subsequent to the ratification of the treaty, have distinctly recognized California as a part of the Union, and have extended over it, in several important particulars, the laws of the United States."

"Under these circumstances, the following instructions are issued by this Department:

"1st. All articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of California, shipped therefrom at any time since the 30th of May last, are entitled to admission, free of duty, into all the ports of the United States."

"2d. All articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, are entitled to admission, free of duty, into California, as are also all foreign goods which are exempt from duty by the laws of Congress, or on which goods the duties prescribed by those laws have been paid to any collector of the United States previous to their introduction into California."

"3d. Although the Constitution of the United States extends to California, and Congress have recognized it by law as a part of the Union, and legislated for it as such, yet it is not brought by law within the limits of any collection district, nor has Congress authorized the appointment of any officers to collect the revenue accruing on the import of foreign dutiable goods into that Territory. Under these circumstances, although this Department may be unable to collect the duties accruing on importations from foreign countries into California, yet, if foreign dutiable goods should be introduced there, and shipped thence to any port or place of the United States, they will be subject to duty, as also to all the penalties prescribed by law when such importation is attempted without the payment of duties."

He reiterated this statement in his annual report at the opening of the next session of Congress; and President Polk, in his last annual message, said most emphatically that no such power could be exercised. Here is what they say:

"The revenue laws not having been extended to California, no duties could be collected there, but the Department exercised all its authority by issuing the circular hereto annexed, [which I have just read,] (marked S,) opening free trade, under the Constitution, between its ports and those of the rest of the Union, at the same time guarding the revenue from loss, as far as practicable."

"No revenue has been, or could be, collected at the ports in California, because Congress failed to authorize the establishment of custom-houses, or the appointment of officers for the purpose."

"The Secretary of the Treasury, by a circular letter addressed to the collectors of customs on the 7th day of October last, a copy of which is herewith transmitted, exercised all the power with which he was invested by law."

When the news of this disavowal of the power that had been exercised by Colonel Mason, as de facto governor of California, reached that country, application was made to Commodore Jones, (who was in the bay of San Francisco with a naval force, to execute the tariff of Governor Mason,) to know whether the circular of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the message of the President, did not make it his duty to permit vessels carrying supplies to the citizens of California to enter the ports of that country and land their cargoes without paying duties? What was his reply? It was very brief. He said he intended to execute the tariff established by Colonel Mason, with all the power under his command; that is to say, if it was not obeyed by the citizens of California, and by those carrying supplies to them, he would use the Navy of the United States to sink their ships, and starve the people into obedience.

When intelligence of this expected collision between the people of California and those in command of the Government forces reached here, was the conduct of these officers censured? Not at all. It was silently acquiesced in, and therefore tacitly approved.

I have thus stated, at some length, the history of events in California, which resulted in the collection of what is known there as the "civil fund;" and will be pretty well known here by the same title before you are done with it. The temptation to use it for objects not provided for by any law, could not be resisted; and thus was laid the foundation of the enormous expenditures upon objects of doubtful necessity, of which we have heard so much. But I will state here, in reference to the responsibility of expending this money, charged upon the assistant quartermasters in California, that I do not indorse this charge unless it is proved that they acted without authority. If they acted under orders from a superior officer, which were sanctioned, or not disavowed, by the Secretary of War, the head of the Department, and not the subordinate, is responsible. The Quartermaster General is a subordinate—is the head of a bureau; and if he, or any of his subordinates, violated the law in expending the public money, it was the duty of the head of the War Department to report him or them to the President of the United States for dismissal, or to be tried by a court-martial. I am prepared to say, that the Quartermaster General, and his subordinates in California, so far as I know, have always acted under orders from superior authority; and that every abuse (and there are many in the expenditure of the public money in that country) has been sanctioned, either tacitly or openly, by the head of the War Department. I do not attach the least blame to the present Secretary, because the abuses and assumptions of power to which I have referred originated before he came into office, and I believe he is diligently engaged trying to put a stop to the extravagant expenditures of his Department. But I am looking to the system which was established in 1849. The Quartermaster's Department is not responsible, and should not be made the scape-goat, and bear the blame that properly attaches to the head of the Administration.

Mr. DAWSON. Will my friend from California yield the floor for a moment, for the purpose of examining into this matter? He says that, in the Quartermaster's Department particularly, enormous abuses have been practiced. As he has drawn our attention to them, will he state where they are ascertained to exist, that we may know where to guard against them for the future?

Mr. GWIN. I am coming to that, and shall read from the documents presently. But the gentleman misunderstands me, when he says I refer to the Quartermaster's Department particularly, and charge it with enormous abuses. I say that there has been a wasteful expenditure of public money in California, not only in the Quartermaster's Department, which I will show has only obeyed orders, but I think I may add in nearly every department of the Government under Executive control. I will now read from a report of Major Vinton, one of the most intelligent officers of the Quartermaster's Department, and the senior officer of the department in California, dated March 29, 1850:

"GENERAL: I have the honor to report that, in compliance with your orders of the 5th of April, 1849, to proceed to California, and there take in charge the direction of the affairs of the quartermaster's department of the Pacific division of the Army, I embarked at New York on the 17th of April, 1849, (with $150,000 in specie under my care,) and arrived at Panama on the 2d of May. At that place I was detained twenty-four days by untoward circumstances, and re-embarked on the Pacific the 23d of May, for San Francisco."

After going on to state the situation of affairs which he found on his arrival in California, he describes the point which had been selected as the great depôt for the army and navy of the United States on the Pacific. I will read what he says on that subject:

"By the united judgment of Major General Smith and Commodore Jones, a place situated on the north bank of the straits of Karquinez, called Benicia, has been selected as the most favorable locality for our military and naval depôts. It is with great reluctance, therefore, that I venture to describe this position, believing, as I do, that most of its important features are objectionable, or rather, that it is lacking in many attributes which are requisite in a site designed for the purposes that this has been. Geographically it has but few defects, being in a direct line of communication with the ocean, having good anchorage, deep water, and free approaches to its shore for the unloading of the largest class of ships. Here its advantages cease, and they relate more to the interests of commerce than to the peculiar fitness of the place for a military station and a depot of supplies. Topographically, it is uninviting in the extreme, possessing an aspect neither of beauty nor of usefulness. Hills, barren of trees or any other vegetation but the wild oats, rise abruptly from the water, and, swelling onward to the interior for six miles, are utterly destitute of wood; but beyond that region the scrubby oak makes its appearance in single trees, or in small clusters, affording but a scanty supply for present consumption. Fresh water is only found in one small spring, about a mile westward from the depot. This has to be shared with the citizens of the town of Benicia.

"Having in view, then, that these two great elements, which invariably form the first principles in making a choice for the residence of a community, are wanting at this place, I think the defects of the position are made manifest.

"It has been supposed that the waters of the straits, at certain seasons of the year, may be relied on for the use of the troops; but I think this erroneous. It is only at a certain stage of the tides, combined with very high water in the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers, that the water of the straits is palatable, and then it is deemed by some to be unwholesome. A well fifty feet in depth was dug by Lieutenant Colonel Casey's company, but the water proved brackish and unsuitable for use.

"The rocks forming the base of the hills seem to have been, by some convulsion of nature, thrown upwards from a horizontal position, giving a dip towards the straits, by which the water cannot be retained below the surface. Artesian wells may, by persevering probing, remedy this great evil, and it is the only reliance we now have. No expense should be spared to procure scientific as well as practical men to push, vigorously, the search for water by such means; and I must earnestly urge the subject to your notice as an enterprise upon which the welfare of the depot and its inhabitants are to depend.

"Previous to my departure for Oregon, I caused to be purchased an instrument for boring, and placed it under the management of Mr. Bonford, whose report will be found in the appendix. Although he has not met with full success, I feel confident that, with more perfect apparatus, water of a good quality may yet be obtained convenient to the depot. But to guard against a failure through such means, the commanding general is desirous of providing in another manner for a supply of water for the use of the post.

"He proposes that, at a point adjacent to some of the larger buildings, a cistern to contain from two hundred thousand to three hundred thousand gallons of water be constructed; the bricks and cement of which it is to be formed to be brought from the United States. But as expensive as artesian wells are, they would cost far less than such an undertaking. Water remains to be provided, and the choice of means is left for your decision. Small wooden cisterns have been constructed near the store-house already erected; but the supply from them is only adequate in the rainy season.

"Wood can be obtained on Suisun bay and on the Sacramento river; but if procured by contract, under the present rate of wages for labor, it would form an item of expenditure surpassing the belief of the most credulous; and if attempted by the labor of our troops, desertion would inevitably follow, to the annihilation of the military force so employed."

This selection laid the foundation of large expenditures in California. The officers who made the selection were subordinate to the Secretaries of War and the Navy. Their action was not final or effective until sanctioned by the heads of these Departments. The Secretary of the Navy did not approve of the selection, or if he did, there has been no expenditure of public money towards the establishment of a navy-yard there. He waited for Congress to act, and we now have the subject under consideration. Not so with the Secretary of War. Notwithstanding the report of Major Vinton, made near two years ago and laid before him, in which he shows the most palpable defects in the location, he has never disapproved of the act of the commander of the Pacific division; and therefore I hold him responsible for the entire expenditure of the public money there. I will call the attention of the Senate to a few more extracts from this document, and will thus show why I introduced the civil fund into this discussion:

"In some of my reports, made while stationed in California, I had occasion to call your attention to the fiscal concerns of the quartermaster's department under my charge. The large sums carried to that country by Major Fitzgerald and myself, were speedily expended. Indeed, I found that on my arrival there the debts contracted by my predecessors were so large as to leave no other resort for means to carry on the current duties of the department than the 'civil fund' of California, so called, which had been raised, in part, by military contributions during the Mexican war, and otherwise by the collection of duties at the custom-house.

"This fund, being under the control of the Governor of the Territory, was placed for safekeeping in the custody of some one of the disbursing officers of the quartermaster's department. As it had accumulated to a cumbersome amount, and, from the character of the buildings at San Francisco, no good place of security could be found in which to deposit it, it was deemed expedient and safe to lend such sums as were needful for the urgent wants of the army, to be replaced at a subsequent and convenient period by remittances from the United States. But for this resource the operations of the quartermaster's department would have been much impaired if not entirely stopped for want of funds. And such had been the extravagant wants of the department, by the unforeseen increase of the demands upon it—extending beyond any, even the wildest conjectural estimates that could have been formed—that the drafts upon this fund had at one time become alarming, and I was apprehensive that the sums so expended might exceed the appropriations for that division of the army. Being assured, however, by the general commanding, that any excess of expenditures would be provided for by future appropriations by Congress, the 'civil fund' continued to be our reliance. In relation to this subject I have written extensively enough before to render further remarks unnecessary; yet, as it may not be well understood how the civil fund has been created, I will remark that in its accumulation it may be classed under three distinct heads, viz:

"1st. The money received from military contributions during the war with Mexico.

"2d. The amount derived from the collection of duties on imports under the administration of Colonel Mason, without the authority of law, and subsequent to the treaty of peace with Mexico, and prior to the arrival of Major General Smith; and

"3d. The amount which accrued from the collection of customs after the 1st of March, 1849, under the circular letter of General Smith, which made the duties collected subject to the future action of Congress—the sums being voluntarily deposited by the importers in the hands of the agents of the Government.

"All drafts upon these deposits by the disbursing officers of the army have been considered as loans, to be replaced after the action of Congress shall have been had in relation to the fund."

These extracts show an extraordinary state of affairs. The $150,000 taken out by Major Vinton, and I know not how much by Major Fitzgerald, is speedily exhausted. But this was but a drop in the bucket in fitting up this new depot, and carrying on the services in other parts of the State. The depot was likely to be brought to a stand-still. What is to be done? Why, borrow from the civil fund. Presently the sums thus borrowed become so enormous, fears are entertained that they will exceed the appropriations made by Congress, but the commanding general tells the quartermaster to go on, and pledges Congress to provide for this excess of expenditure. This pledge in this quartermaster's report is brought to the notice of the Secretary, who expresses no dissatisfaction at this assumption of power. He tacitly assents to this use of the civil fund, and thus with his sanction hundreds of thousands of dollars are expended in establishing a depot, in the face of a most unfavorable report of Major Vinton as to the site.

The quartermasters were frightened at this system of borrowing money to carry on a work not authorized to be built by Congress—were frightened at exceeding the appropriations made by Congress to meet the expenses of their department; but the commanding general said go on; the Secretary of War acquiesced, and another large item is thus made up for a deficiency bill.

One word more, and I will pass on. Major Vinton acknowledges that Colonel Mason collected the civil fund without authority of law. He also refers to the voluntary deposit made under General Smith's regulations, these voluntary deposits being made under the threat, that if any importer should refuse, his vessel would be driven from the coast by Commodore Jones's guns.

Now, I ask this question, Cui bono? What was the necessity for these expenditures? It may be said, to protect the people of California in the event of war. There could have been no other justifiable reason given for expending such vast sums of money without authority of law, unless there was a pressing necessity for it. I will read from the report of another quartermaster, Major Allen, to show what benefit the people of California were to derive from expending such sums in establishing a new and expensive depot on a large scale to quarter the army:

"I entered upon duty in California on the 1st of July, 1849, and took post at the place selected for a general depot, on the straits of Karquines, near the town of Benicia, under the direction of my predecessor. The quartermaster's stores had been transferred to this location from San Francisco, and were piled upon the ground near where it was proposed to erect storehouses; having no cover but the old sails of vessels, and no protection but the watchfulness of a single agent. The time for which the storehouses at San Francisco had been rented, expired on the 1st of July, and the enormous rent demanded per month for their continued occupation determined the commanding general to remove the stores in advance of any improvements, presuming that the loss of property would be less in value while thus exposed, than the expenditure required for its storage.

"I found two companies of the 2d infantry stationed at this point; the officers with families were quartered upon an old hulk moored near the shore, and the single officers, together with the soldiers, were living in tents upon the shore. One half of the men belonging to these companies had already deserted, and the remainder had ceased to be soldiers excepting in name. They refused to work unless paid the mining value of labor, and they could not be trusted as a guard over the public property. So lax had become the discipline, and so little confidence had their immediate commanding officer in their fidelity, that he declined issuing arms to them, and did not attempt to exact from them any extra duty whatever."

To avoid the enormous rents of San Francisco, hundreds of thousands must be expended in building a new depot. And for what? To quarter troops for the defense of California, that could not be trusted by their officers with arms in their hands; the officers starving, (for it is well known they could not live on their pay,) and the soldiers, to whom the people were to look for defense, deserting. Vast sums paid to laborers to build barracks for soldiers, in such a state of insubordination, that they would not work, and could not be intrusted with arms, or with the charge of the public property! With a full knowledge of these facts, the Secretary of War sanctions these enormous expenditures on a depot established without authority of law, with the full knowledge that no corresponding benefit could result from its establishment, either to California or the United States. I intend it to be distinctly understood, that these extraordinary expenditures were known to the Secretary of War, and not disapproved of by him.

Hear what Major Allen says, in the report I have just read from. The italics are mine:

"That the cost of the improvements made, and services rendered, have no parallel in the history of the quartermaster's department, I am fully aware; but private, as well as public interests, have been subordinate to a state of things—have acknowledged a standard of value—which has no parallel in the history of the world. My correspondence with you, during this year, will show with what reluctance I have submitted to circumstances which I could not control. The silence of the War Department, until recently, induced the commanding general, to believe that the improvements he was directing had at least the tacit consent of the higher authorities; and, as the expenditures had periodically been reported, it was presumed that they had acquiesced in the necessity of submitting to the current rates of the country."

"I do not remind you of this state of things for the purpose, at this late day, of giving you information. For a portion of the period to which I now refer, the Department, here, was represented by an officer of superior rank to myself. It was the special duty of this officer to report to you every circumstance attendant upon the extraordinary expenditure of money in this division. He had full knowledge, being present, of every transaction. I have not seen his report, but I have no doubt, from the vigilance, zeal, and intelligence manifested by this officer, that but little was omitted which the subject suggested, and nothing that was requisite to a clear and explicit understanding of the condition of the country. From this source alone, I may venture the presumption that it was made known to the Department at an early day, the impossibility of making any improvements here without enormous cost, or of fitting out or providing transportation for any military movement, without an expenditure of money exceeding in amount tenfold, at least, the outlay incident to like service on the Atlantic side. A retrospective inquiry implies an absence of this knowledge, and in vites explanation, which I have given, not, however, with the expectation of stating any new facts."

"Every transaction of mine has, however, been subjected to the watchfulness and control of a superior authority, and a superior discretion. My immediate commanding general is accordingly my most competent witness; and you will find in the accompanying papers ample evidence that my whole conduct has his full and entire approval."

Mr. DAWSON. What is the date of that report?

Mr. GWIN. June 30, 1851. It is in the Quartermaster General's report, sent in at the commencement of this session. I repeat the fact, these expenditures were known to the head of the War Department; and that the commander of the military division on the Pacific had no reason to believe that he was acting contrary to the wishes of the head of that Department, when he received no intimation of it. Major Allen entertained no doubt but that all of his acts were approved, until a very late period. He was not censured, nor attempted to be censured. No one can assert that he acted without authority. He refers to his commanding general, who approved all of his acts. Has this commanding general been censured for giving this approval? Not at all. The whole of this movement, and of this extraordinary expenditure of the public money was known to the head of the War Department, and he never disapproved of it. As to its necessity, I have shown that the army was in a state of utter disorganization; that the officers were starving—that is to say, no officer could live on his pay—and the men deserting; that the soldiers at Benicia—and I suppose it was the case at every other point—could not be trusted. The regiment commanded by Major Seawill, as he informed me, was reduced to two hundred men; the soldiers would not labor without the pay of a workman in the mines—would desert if they were required to do the duty of a soldier; which made it necessary to hire laborers and mechanics at from four to fifteen dollars a day, to do what soldiers in other parts of the country were required to do, and did do; to build barracks for the army, when, from desertions, there was no army, and but few soldiers who could be relied upon.

I invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that there was a much larger number of officers and soldiers in California before the arrival of those for whose accommodation this expensive depot was established, who were comfortably quartered in convenient and appropriate sections of the Territory; that there were quarters for soldiers, as well as for the officers and their families, (without the necessity of the latter being cooped up in old hulks of ships)—at Monterey, Santa Barbara, Los Angeles, San Diego, and Sonoma. There were the New York regiment, the Mormon battalion, with the officers and soldiers of the regular army, which formed a larger force in California before the close of the war than we have ever had since. It is thus evident that these extraordinary expenses to provide new quarters were entirely unnecessary, and that the soldiers were thus brought nearer to the mines, and tempted to desert. Major Vinton says, in regard to the post at Benicia, when he arrived there, there was no wood, that they would have to get it from Suisun and the Sacramento river at extraordinary prices, probably $100 a cord. I do not pretend to be familiar with military affairs, but officers of the army in California, of high character, have always asserted that there was no necessity of establishing the depot at Benicia. This I know to be the opinion of General Riley. I do not censure the chief in command of the Pacific division; it was a matter of judgment with him; but the head of the War Department, if he differed from General Smith, should have disapproved of his acts, as did the Secretary of the Navy, by not carrying out the recommendation of Commodore Jones, until it was approved and sanctioned by Congress.

I have brought to the notice of the Senate the enormous expenditure of the War Department in California not authorized by law, and sanctioned by the head of the Department, in order to show the contrast in the other Departments of the Government. I will refer first to the Navy Department, which was cautious in adopting the recommendations of the commodore in command on the Pacific, involving the expenditure of large sums of money until Congress was consulted. The Navy could not participate in the brilliant achievements of the Mexican war, for Mexico had no navy to contend with on the ocean. The glory and renown of that war was monopolized by the Army. One of its most successful generals was, from the enthusiasm of the moment, elected President of the United States. The success and brilliant achievements of the Army, during the war, seemed to impress upon the mind of some of the officers of that branch of the public service that they were privileged to vary from the rigid restrictions that had been imposed upon them before the war, and that they could expend the public money on objects which they conceived to be for the public good, without the previous sanction of law, and they relied on the military chief who ruled the country to shield them from censure.

Mr. DAWSON. I would inquire of the Senator from California, at what particular time that depot was ordered in the neighborhood of Benicia?

Mr. GWIN. In the spring of 1849.

Mr. DAWSON. What time in the spring of 1849?

Mr. GWIN. It is mentioned in the reports of General Smith, to which I have not yet referred. The report of the location was forwarded to this city after the 4th of March, 1849. It was not known to the former Administration.

Mr. DAWSON. What I desire to know is, whether the location was made under the present or the last Administration?

Mr. GWIN. It was made since the 4th of March, 1849.

Mr. DAWSON. Under what orders?

Mr. GWIN. There were no orders issued to General Smith by the last Administration to make any such location.

Mr. DAWSON. By whom was the depot established?

Mr. GWIN. By the general in command of the Pacific division, and sanctioned by the Secretary of War.

Mr. DAWSON. I want to know who the military commander was at the time the depot was ordered?

Mr. GWIN. General Smith.

Mr. DAWSON. General Persifer F. Smith.

Mr. GWIN. I give General Smith full credit for acting as he thought for the good of the country. But I contend that it was the duty of the Secretary of War, who should have been familiar with the revenues of the department, and the extraordinary expenditure that would result from the establishment of this depot, to have required that the old quarters of the army during the war, should be used until Congress should determine to establish new localities in the sections of the State where they were needed.

Now, Mr. President, I come to another matter. In the Indian appropriation bill, passed on the third of September, 1850, we have this clause:

"To enable the President to hold treaties with the various Indian tribes in the State of California, $25,000."

This is a modest sum of money, nothing like as much as it should have been, but all that Congress thought proper to appropriate. Acting under the authority thus conferred upon him, the President of the United States proceeded to organize a Board of Commissioners. He appointed three, two of whom were resident on this side of the Rocky Mountains. He sent them to California, no doubt at the public expense, to negotiate treaties. These commissioners took with them authority to call to their aid the army of the United States stationed in California. That is to say, they took with them authority to call upon the commander of that military division for escorts. I wish it to be borne in mind that all this was to be done under an appropriation of $25,000.

One of the Board, and its disbursing officer, on the 11th of December, addresses the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, as follows. After casting a slur on the State authorities, that they were belligerent; that war with the Indians was profitable, because soldiers got from five to ten dollars per day, and "Uncle Sam" would foot the bill, (very doubtful,) he proceeds to say:

"We are now en route for the Mariposa country, with an escort of one hundred and one picked men, ten officers, three six mule covered wagons, and some one hundred and fifty pack mules, to carry our provisions, ammunition, and Indian goods; all under the command of Captain E. D. Keyes, an experienced and excellent officer, from whom we feel assured not only of protection, but of cordial co-operation, in our endeavors to pacify the Indians, with the olive branch rather than the sword. We arrived here by steamer from Benicia, on the 8th instant; yesterday evening, the horses and mules for transportation arrived; to-day, we are arranging for the journey, and expect to be on the road, in the direction of the Tulare Lake, early to-morrow morning."

"We are gathering all the information we can, and by no means despair of effecting, in the name of their Great Father, the President, a very general pacification; but it will be a work requiring address, time, and, probably, a large outlay of money for goods and provisions."

I will now show how this escort was fitted out, by reading from a letter of T. Butler King, collector at San Francisco, to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The quartermaster's department was out of funds, and had made application to the collector for assistance. He says:

"I may be permitted to add, that having heretofore made advances to the amount of $150,000, for the purpose of enabling the troops to move in support of the commissioners; and without I had taken the responsibility, not a step could have been taken for the pacification of the Indians, and the prevention of probably a long and disastrous Indian war; and though four months subsequently I received an approval of that advance by the Quartermaster General, yet I have been reminded by the Commissioner of Customs, in a letter received by the last mail, that my conduct in this matter is contrary to law."

Here is information that will enlighten the chairman of the Finance Committee as to the origin of these deficiencies. The collector is surprised to find he has acted "contrary to law," in advancing public money to an officer in advance of an appropriation made by Congress. I have been anxious to ascertain what amount was expended on these escorts, but cannot get the information from the Quartermaster's Department, owing to the mixing up of accounts. I therefore adopt Mr. King's letter as the most definite information I can command.

I wish it to be borne in mind that this commission was organized on an appropriation of $25,000; and, before they commence their labors, they involve the Quartermaster's Department in an expense of $150,000, which is borrowed from the collector at San Francisco.

The collector is charged with acting contrary to law in loaning the money; but he is in no danger. He will be indemnified by transfer warrants, or in a deficiency bill. I allude to this transaction to show that the War Department has become the predominant power of the Government, whose subordinates act without authority of law, with an impunity not tolerated in any other Department in the Government. Thus I find this escort provided with money from the collector's office, contrary to law, paid to agents subordinate to this Board of Indian Commissioners, and obeying their orders. That, while from this $150,000 all supplies for this escort are paid for, the supplies for the commissioners and Indians, with whom they are treating, are bought on a credit, and have not been paid for to this day. And here in this deficiency bill there is, no doubt, an estimate for the deficiency thus created, which we are called on to make an appropriation to meet, while not a dollar is appropriated to defray the expenses of the commissioners, and to pay for their supplies and those furnished the Indians while the commissioners were treating with them.

The commissioners, having the entire control of the expedition, are limited in their expenditures to the sum of $25,000 appropriated; and, although they have drawn drafts for the overplus of their expenditure, these drafts are protested, and the parties furnishing the supplies are unpaid; nor has the Department of the Interior asked for their payment, although the Secretary is aware that the expenditures have largely exceeded the appropriation.

In proof of this, I will read extracts from letters of the commissioners, found in the annual report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs:

"We arrived accordingly at this camp on the 15th ultimo, found some Indians on the ground, and others continued to arrive daily until the 26th; when, having meanwhile treated the red men and their families to as many provisions as they could eat, and finding them in excellent good humor, we met them in council, explained to them the object and purposes of our mission, and submitted to them our propositions for a general treaty of peace, and a settlement of all existing difficulties."

"We have, therefore, been under the necessity of making pretty liberal provision under the head of 'subsistence,' and now advertise you that this course will have to be pursued throughout the whole State."

"For pressing demands, we have to do the best we can, fully satisfied that our policy is correct, and that it is, in the end, cheaper to feed the whole flock for a year, than to fight them for a week."

"The country set apart for them so far is very poor soil; but a small portion of it is adapted to agricultural purposes, but remarkably well adapted to the raising of stock; and we think it would be good policy to supply them liberally with brood stock, in addition to the beef cattle, which is indispensable for present consumption, as the faithful fulfillment of the treaties on their part will measurably depend on it. They must have food."

"This will require money, and it is a subject of surprise and regret that the appropriation for our use has been cut down so small. The amount required will be seemingly large, but, by pursuing the foregoing policy, it will be found to be small, in comparison, to all treaties where annuities are given."

"I have sent men among them who speak their language, and are influential, and placed beef cattle under the care of the traders, in order to supply their pressing necessities for food, and to induce them to come down from out of their mountain fastnesses, all of which it is to be hoped will have the desired effect of causing them to come in and conclude a treaty. I speak of this as the only true policy; further experience only confirms previous statements, that the Indians are numerous and formidable; and it is difficult, if not impossible, to subdue them by waging war; it is possible to make terms with them by exercising a proper and humane policy, making them not only useful to themselves, but to the white community at large."

"I determined to discharge the escort that accompanied me through to that place, and return to San Francisco, or proceed down the coast with an escort of citizens, who kindly proposed to accompany me to the Indian villages in the vicinity."

"On the 17th day of June, I addressed a note to Captain E. D. Keyes, who had command of the escort, dispensing with the further services of his command, a copy of which, together with his reply, I herewith inclose."

These extracts show that the commissioners controlled the escort, that they were incurring expenses largely exceeding the appropriation, yet we do not find that they were checked by the Department.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

PUBLISHED AT WASHINGTON, BY JOHN C. RIVES.—TERMS $3 FOR THIS SESSION.

32D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 21, 1852.

NEW SERIES....No. 71.

Soon after I returned home an alarming rumor prevailed, that there was danger of a general Indian war in the northern portion of the State, and in Oregon. One of the commissioners applied to me to urge Mr. King to make an advance on the appropriation of $25,000, which was made at the last session of Congress, but which had not been transmitted by the Department to the commissioners. I did advise Mr. King to make an advance of $5,000 on the appropriation, but distinctly disavowed any sanction of the policy or acts of the Board.

Some days since my colleague [Mr. WELLER] offered a resolution, which was adopted, calling for information in regard to the acts of the Indian agents in California. The reply of the Secretary of the Interior is not yet printed, which I very much regret, for I am anxious to use it on the present occasion. I have procured a copy of the letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, which accompanies that report, which I will read to the Senate:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, April 13, 1852.

SIR: In answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 3th instant, in which you are required to inform that body—

1. Whether the Indian commissioners or agents in the State of California, in their negotiations, have contracted any debts for which the Government is liable, and if so, the amount thereof; and

2. Whether any drafts drawn by said commissioners, or agents, have been protested by the Department, and if so, the amount—

I have the honor to transmit, herewith, copies of sundry communications from the Indian agents in California, from which it appears that they have contracted debts to the amount of $716,394 79; also, copy of a communication from the late sub-agent, (Johnson,) showing that he, too, has contracted liabilities to a considerable extent. The precise amount is not given, but it is believed to be upwards of $50,000, as I understand that his drafts to near that amount have already been presented.

The whole amount of the appropriations for Indian purposes in California was placed in the hands of the agents, and they had no authority whatever for exceeding that amount in their negotiations. They allege, however, that the pressure of circumstances was such as to justify them in the course they have pursued. Upon the correctness of this allegation depends, I apprehend, the liability of the Government to pay the debts they have contracted. To what extent it is correct, the Department has not the power to determine, nor has it the means of forming a satisfactory opinion. The question of the liability of the Government to pay these debts, must necessarily be decided by Congress; and presuming that a thorough investigation into the whole matter would be required, I have heretofore recommended that an appropriation be made to meet the expenses of such investigation.

A large portion of the debts above referred to, are in the form of drafts drawn by the agents on the Secretary of the Interior, and as they have not been presented to this office, I am not able to state the amount to which they have been protested.

In connection with this subject, I have the honor to transmit, herewith, copy of a communication, with accompanying papers, addressed to you by Hon. Thos. H. Benton, and referred by you to this office.

It may also be proper to state, that, in addition to the foregoing liabilities, a claim has been presented by Dr. W. M. Rye, to the amount of $13,402, for his services in vaccinating Indians in California, the particulars of which are set forth in papers, copies of which are herewith submitted.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
L. LEA, Commissioner.

TO THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

From this official statement, it appears the Indian agents in California have contracted debts beyond the appropriations made by Congress, to the amount of $766,000. That the greater portion of this indebtedness is represented by drafts drawn by the agents on the Secretary of the Interior, which were protested on presentation. I have before shown that $150,000 was drawn by the quartermaster's department from the collector at San Francisco, to defray the expenses of escorts to these Indian agents, which, added to the above amount, shows an expenditure in one year of about $1,000,000 based upon an appropriation of $50,000. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in the letter I have read, is quite non-committal. He says these agents had no authority to exceed the amount of the appropriation. Why, then, are they not dismissed? Here is an acknowledgment that they have exceeded their authority under the law, yet they are permitted to go unpunished. Two of them are still acting, and probably drawing more drafts, to meet with the fate of their predecessors, and the third left California, and at his leisure repaired to this city and resigned, drawing his salary up to the date of his resignation. These drafts are circulating all over the country. They were given for supplies for the Indians, transferred by the parties who furnished the supplies, and large amounts are in the hands of third parties, who took them under the confident belief that they would be paid on presentation, by the Government. A single mail sometimes brings drafts to the amount of hundreds of thousands of dollars; all are protested on presentation, and the agents who are thus dishonoring the Government are permitted to go unwhipped of justice, and continue the system. This stand-still policy of the Executive will not shield him from the responsibility of these transactions. They must be defended or disavowed; if not disavowed by the dismissal of the officers, which is not the case, then the Department is tacitly sanctioning these acts, and will be responsible for the difficulty that must follow. The citizens of California have furnished these supplies, upon drafts drawn by officers of the Government. They did not ask for the authority under which these officers acted. It was not supposed that they would act without authority. Yet the drafts given in exchange for their property are dishonored, and no steps taken to get an appropriation to pay them. Numerous treaties have been made with bands of Indians, which treaties are withheld from us. In regard to them the Department preserves towards the Senate the silence of death. A part of the treaty-making power, yet treaties are made, and without waiting for our action, they are executed as laws of the land, if not with the approval of the Executive, certainly without any marked disapproval; for the parties who have committed these unlawful acts are still in the public service. A more dangerous assumption of power has never occurred in this country. It is without a parallel in the history of the Government. Three Indian agents, under the exclusive control of the Executive, make numerous Indian treaties, and before they are laid before the Senate, or even transmitted to the Executive, they commence executing these treaties as laws of the land; seize upon the country reserved; drive off the whites, in some instances buying out their possessions, and pledging the Government for payment, (I have numerous claims of this sort) make large purchases of provisions to feed the Indians, which are paid for in drafts upon the head of the Department—drawn without authority, and protested on presentation; and yet these men are permitted to retain their offices, and continue in their lawless course. Can the Administration escape censure for these acts of its subordinates, by remaining silent? Are these transactions to be covered up by withholding the treaties from the Senate? While the dishonored drafts of the Government for near a million of dollars are still unpaid, shall the Executive be permitted to avoid all responsibility, by giving no opinion as to the acts of its subordinates? Where are the treaties? Why are they not transmitted to us? Some of them have been made for more than a year. We have been near five months in session, and yet we are not officially notified of their existence. Does the Executive approve of the policy chalked out in these treaties? If so, why not send them to us for our action? If he does not sanction this policy, why not notify the Senate of the fact, and appoint other agents to adopt a different policy? Is the Executive in favor of paying these protested drafts? If so, why not ask for an appropriation? I have been urging action on this subject ever since the session commenced, and all that I have been able to extract from the Department was an estimate for $10,000, to pay the expenses of an investigation into the acts of the Indian agents. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs speaks very complacently of this estimate, as if, by making it, the Department had done all that it was in duty bound to do. Charges of fraud rest upon these transactions. It is the duty of the Department to probe them to the bottom, and punish the guilty. Has this been done?

I say no; and yet we are complacently told that Congress must look into it, as it is no business of the Department.

I am not disposed to cast censure upon any one, but there must be action on this subject. The people of California are up in arms against these treaties; yet they are withheld from us. I think I can anticipate their fate in this body, if they are ever sent to us. To show the state of public feeling in my State, I will read from a report made by a committee of the Legislature, to which the question of these treaties was referred:

"The committee to whom certain resolutions of the Senate, having reference to the Indian treaties made by the United States Commissioners, Messrs. Wozencraft, McKee and Barbour, and the true policy that the interest of the State of California requires should be adopted by the Federal Government, have, according to order, had the same under consideration, and respectfully submit the subjoined report and resolutions:

"Your committee in approaching the consideration of this subject, were deeply impressed with its importance. They saw a policy adopted by the Indian commissioners, deeply affecting the present and future prosperity of the State. Regardless of the extraordinary circumstances which impelled the wave of population to this State, they have undertaken to assign to the Indian tribes a considerable portion of the richest of our mineral lands. Regardless of the topographical character of our State, which presents an extensive surface of the most valuable grazing land of the earth, but with a comparatively limited quantity of land fully adapted to agricultural purposes, those gentlemen have undertaken to assign no inconsiderable portion of the latter in exclusive property to the Indian tribes, wholly incapable, by habit or taste, of appreciating its value.

"Your committee cannot understand the wisdom of this policy, nor can they believe that it is one to which this State will ever quietly submit. In examining this subject, they have been surprised to find that the policy of the Indian commissioners is not sustained, either by the practice of the Mexican Republic, or that for the last forty-five years of our own.

"It is well known to all those who are acquainted with the history of the Indian policy of Spain and Mexico, that the right of the Indian in the soil was never admitted nor recognized. The general policy of those Governments was to Christianize the Indians, and teach them agriculture, by bringing them into the missions, which were from time to time subject to their authority. The Indians thus brought together were subject to the authority of the priest, even to the extent of inflicting corporal punishment for disobedience of orders, &c., &c.

"This policy has produced a marked effect upon many of the tribes in California. Many of them had lost their wandering character, abandoned their hunter state, and had become valuable and indeed indispensable servants to the large rancheros, upon whose estates they were content to live. The policy of the Indian commissioners in collecting these Indians together, has been, so far, eminently injurious. They have deprived those engaged in agriculture and herding of their usual labor. They have burdened the country with the expense of supporting those who had previously supported themselves. They have taken from the labor of California some of her most important agricultural districts, and from the hardy adventurer from the distant States of this Union, large bodies of the mineral lands filled with the precious metals; and they have wrought all this mischief without one redeeming or corresponding equivalent. The Indian, though fed and clothed, is no happier; though professedly under the protection of the United States Government, he is less safe; though the land assigned him is interdicted to the white man, he swallows his little substance, and the destruction of the race we desire to save is accelerated by the very means to which they have resorted. What, then, is to be done? It is a question full of interest and difficulty. Yet, your committee are firmly of opinion, that the true policy towards the mission Indians, and all those who are brought within the influence of the mission policy, is to let them alone. If thus treated, they will resume their former occupation, and supply, to a great extent, what is so much needed—that labor without which it will be long before California can feed herself. The Indians, moreover, would be happier, safer, and longer preserved from that destruction which seems to be inevitable.

"As to the wild Indians now located within this State, your committee must protest against locating them within our limits. Occupying an important frontier position on the great Pacific—a position of the greatest importance to the whole Republic—it is indispensable that this State should be wholly occupied by a homogeneous population, all contributing, by their character and occupation, to its strength and independence.

"To take any portion of the country west of the Sierra Nevada, for the home of the wild, and generally hostile Indians, would be so manifestly unwise and impolitic, that your committee cannot think that anything more is necessary, than thus to present it to public consideration. But the policy which suits California, has been one long established, and to which we claim an undoubted right. That policy is to remove all Indian tribes beyond the limits of the State in which they are found, with all practicable dispatch.

"Your committee ask if this has been the policy of every Administration since 1804—if in its prosecution, millions have been expended—if the happiest results both to the red man and to the white, have followed it—the country strengthened, and the Indians rescued from destruction; why is it, that the policy has not been pursued here, that the mischievous and antiquated system condemned by every Administration for nearly fifty years, and at war with all experience, should be attempted to be revived in this State from which especially it should have been excluded?

"Your committee therefore respectfully recommend the adoption of the following resolutions, with the concurrence of the House of Assembly:

Resolved, (as the sense of the Senate and Assembly of the State of California,) That the policy pursued by the Federal Government towards the Indian tribes in this State, is wholly and radically wrong, and should be rejected.

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed to oppose the confirmation of any and all treaties with Indians of the State of California, granting to Indians an exclusive right to occupy any of the public lands in the State.

Resolved, That the policy so long and steadily pursued by the General Government, of removing the wild Indians beyond the jurisdiction of States is conceived in wisdom and dictated by humanity, and is productive of tranquility and happiness to the whole country, and that no other can with safety be adopted within this State.

Resolved, That our Senators be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their best endeavors to procure the adoption, by the Federal Government, of the same course, towards the Indians of this State, that has been pursued in other States for the last quarter of a century.

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to present to our Senators and Representatives, each, a copy of the foregoing report and resolutions.

M. M. WAMBAUGH, Chairman.

J. H. RALSTON,

B. FRANK KEENE,

JAMES MILLER."

There was but one dissenting voice in the committee in making this report, and the member dissenting was, as I am informed, personally interested in having the treaties confirmed.

There is danger in the delay of the Executive in acting upon this subject. The Indians expect to be fed, to be maintained without labor. Stop their rations and they will become vicious. They have been withdrawn from their usual habits of labor and former means of support, and they will not return to them. They will steal, rob, and murder, and thus bring on collisions with the whites that will result in the extermination of the Indians. They are located by these treaties in the midst of the white settlements; collisions must and will occur, if this policy is adhered to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will my friend be kind enough to answer the question, whether this bill contains appropriations for money thus expended in the execution of treaties not yet ratified?

Mr. GWIN. Not in the execution of the treaties; but no doubt part of the deficiency in the Quartermaster's Department, which is provided for in this bill, resulted from the acts of these Indian agents, who, in making the treaties, were furnished with escorts at the expense of the Quartermaster's Department.

Sir, I have said, and again repeat, that the translation of a victorious general from the head of his army to the presidential chair, with no experience in or qualification for civil affairs, has had a baneful effect upon the administrative departments of the Government. With a military President to shield delinquencies, the executive officers of that department have exhibited a looseness in the performance of their official duties that was before unknown. When called on by Congress to reduce their estimates, they decline. When their estimates are cut down by Congress, they go on and spend largely over the amount appropriated, and demand of us the passage of a deficiency bill. Sir, we are losing all control over this department of the Government. If this military spirit continues to prevail—if we continue the policy of taking our Presidents from the chiefs of the Army—we will very soon be required to stop our deliberations, and merely register edicts. The subordinates of the War Department in their expenditures exceed the appropriations; the Government steps boldly up and demands additional appropriations, and they are granted. The subordinates of another Department exceed the appropriations in their expenditures. Are we called on to meet these deficiencies? Oh, no, the Department repudiates.

The military is the overshadowing power of the Government. In that department the subordinates may exceed the lawful appropriations with impunity. Yet when a couple of young officers, who had gallantly faced the enemy in Mexico, take a small contract to supply a portion of the army with forage, which is not prohibited by law, a great noise is made about it; and they are subjected to a court-martial. If I am not mistaken in this, there was personal pique, as well as a stern discharge of public duty. I mean in the proceedings in California, not with the head of the Department. Yet we observed the other day that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Dawson] was tenacious in giving the War Department the credit of investigating this abuse, instead of dividing the honor with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] whose resolutions brought the proceedings in this case before the Senate. There are much greater abuses (and I do not justify this one) in that Department, for which the Secretary will get yet greater credit if he eradicates them.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] has stated that the expense of the quartermaster's department in California the last fiscal year was $827,000, and this statement has gone all over the Union; and when we ask for appropriations that are indispensably necessary, we are met with the argument that the expenditure there has already been enormous. This, as I have shown, has arisen from the unauthorized expenditures in that country, and the abuses that grew out of collecting the civil fund. Can the chairman of the Finance Committee inform me whether we will be called to pass a deficiency bill to pay back the money borrowed from that fund?

Mr. HUNTER. I stated in the remarks I made on Friday, that the quartermaster's accounts were in arrears; they have not been settled, particularly those of California. But, I have been informed by General Jesup, since this bill was reported, that large accounts had come in from California, and that they would no doubt swell the amounts. I do not know the amount; General Jesup could not inform me what it was; and I do not believe that any man can tell the amount.

Mr. GWIN. I differ with the chairman of the Committee on Finance, when he says that the law of 1820 authorizes or sanctions, in the slightest degree, some of the items in these deficiency bills. Sir, I want to know what is to become of this provision of the Constitution of the United States, that—

"No money shall be drawn from the Treasury except in consequence of appropriations made by law."

The chairman of the Committee on Finance has shown that the appropriations made for the quartermaster's department for the year ending 1st of June, 1851, was $3,915,912, and the expenditures of the year, $5,286,124. I should like to know if there is any sanction under the law of 1820 for such a use of the public money, right in the face of this provision of the Constitution? Here is the appropriation, as shown by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, amounting to upwards of $3,900,000, and yet we are told that the actual expenditure exceeds $5,000,000. Now, I cannot see that any law can sanction any such use of the public money in the face of this provision of the Constitution.

I do not believe any law of Congress can authorize an expenditure of five millions, under an appropriation of three millions. I think the Senator is mistaken in his construction of that provision of the law. I think there is a necessity for rigid accountability, and that all subordinate officers, whose expenditures exceed the appropriations, or who fail to make returns, should be dismissed from the public service and disgraced.

I am in the performance of a painful duty, in commenting on these transactions. But that duty must be performed. The extravagant expenditures and lawless acts of Government officers in California, are producing fatal effects upon the best interests of that country. I am mortified to see a disposition in both Houses of Congress to withhold appropriations, and abstain from passing laws of vital necessity to my constituents, under the belief that there is no restraint upon public officers there, and what money is appropriated will be wasted with no benefit to the State or Government. I must expose transactions that give cause for these suspicions, and I will, regardless of the consequences. No portion of the country is suffering as much for the want of legislation as California. All we want is the proper and legitimate aid of the Government, and we will continue to advance with the giant strides of past years to the important position we are destined to occupy in the Union.

Mr. HUNTER. It is not my purpose to make a speech on this matter. I merely wish to correct a misapprehension into which the Senator from California has fallen. I did not say that the act of 1820 would justify the Quartermaster's Department, or any other Department, in departing from the law or violating the law. The section of the law of 1820, to which reference has been made, reads thus:

"That no contract shall hereafter be made by the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, or of the Department of War, or of the Navy, except under a law authorizing the same, or under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment; and excepting, also, contracts for subsisting and clothing the Army or Navy, and contracts for the Quartermaster's Department, which may be made by the Secretaries of those Departments."

I said that this law authorized such contracts on the part of the Quartermaster's Department for subsistence and clothing; and when a contract was made it was for us to say whether or not we should appropriate for it. That was not saying that the money could be drawn out of the Treasury without an appropriation by law. I know that cannot be done. But contracts can be made, and these contracts, according to law, may be made, and good faith will require us to pay them. I said, therefore, in relation to these deficiencies, as far as they have been presented to us by the Quartermaster's Department, we ought to provide for them, inasmuch as they were debts incurred under legal authority, unless it could be shown that any portion of them were contracts in violation of law; unless it could be shown that any portion of these accounts were improper and ought not to be allowed. Whenever that is done, I acknowledge a case is shown in which the appropriations ought not to be made; but until that is done, as the Department has the right to make the contracts, when it presents us these estimates, I see no other course, unless we mean to deny the Army the means of transportation and subsistence, but to make the appropriations, unless we can be shown specific cases of abuse. That is what I said. Not that you could draw money out of the Treasury without appropriations by law, but that there was a right to make contracts for these objects, and that, when contracts were made, it seemed to me good faith required us to fulfill them. I said, the probability was, that they would be found necessary, because I found that the money provided for these objects in the deficiency bill, added to the appropriations already made for the present fiscal year, was less than the actual expenditures for the last fiscal year by something like $900,000. It therefore seemed to me that it would be unsafe to appropriate less than was estimated for in this deficiency bill. This is the explanation which I have to make.

Mr. GWIN. I think the Senator gave a broader construction to this law a few days ago than he does now. I said, and I say now, that the act of 1820 was passed for the purpose of making contracts for clothing and subsistence, and the building of navy-yards and fortifications that could not be completed within one year. Time was necessary to have competition in the market for subsistence and clothing. But was it ever supposed that this gave power to any Department of this Government to go beyond the appropriations made by law to make contracts to an enormous amount? The law is specific in its character to invite competition, and also that contracts might be made for a large amount of materials, to build a fort or a navy-yard. But all these contracts were based upon the fact that they were to be binding only in the event of an appropriation being made. But this is an entirely different case. The case that I have brought to the notice of the Senate is where an unconditional draft has been drawn upon the Treasury. These are not contracts. This furnishing of money by the Quartermaster's Department, to carry out this Indian expedition, has reference to nothing of this sort. They have spent the money. They have not made a contract to spend the money when the appropriation should be made. They have spent the money and are coming to us to foot the bill. This spending of money and calling on Congress to meet the deficiency is an enormous abuse that is yearly increasing. I do not think the law of 1820 justifies these expenditures; nor do I think it should have any other than a literal construction, such as was put upon it at the time it was passed, which was to get the best market for certain materials for the public service.

Mr. HUNTER. I did not say that this clause would shelter any abuse, or cover any departure from the established laws of the land. I said that this clause gave to the Quartermaster's Department the right to contract for these objects. But when the contract was once made, it seemed to me that it was our duty, in good faith, to provide for it. That was as far as I went. As to the particular item to which the Senator has referred, in regard to the recent transactions with the Indians, I am aware that these matters depend upon an entirely different thing. The matters which he has brought to our notice may be right or wrong, and when the case is presented for action the Senate will judge. According to the showing of the Senator from California, they seem to be wrong. He considers that a great abuse has grown up there. Notwithstanding this abuse, the power to which I referred is a very different thing, and might exist, as it undoubtedly does exist. I have read the law giving this power to the Quartermaster's Department.

Now, in relation to expenditures under this appropriation. The Senator has quoted the appropriations of one year. Does he mean to say that they had no right to expend the balance of outstanding appropriations for the year before? Does he mean to say that they had no right to expend money paid into the Treasury by repayment? But, in addition to that, they expended money by transfer, to which I objected. That was one of the very abuses to which I objected, and which I pointed out. But there is an expenditure over and above that of moneys which were derived out of the civil fund of California. That is another and a larger question—a question which I do not touch—namely, the right of the Government to spend the money raised by military contributions and this civil fund, without an appropriation by law. That belongs to another bill, and to another question entirely. The Senator from California either confounds questions, or he misunderstands me totally. All that I meant to say was, that this power to contract given to the Quartermaster's Department existed, and where a debt was thus made under the law, and in pursuance of the law, I saw nothing left for us but to provide for its payment.

Mr. ATCHISON. I now move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until to-morrow, for the purpose of going into Executive session.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, April 19, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. C. M. Butler.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the motion made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] to lay on the table the motion made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] to reconsider the vote by which the report from the Committee on Printing was recommended to said committee.

TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I beg leave to make an inquiry of the Chair upon a point of order. The Chair will, perhaps, remember, that this week, commencing with to-day, was set apart, especially, for the consideration of territorial business. I have been instructed by the Committee on the Territories, in the absence of the chairman, to suggest to the House, if it be more agreeable to the members, in view of other pressing business, to move the postponement of the consideration of the territorial business to the third week in May.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. The question pending, I think, is not debatable under any circumstances.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is not proposing to debate anything; but merely requests the unanimous consent of the House to allow him to submit a motion that the territorial business—the consideration of which was fixed for this week—shall be postponed until the third week in May.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I do that, because I presume it will be more agreeable to the House, we having before us a special order—the homestead bill—and other pressing business. The territorial business can as well be considered at the time to which I propose to postpone it; and I hope there will be no objection. If there be objection, I shall move to suspend the rules for the purpose of enabling me to submit the motion indicated. I make this motion with a view that it shall be a special order for that week.

Mr. STANLY. Is that motion now in order? The SPEAKER. It is not in order if objected to.

Mr. STANLY. I object to anything other than the regular order of business.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I stated that if my motion was objected to, I would move the suspension of the rules, and, if possible, effect my object in that way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks a motion to suspend the rules is not in order, while the House is in the execution of an order under the previous question.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will remind the Chair, that the previous question is not now pending; and the subject I propose to postpone being, also, a special order for to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, that the previous question is pending upon the motion to print, and will operate until the House decides the motion upon the printing of the report.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will remind the Chair, that this is a motion to reconsider. The previous question has exhausted itself upon the motion to recommit, and on the motion to reconsider it does not, therefore, operate.

The SPEAKER. The decision of the Chair upon that point is, that the previous question continues to operate upon all questions connecting themselves with that report until the last proposition is disposed of; and no motion to reconsider an intermediate vote can be debated.

Mr. VENABLE. I understand the Chair to decide, that the motion having passed under the previous question, it prevents debate upon the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. There can be no debate so long as the previous question is operating upon any one of the questions connected with the subject.

Mr. VENABLE. I had supposed otherwise.

Mr. STANLY demanded the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider; which were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] moved, on Friday last, to reconsider the vote by which the House recommitted to the Committee on Printing, with instructions, the report made by that committee. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, and the question is now upon the latter motion.

The question was then put upon the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 71, nays 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Allison, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Bragg, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Joseph Cable, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Caskie, Chapman, Clark, Clingman, Cottman, Curtis, Dimmick, Doty, Eastman, Ficklin, Floyd, Fowler, Gaylord, Giddings, Goodenow, Grey, Grow, Sampson W. Glancy Jones, Preston King, Kuhns, Mann, Mason, McLanahan, McNair, McQueen, Meacham, Meade, Milson, Molony, Morrison, Newton, Orr, Andrew Parker, Pennington, Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Robbins, Scudder, Smart, Benjamin Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Thurston, Townsend, Tuck, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Washburn, and Woodward—71.

NAYS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Andrews, John Appleton, William Appleton, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Bowie, Bowue, Briggs, Brooks, Buell, E. Carrington Cabell, Chandler, Chastain, Cobb, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Disney, Dockery, Edgerton, Edmundson, Ewing, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gentry, Gorman, Green, Hall, Hamilton, Hammond, Harper, Isham G. Thompson, Ward, Watkins, Addison White, and Williams—84.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. FITCH, previous to the announcement of the result of the above vote, stated that he had paired off with his colleague [Mr. DUNHAM] upon the questions then pending connected with the public printing.

The question then recurred upon the motion to reconsider.

Mr. ORR demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then put, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, John Appleton, William Appleton, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Bowie, Bowue, Briggs, Brooks, Chandler, Chastain, Cobb, Cottman, Cullom, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Disney, Dockery, Edmundson, Ewing, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gorman, Green, Hall, Hamilton, Hammond, Harper, Isham G. NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, Ashe, Averett, David J. Bailey, Bragg, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Joseph Cable, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Caskie, Chapman, Clingman, Conger, Curtis, Dimmick, Doty, Eastman, Ficklin, Floyd, Fowler, Gaylord, Grey, Grow, Sampson W. Harris, Howard, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Stephens, Thurston, Townsend, Tuck, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Washburn, and Woodward—72.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN moved to lay the whole subject upon the table, and upon that motion demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 74, nays 90; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Bowie, Bowue, Briggs, Brooks, E. Carrington Cabell, Chandler, Clark, Cobb, Cullom, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dockery, Ewing, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Gentry, Gorman, Hamilton, Hammond, Harper, Haven, Hebard, Hendricks, Hillyer, Andrew Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, George G. Stanton, Stone, Stuart, Sutherland, Sweetser, Taylor, George W. Thompson, Ward, Watkins, Wells, Alexander White, Wilcox, Williams, and Yates—74.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, Allison, William Appleton, Averett, David J. Bailey, Bragg, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Joseph Cable, Lewis D. Harris, Sampson W. Harris, Hart, Henn, Hibbard, Horsford, Houston, Howard, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Ives, Jackson, Jenkins, James Johnson, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, J. Stephens, Thurston, Townsend, Tuck, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Washburn, Addison White, and Woodward—90.

So the motion was disagreed to.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., their Secretary, notifying the House of the passage by that body of the French spoliation bill.]

The question then recurred upon the motion to recommit the report of the Committee on Printing, with instructions.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. Is the previous question now exhausted?

The SPEAKER. It is not, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. POLK. I would inquire of the Chair, whether it is in order to move to lay the instructions upon the table?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, the instructions cannot be separated from the proposition to refer.

Mr. HOUSTON. In this connection I propose to present a point of order. It is a point which was incidentally brought up on Friday, and is this: I understood the Chair on Friday to decide that the resolution of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Brown] was not divisible; that it was not only not in order to divide the instructions, but to divide the resolution so as to separate the motion to commit from the instructions.

The SPEAKER. That was the decision of the Chair.

Mr. HOUSTON. I raise this point: The motion to commit made by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR,] is entirely distinct from the instructions which were presented by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] and I ask the Chair whether it is not first in order to take a vote upon the instructions, and afterwards upon the motion to commit?

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated to the House on Friday, that the precise motion made by the gentleman from South Carolina was to strike out the motion to commit to the Judiciary Committee, and to insert the Committee on Printing. The Chair also distinctly stated, that the most convenient mode of reaching those propositions would be to take the vote first upon referring with instructions to the Committee on the Judiciary, and secondly to refer to the Committee on Printing, with instructions. The House acquiesced; and in that form the questions were severally put to the House; but the Chair here suggests, that if that decision of the Chair were overruled, and the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama followed, the gentleman from South Carolina would, as a matter of course, have been misled and overreached in his object.

Mr. HOUSTON. The Chair misunderstands me. I do not present the point now for the purpose of excluding the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina. I am willing to take it that his motion is in order—the motion to reconsider, with instructions; but I now ask that the House be allowed first to vote upon the instructions, and then upon the motion to commit. That, it occurs to me, is the usual mode upon a motion to commit, with instructions. If the mere motion to commit, with instructions—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I call the gentleman to order. Debate is out of order.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is too much to have to sit here listening to nothing but debate upon points of order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not debating.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the proposition which the gentleman makes, and is prepared now to give his decision to the House. He is frank to confess that it would be a very convenient rule if the proposition to refer to a committee with instructions could be so divided that the vote of the House be had separately upon the proposition to refer and to instruct. But the Chair has looked at the precedents to some extent upon that subject, and he has also looked at the parliamentary law, neither of which justify, in his opinion, such a decision, however convenient it might be to this body under the operation of the previous question. For instance: If the House refuse to refer at all, every member will see at once that there is nothing left in the shape of instructions upon which the House could act. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish to submit a point of order, upon which I desire the Chair's decision. It is, that the House of Representatives cannot instruct a joint committee created and acting under the law.

The SPEAKER. However fully the Chair might agree as an individual with the conclusion to which the gentleman has come as to the effect of the action of the House, still he is of opinion that it is a matter to be considered by the House, and not to be decided by the Chair as a mere question of order. It is not competent, in other words, for the Chair, in such a case, to determine what the action of the House will be. That is a matter for the House to decide, and not the Chair. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order submitted by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GORMAN. With great respect to the Chair, I am so confident that my point of order is well taken, that I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. ORR. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I inquire of the Chair whether this point was not made on last Friday, decided by the Chair, and acquiesced in by the House?

The SPEAKER. There is no doubt about it. Mr. GORMAN demanded tellers upon the motion to lay the appeal upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana raises the question of order, that it is not competent for this branch of Congress to instruct a joint committee of the two Houses. The Chair decides that that is a point to be determined by the House and not by the Chair—the proposition itself being germane, intimately connecting itself with the subject of printing, which is pending before the House for consideration. The Chair thinks that it is not his province to determine what the effect of the action of the House will be, but that it is the House itself. From this decision the gentleman from Indiana takes an appeal. A motion is made that the appeal do lie upon the table, and upon that motion tellers have been demanded.

Mr. FREEMAN demanded the yeas and nays, which were not ordered.

Tellers were then ordered, and Messrs. LOCKHART and EWING were appointed.

The question was then taken, and there were—ayes 98, nays not counted.

So the decision of the chair was sustained.

The question then recurred upon recommitting the report to the Committee on Printing, with instructions.

Mr. ORR demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. McMULLIN. May I be permitted to inquire what the character of the instructions are?

The SPEAKER. They are those voted upon on Friday last. If it is the pleasure of the House, they will be read.

Mr. McMULLIN. Is it competent to make a motion to amend?

The SPEAKER. It is not, the previous question operating.

Mr. STUART. I wish to make a point of order, and it is this: that the motion to recommit the report to the committee with instructions, is divisible in this way, so as first to take the vote upon the motion to recommit; if that carries, then the vote upon the instructions?

The SPEAKER. If the House refuses to recommit, will the gentleman inform the Chair what becomes of the instructions? Can the House vote upon the instructions.

Mr. STUART. Of course, they fail—

The SPEAKER. The Chair again overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] for reasons which have already been stated.

Mr. STUART. In that case, I wish to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. ORR. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

The question was then taken, and the appeal was laid upon the table.

Mr. EWING. May I inquire whether the motion cannot be divided, and the question taken upon the commitment first?

The SPEAKER. That is precisely the question which the Chair has decided, from which an appeal was taken, and the decision of the Chair sustained.

Mr. KUHN. Is it in order to have the instructions read?

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I object.

Mr. BROWN, of Mississippi. Can it not be done by a vote of the House?

The SPEAKER. How often that motion can be repeated is questionable.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Once a day.

Mr. JOHNSON. I withdraw my objection.

The instructions were then read, by the Clerk, as follows:

“Resolved, That the report on the Committee of Printing be recommended to the Committee on Printing, with instructions to report upon the whole subject, and to recommend, for the adoption of Congress, such a system for the execution of the public printing as they may deem most expedient; and that they especially take into consideration the plan for a printing bureau, for the execution of the work under the supervision of a Government office.”

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I call for a division of the question of instructions.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] ask a division of the instructions themselves?

Mr. STEPHENS. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. That is precisely the point which the Chair has already decided, and from which an appeal was taken, and the decision of the Chair sustained.

Mr. STEPHENS. No, sir, that was as to a division upon committing and upon the instructions themselves. I ask only for the division of the instructions themselves.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STUART] asked in substance precisely the same thing.

Mr. STEPHENS. I did not hear the point of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] but certainly it is in order to ask for a division of any question, if it is susceptible of division. These instructions comprise two very distinct propositions. I call for a division of the instructions.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman indicate at what point the question is divisible?

Mr. STEPHENS. I will, if the Clerk will read the instructions again. I think a division can be made after the word “expedient.”

Mr. FITCH. The object of the gentleman is the same I had in view on Friday last, and which the Chair decided out of order. I think the decision was incorrect, and I hope the Chair will reverse its own decision. I will not take an appeal, nor would I be willing to vote for it if taken.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Read the last branch of the instructions.

The Clerk then read the latter branch.

Mr. STEPHENS. That is a very distinct proposition. Here is what the 53d rule says:

“Any member may call for the division of a question, which shall be divided if it comprehends propositions in substance so distinct, that one being taken away, a substantive proposition shall remain for the decision of the House.”

If the first part of these instructions are stricken out, there will be a substantive proposition left; and if the second is stricken out, there will be also a substantive proposition left.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. It is plain to me, that the first decision of the Chair was right, and that the present one is right. If the second proposition may stand, the first may; and should it be now decided that the instructions can be separated, the proposition of reference itself may also be separated from the instructions.

The SPEAKER. There is no question of that; but the resolution itself is not fairly divisible. But if it were, and contained two propositions entirely distinct, the difficulty would occur again, and the House would be voting first upon the reference, and then upon the instructions. If they cannot separate the two votes, first upon referring to the committee, and then upon the instructions, surely it is not competent for the House to vote first to refer, and then to instruct in part. The Chair must, therefore, overrule the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to state a fact to the Chair, before he overrules the point of order. The Chair will, doubtless, recollect the celebrated resolutions of Mr. Gordon, of Virginia, upon which a motion was made to commit with instructions—

The SPEAKER. As old a member as the Chair is, they were presented before his time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A distinct vote was taken to recommit, which failed, and of course the instructions failed. It has been almost the uniform practice of the House, first to take the question, whether the House will commit the subject or not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WILLIAMS] is aware that the Chair decided the proposition, and an appeal was taken ten minutes since, and the decision of the Chair was sustained. The Chair would be very willing indeed to reverse his own decision; but to reverse his own decision and that of the House so soon, is rather more than can be reasonably expected of him. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well, sir.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I desire, in order to regulate my vote, to ask a question of the Chair. If the reference with instructions is voted down, and we come back to the motion to print, and it is carried, will the report then be before the House freed of the previous question, so as to take any direction that the House chooses to give it?

The SPEAKER. The report was regularly before the House; a motion was made to commit to two different committees, with instructions; a motion was also made to print the report; and upon these several propositions the previous question was ordered. If the House shall refuse to commit the report, the House will then, under the operation of the previous question, be brought to vote upon the proposition to print, alone. When that motion is disposed of, the Chair is of opinion that it will then be competent for the House to make such other disposition of the report as it may see fit.

The Clerk here commenced the call of the roll, but before any response was made,

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, said: I did not understand the ground upon which the Chair placed his decision against the point of order made by myself. Was it upon the ground that the Chair had previously decided the question that a motion to commit with instructions was itself indivisible?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided that it was not competent for the House first to take the vote upon the commitment, and then upon the instructions.

Mr. STEPHENS. So I understood.

The SPEAKER. In that the Chair was sustained by the House. If, therefore, it is not in order, the Chair remarked, to take a separate vote first upon committing, and then upon the whole of the instructions, in the opinion of the Chair, it would not be in order to take a separate vote upon a part of the instructions.

Mr. STEPHENS. Well, I take an appeal from that decision.

The SPEAKER. The Chair further remarked, that the instructions were, in his opinion, scarcely divisible, independent of that objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. They are, certainly, not divisible.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that upon two grounds he may well decide against the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia, and they are these: that if gentlemen will look at the instructions they will see, the Chair thinks, that they are not divisible, as proposed by the gentleman from Georgia; and secondly, that if they were so, it would not be in order under the decision of the Chair, in which he was sustained by the House, to divide the instructions, for the reason that the Chair has decided, and the House has sustained that decision, that it is not in order to take the vote first upon committing, and then upon the whole of the instructions, and that therefore it would not be in order to take a separate vote thus, upon a part of the instructions. Upon these two grounds, the Chair overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. STEPHENS. I shall submit to the Chair a very few remarks on the appeal which I take.

Mr. HOUSTON. The previous question has been ordered.

Mr. STEPHENS. I hope the House will indulge me only for a few moments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be very happy to hear the gentleman if it was the pleasure of the House.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wish to give the Chair my views.

Mr. CABLE. I object to the gentleman proceeding, as it is too late to take an appeal. The call of the roll having commenced, it is certainly too late to take an appeal. If, however, it is not too late, I shall not object to the gentleman proceeding.

The SPEAKER. No response had been made to the call.

Mr. FICKLIN. I desire to ask the Chair a question. If the vote now is in the negative—against committing with instructions—

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have the floor, I believe.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia cannot debate the appeal, and therefore the Chair doubts whether he has the floor.

Mr. STEPHENS. I am entitled to the floor, if anybody is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois rises to a question of order, in this immediate connection.

Mr. STEPHENS. Do I understand that any gentleman objects to my giving a brief explanation of the views I entertain upon this point?

The SPEAKER. It was objected to by a gentleman on the right of the Chair.

Mr. STEPHENS. I thought the objection was made on the ground that it was too late to take an appeal.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If one debates, all will have to debate, and therefore, with all respect to the gentleman from Georgia, I must object to any debate.

Mr. FICKLIN. I now desire to ask the Chair this question: if this vote is in the negative, will it then be competent to commit without instructions, or to make any other disposition of the report that the House chooses?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it would be.

Mr. STEPHENS. I call for the reading of the first clause of the 53d rule of the House, and then for the reading of the resolution down to the point where I ask that the division may take place, and the subsequent proposition commences.

The Clerk read the first clause of the 53d rule, which is as follows:

"Any member may call for a division of a question, which shall be divided if it comprehends propositions in substance so distinct that one being taken away, a substantial proposition shall remain for the decision of the House."

The first portion of the resolution, if divided as proposed by Mr. STEPHENS, would read:

"Resolved, That the report of the Committee on Printing be recommitted to the Committee on Printing with instructions to report on the whole subject, and to recommend for the adoption of Congress such a system for the execution of the public printing as they may deem most expedient."

The second branch of the resolution reads as follows:

"And that they especially take into consideration the plan for a printing bureau, for the execution of the work, under the supervision of a Government officer."

The SPEAKER. It would then read, if the first branch of the instruction was rejected,

"Resolved, And that the committee especially," &c.

Mr. STEPHENS. "That the report be recommitted to the Committee on Printing, and that they especially take into consideration," &c. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CABLE moved to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I ask if this identical question has not been already decided?

The SPEAKER. It has been decided, in substance, some three or four times since we have been engaged on this matter.

Mr. STEPHENS. This question of order has not been raised, as I will show to the House, if I am allowed to proceed. It is an entirely distinct question.

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair and the House decided, ten minutes ago, that it was not competent for the House to vote first upon a proposition to refer, and second on a proposition to instruct. The Chair, therefore, decided, that even if there were two distinct propositions contained in the instructions, if the House cannot vote separately upon the whole of the instructions, they certainly cannot do so upon a part of those instructions. It is, however, for the House to determine the question.

The question was then taken on Mr. CABLE's motion, and it was agreed to.

So the appeal was laid upon the table, and the decision of the Chair sustained as the judgment of the House.

[A message was received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., their Secretary, transmitting a bill which had passed that body to prevent public executions in the District of Columbia.]

The question then recurring on the commitment of the report of the Committee on Printing, with instructions, it was put and decided in the negative—yeas 75, nays 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, Ashe, Averett, David J. Bailey, Bragg, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Joseph Cable, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Caskey, Chapman, Clingman, Conger, Curtis, Dimmick, Doty, Eastman, Ficklin, Floyd, Fowler, Gaylord, Giddings, Goodenow, Grey, Grow, Sampson W. Harris, Howard, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Ives, Jackson, Jenkins, Andrew Johnson, John Johnson, J. Quincy Jones, Preston King, Kurtz, Landry, Mace, Mann, Mason, McLanahan, McNair, McQueen, Meade, Milson, Molony, John Moore, Morrison, Newton, Orr, Andrew Parker, Pennington, Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Rantoul, Robbins, Scudder, Smart, Smith, Benjamin Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Thurston, Townsend, Tuck, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Washburn, Addison White, and Woodward—75.

NAYS—Messrs. Abernethy, Willis Allen, John Appleton, William Appleton, Thomas H. Bayly, Barrere, Bowie, Bowne, Briggs, Brooks, E. Carrington Cabell, Clawson, Chastain, Clark, Cobb, Cullom, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Disney, Dockery, Edgerton, Edmundson, Ewing, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gentry, Gorman, Green, Hall, Hamilton, Hammond, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Hart, Haws, Haven, Hendricks, Hibbard, Hillyer, Horsford, Houston, Ingersoll, James Johnson, Robert W. Johnson, George W. Jones, George G. King, Letcher, Lockhart, Humphrey Marshall, Martin, McCorkle, McDonald, McMullin, Meacham, Miller, Miner, Morehead, Murray, Nabers, Olds, Outlaw, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Polk, Porter, Ross, Sackett, Savage, Schermerhorn, Schoolcraft, Scurry, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Stanly, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stone, Stuart, Sutherland, Sweetser, Taylor, George W. Thompson, Ward, Watkins, Alexander White, Wilcox, Williams, and Yates—89.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HALL. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I raise the question of order, that the vote having already been reconsidered once, the motion of the gentleman from Missouri is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the motion is not in order.

Mr. OLDS. Is it in order now to move to commit without instructions?

The SPEAKER. Not until the previous question has exhausted itself upon the motion to print.

Mr. OLDS. Suppose the House should refuse to print, would it then be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would. The question was then taken on the motion to print, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. VENABLE moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Printing be requested to contract with the lowest responsible bidder, after ten days' notice, for such work as the present contract or has failed, or may fail to execute according to contract.

Mr. VENABLE addressed the House an hour in explanation of his opposition to the action of the Committee on Printing; and in support of the proposition submitted by himself.

[For the speech of Mr. V., see the Appendix.]

Mr. GORMAN. I move to strike out from the resolution the resolving clause, and insert the following:

Resolved, That the report be recommitted to the Committee on Printing.

And upon it I move the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I trust the House will not suffer this—[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"] I trust that they will hear the proposition I design to submit by way of information, if the previous question is not sustained.

Several MEMBERS. Read it! Read it!

The SPEAKER. If not objected to, the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] will be read.

Mr. POLK objected.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is there a proposition now before the House to commit without instructions?

Mr. MARSHALL. I have the floor.

Mr. HOUSTON. That proposition comes up as an amendment. Will the Chair rule that as a simple proposition to commit without instructions? I wish to know that.

The SPEAKER. There have been no instructions to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MARSHALL. Do I understand the Chair to state that there is objection to reading the proposition I wish to offer?

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated so distinctly.

Mr. MARSHALL. Is it competent for the House to have it read?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has his remedy. Does he appeal?

Mr. MARSHALL. I do not appeal, but it is strange.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs leave to state that there is a demand for the previous question, which cuts off all debate and all amendments.

Mr. MARSHALL. I am not designing to reflect upon the Chair at all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] submits a resolution, based upon the report, declaring that the Committee on Printing be requested to let the printing out to the lowest responsible bidder. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] proposes to strike out the whole of that resolution; and he submits a simple resolution that the report be recommitted to the Committee on Printing, and upon that proposition the previous question is demanded.

Mr. ORR demanded tellers on the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. My object is to inquire of the Chair, so that there may be no doubt about it. If the proposition made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] should be regarded as strictly in order, I desire now, before the previous question is ordered, to submit a simple proposition to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. If the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] prevails, the report will be recommitment, without instructions, by a vote of the House.

Mr. McMULLIN. I rise for the purpose of requesting the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] to withdraw the demand for the previous question, so as to permit the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] to be replied to by some one.

Mr. STANTON, of Ohio. I wish to know if the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] to recommit, without instructions, is an independent resolution?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman presented it as an independent proposition.

Mr. STANTON. Then I submit, it is not in order, because a question was pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there was no question pending. The Chair begs leave to state to the House, and for the information of gentlemen upon all hands, that under the joint rule of the two Houses the Committee on Printing has a right to report at any time. The decision of the Chair has been—and about the correctness of which he has no doubt—that the right to report carries with it the right of the House to dispose of the matter reported upon. The Committee on Printing has made a report, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VENABLE] offers a resolution based upon that report, which the Chair thinks is in order. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] moves to strike out that resolution, and insert the one proposing to refer the report back to the Committee on Printing, without instructions; and upon this motion the previous question is demanded, and tellers asked for.

The question was then taken upon the demand for the previous question, (Messrs. Orr and Dawson acting as tellers;) and there were—ayes 83, noes 54.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, and to lay that motion upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. ORR demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. GORMAN.]

Mr. ORR. I ask for the reading of the original proposition and amendment.

Mr. McMULLIN. I object.

The question on reading was put to the House, and carried in the affirmative; and the reading was ordered, and had.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If the House adjourns now, will not this matter come up as the first business in the morning?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. STEPHENS. I move, then, that the House adjourn.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the negative.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question was then taken upon Mr. GORMAN's amendment; and there were—yeas 86, nays 79; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abernethy, Willis Allen, John Appleton, William Appleton, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Bowie, Bowne, Bridges, Brooks, E. Carrington Cabell, Chandler, Chastain, Clark, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Disney, Edmundson, Ewing, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Gentry, Gorman, Green, Hall, Hamilton, Hammond, Harper, Isham G. Harris, Hart, Hays, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Hubbard, Hillyer, Houston, Howard, Ingersoll, Andrew Johnson, James Johnson, G. W. Jones, Letcher, Lockhart, Mace, McCorkle, McDonald, McLanahan, Meacham, Miller, Murray, Nabers, Olds, S. W. Parker, Peaslee, Polk, Porter, Price, Riddle, Ross, Sackett, Savage, Schermethorn, Schoolcraft, Scurry, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Stanly, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Stuart, Sutherland, Sweetser, Taylor, George W. Thompson, Ward, Watkins, Addison White, Alexander White, Wilcox, Williams, and Yates—86.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, Ashe, Averett, Bragg, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, Joseph Cable, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Caslie, Chapman, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, Curtis, Dimmick, Dockery, Doty, Eastman, Edgerdon, Edmundson, Ewing, Fitch, Floyd, Fowler, Giddings, Goodenow, Grey, Grow, Sampson W. Harris, Horsford, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Ives, Jackson, Jenkins, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, J. Glancy

Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Landry, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, McMullin, McNair, McQueen, Meade, Millson, Miner, Molony, Morehead, Morrison, Newton, Orr, Andrew Parker, Pennington, Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Robbins, Scudder, Smart, Smith, Benjamin Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Strother, Thurston, Townshend, Tuck, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Washburn, and Woodward—79.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. GORMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. ORR moved that the House adjourn; and upon that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the House refused to adjourn.

The question was then taken upon Mr. GORMAN's motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider, and it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that I may introduce my resolution.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will allow me, the question recurs under the operation of the previous question upon the adoption of the resolution as amended, which is to recommit the report.

The question was then taken upon the adoption of the resolution as amended, and it was agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution as amended was passed.

Mr. GORMAN. And I move to lay that motion upon the table.

Mr. MARSHALL. I did not intend to take any advantage of the House, and being perfectly satisfied myself that the Speaker yielded me the floor with the understanding that it was done for the purpose of enabling me to introduce my resolution, I will confine myself to my original intention; and I shall ask the indulgence of the House to permit the resolution which I have offered, and which I send to the Clerk's table, to be read. I shall not offer to take any advantage of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GORMAN] to move to reconsider his proposition.

[Cries of "Read it!" "Read it!"]

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed by the Speaker, to whom shall be referred the existing laws and orders on the subject of the public printing, with instructions to report to this House, by bill or otherwise, what amendments to said laws may be expedient in order to insure the faithful and prompt execution of the printing for Congress.

Mr. HALL. I object to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. MARSHALL. I move a suspension of the rules, in order that the resolution may be considered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. I ask if it is in order to move a suspension of the rules when a privileged question is pending?

Mr. MARSHALL. A privileged question is not pending.

Mr. JONES. I understand the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] to make the motion to reconsider the vote on the proposition to commit.

Mr. MARSHALL. I withdraw it.

Mr. JONES. Then I rise to a privileged question.

Mr. MARSHALL rose to a privileged question also. I moved to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] having moved to reconsider the vote, if the Chair recollects aright, the rule places it in the power of any gentleman to demand its consideration at once. Did the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] withdraw his motion to reconsider?

Mr. MARSHALL. I desire to say, that I felt myself bound by a sense of propriety, that instead of availing myself of an opportunity to throw these gentlemen off their balance, or to give way to the motion to adjourn, or address the House for an hour, I stated distinctly, without yielding the floor, that I would not interfere with the object of the gentleman from Indiana, and would not present the motion to reconsider, but would adhere to my own original intent; because I supposed the Chair gave me the floor, expecting that I would carry that intent into effect.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Kentucky as having withdrawn the motion?

Mr. MARSHALL. Certainly I did.

Mr. JONES. I rise to a question of order, and that question is a privileged question, to move to reconsider the vote by which that resolution to commit was adopted.

Mr. MARSHALL. The gentleman must first get the floor for that purpose.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman obtained the floor to move to reconsider the vote, but then he says he withdrew it. I did not so understand him. The Chair did not so understand him; for the Chair inquired whether he did withdraw it or not. If he obtained the floor for the purpose of offering his resolution, or of moving to suspend the rules to introduce it, I rise for the purpose of making a privileged motion, that is, to reconsider the vote on the commitment, and it would take precedence of his motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The usual practice, so far as the Chair recollects, in such cases, has been, that when an individual is upon the floor addressing the House, and wishes to yield to another, he signifies his wish to have his proposition to reconsider entered upon the record, and also his wish for the proposition to be called up at a more convenient season than the one when he is addressing the House. The Chair doubts whether the gentleman from Tennessee can take the floor from the gentleman from Kentucky, for the express purpose of considering a privileged motion.

Mr. JONES. I say, that we arose at the same time.

Mr. MARSHALL. I rise to a question of order. I wish to know how the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] gets the floor from me?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] cannot take the floor from the gentleman.

Mr. MARSHALL. Then, I hope the gentleman will permit my motion to proceed. My motion is, to suspend the rules, in order that I may introduce the resolution which has been already read.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, moved that the House adjourn.

The question was then taken, and the House refused to adjourn.

The question being on the motion to suspend the rules,

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. McMULLIN moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. STUART. I appeal to the gentleman from Virginia to withdraw the motion, and allow the House to fix a time for the consideration of the territorial business. This is the only day on which it can be done.

Mr. McMULLIN. I cannot withdraw the motion.

The question was then taken on Mr. McMULLIN's motion, and it was disagreed to, on a division—ayes 76, noes 86.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question was then taken on Mr. MARSHALL's motion to suspend the rules, and there were—yeas 111, nays 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Allison, Ashe, Averett, David J. Bailey, Barrere, Bowie, Bowne, Brenton, Albert G. Brown, George H. Brown, E. Carrington Cabell, Joseph Cable, Lewis D. Campbell, Thompson Campbell, Carter, Caslie, Chapman, Clingman, Cobb, Conger, Curtis, Dimmick, Dockery, Doty, Eastman, Edgerdon, Edmundson, Ewing, Fitch, Floyd, Fowler, Gentry, Giddings, Goodenow, Grey, Grow, Sampson W. Harris, Hays, Haven, Hebard, Horsford, Houston, John W. Howe, Thomas M. Howe, Hunter, Ives, Jackson, James Johnson, John Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, George G. King, Preston King, Kuhns, Kurtz, Landry, Mann, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, McNair, McQueen, Meacham, Meade, Miller, Millson, Miner, Molony, John Moore, Morehead, Morrison, Newton, Orr, Orr, Andrew Parker, Pennington, Perkins, Phelps, Porter, Powell, Rantoul, Robbins, Sackett, Schermethorn, Schoolcraft, Scudder, Smart, Smith, Stanly, Benjamin Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Strother, Sweetser, Taylor, Thurston, Townshend, Tuck, Venable, Walbridge, Wallace, Ward, Washburn, Watkins, Alexander White, Williams, Woodward, and Yates—111.

NAYS—Messrs. Willis Allen, John Appleton, Thomas H. Bayly, Briggs, Brooks, Chandler, Chastain, Clark, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Ficklin, Freeman, Thomas J. D. Fuller, Gaylord, Gorman, Hall, Hamilton, Hammond, Isham G. Harris, Hart, Hendricks, Henn, Hubbard, Hillyer, Howard, Ingersoll, Andrew Johnson, George W. Jones, Letcher, Lockhart, McDonald, McMullin, Murray, Nabers, Samuel W. Parker, Peaslee, Polk, Ross, Savage, Scurry, Origen S. Seymour, Skelton, Frederick P. Stanton, ton, Richard H. Stanton, Stuart, Sutherland, and Wilcox—48.

So (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended.

The question recurring on the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. MARSHALL moved the previous question.

Mr. STANLY. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to allow me to offer an amendment to that resolution?

Mr. MARSHALL. I cannot. I must insist on the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky to modify his resolution, so that it will be referred to the Committee on Printing?

[Cries of "Oh no," and laughter.]

Mr. STANLY. I ask the consent of the House to have the amendment I wish to offer read for information. I think it will save $100,000. I want to reach that Ritchie claim which we were prevented from investigating last session, and which we shall be called upon to appropriate for at the end of the present session, in all probability.

There being no objection, the amendment was read, as follows:

"And that said committee be directed to investigate the accounts of John H. Trenholm and William M. Belt, for printing executed in their names for the Senate and House of Representatives for the Thirty-first Congress, whether rendered before, during, or since the adjournment of that Congress."

Mr. MARSHALL. I insist on the previous question.

Mr. APPLETON, of Maine, moved that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put and decided in the negative.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. GORMAN. I want to know if I have not a right to move to reconsider the vote by which the report of the Committee on Printing was recommitted, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table?

The SPEAKER. There is a privileged question already pending—the demand for the previous question, but the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to reconsider can be entertained by general consent.

Mr. WASHBURN objected.

The previous question received a second, and the main question was ordered to be now put, and being put, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the report from the Committee on Printing was recommitted, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

Mr. STUART. I wish now to move that the territorial business, which was made the special order for this week, be postponed and made the special order for the third week in May next.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

CLAIM OF TRENHOLM AND BELT.

Mr. STANLY. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to offer, as an instruction to the select committee on the public printing the resolution which I had read just now.

Mr. DEAN moved that the House do now adjourn.

PUBLIC EXECUTIONS.

Mr. FICKLIN. I appeal to the gentleman from New York to withdraw that motion. A bill has passed the Senate directing that all executions in this District shall be private, and not public. There is to be an execution here on Friday next, and it is very desirable that that bill should be acted upon.

Mr. ORR. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York withdraw his motion?

Mr. DEAN. If I withdraw it, will not the first business in order be the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. DEAN. Then I cannot withdraw it.

The question was then taken on Mr. DEAN's motion; which was agreed to,

And the House adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. McMULLIN gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill fixing the salary of members of Congress at a sum not exceeding $1,500 per annum, and their traveling expenses to and from the seat of Government at not more than ten cents per mile.

PETITIONS, &c.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 20, 1852.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. M. BUTLER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, Captain Howard Stansbury's Report of his Exploration of the Valley of the Great Salt Lake; which was read, and ordered to be laid on the table.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. HALE. I perceive by the reading of the Journal this morning that there is an error with regard to the resolution which I offered on the 16th instant, and which was adopted yesterday. The Journal states that it is a resolution to inquire into unauthorized payments to naval officers. It was not so; but to inquire into payments greater than the law authorized. I wish the Journal may be corrected.

The PRESIDENT. The correction will be made.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the memorial of P. H. Watson and E. S. Renwick, praying that an investigation may be made into the unjust charges brought against the Commissioner of Patents for granting E. S. Renwick a patent for an improved railroad chair; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. SEBASTIAN presented the petition of John S. Gibson and Paul A. Swink, contractors for carrying the mail, praying to be relieved from the fines imposed upon them by the Post Office Department; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. PEARCE. I have been requested to present the memorial of a committee appointed at a meeting of the creditors of Texas held in the city of Washington on the 14th of April, 1852, praying the payment of such creditors of the late Republic of Texas as are comprehended in the act of Congress of September 9th, 1850, in the manner proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report of September 13, 1851. As this is a very important memorial, and relates to an important subject, and may involve a large expenditure of money, I ask that it may be printed, and be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question of printing goes to the Committee on Printing under the rule.

Mr. PEARCE. This is a special memorial of claimants against the late Republic of Texas. It is very short, but it embodies a decision made by the Executive, who gave his construction of this matter in 1850, and shows his opinion with regard to the claims of this class of creditors for whom the $5,000,000 was reserved. I think the memorial very important, and I hope it may be printed.

The motion to print was agreed to.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin, presented a petition of citizens of Adams county, Wisconsin, praying the establishment of a mail route from New Haven to Nevada; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, praying the establishment of a light-house board; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FISH presented three petitions of citizens of the State of New York, praying the renewal of Uri Emmons's patent for a planing machine; which were referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. COOPER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the petition of Amos Kendall and John E. Kendall, praying to be reimbursed certain moneys wrongfully paid out by the Government of the United States to the Western Cherokees, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for their relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WADE, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the petition of Sally J. Mathews, praying payment for services of her husband as clerk in the Treasury Department, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for her relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the petition of Catharine Strubing, widow of James Strubing, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHIELDS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the petition of James Harrington, praying to be allowed compensation for loss of time and sickness, caused by melting lead while in the employment of the United States, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. GEYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the petition of F. M. Balster, widow of John Balster, who was killed at Charleston Arsenal while in the discharge of his public duties, praying a pension, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill to grant a pension to the widow and children of John Balster; which was read and passed to the second reading.

The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petitions of Lucie Ann Garner and of William Heumann, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the petition of Joseph Nock, praying remuneration for losses sustained in consequence of the violation of a contract for supplying the Post Office Department with locks, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

CONFIRMATION OF LAND TITLE.

Mr. HALE. The Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the petition of William Thompson, on behalf of himself and other heirs of Joseph Thompson, senior, deceased, praying the confirmation of their title to a tract of land in the State of Missouri, have instructed me to submit a report, accompanied by a bill confirming their title to the said tract.

The bill was read a first and second time, and, by unanimous consent, was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE. The grant mentioned in this bill is a Spanish grant, on which the petitioners have lived since the year 1807. They have some show of title, but that title is not legally perfect, and they come to Congress to ask that it may be confirmed. This bill has already passed the Senate three times, and this is the fifth favorable report that has been made. It has, however, on every occasion, failed in the House of Representatives. The petitioners say that there has not been a court held in their county for the last six years, and the judge of that county says that this is the only case that he has to try; so that if Congress will only confirm this title, he will never need to go into that county at all. [Laughter.]

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which the subject was referred, have instructed me to submit a report, accompanied by a bill to improve the efficiency of the Army of the United States.

The bill was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

Mr. SHIELDS. The report that accompanies the bill embraces some very important provisions in relation to the Army. I move, therefore, that it be printed, and that two thousand additional copies be printed for the use of the Department, and that copies may be sent to the officers in different parts of the country.

The motion to print the usual and the additional copies was agreed to.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will ask that the same number of copies of the bill may be printed with the report. I will state my object. This bill nearly concerns the state of the Army; and changes, to a considerable extent, some of the provisions for its government, now in force. For instance, it abolishes the brevet pay, double rations, and various other matters in detail. My wish is, that we may have the benefit of the experience and suggestions of officers in all parts of the country, in order that we may legislate advisedly and with a due degree of caution. The best mode of attaining that object, in my opinion, is to send these gentlemen copies of the bill and report.

Mr. ATCHISON. I desire to know from the Senator from Illinois what necessity there is for printing the additional copies of the report? I am aware that a vote was taken on the subject a few minutes ago, but am not aware of the contents of the report, and should be glad to hear from the honorable Senator the reasons for printing the two thousand copies.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will state that readily. The report is brief, and the bill itself is brief. But the report refers to different acts which are affected by this bill, which could not be pointed out by this bill itself; and it shows the effect that will be produced if this bill should become a law on previous legislation, and the changes, modifications, and consequences of this act so far as the committee has been able to accomplish that object.

Mr. BADGER. It enables everybody to see what the object of the bill is.

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly; that is the object of my motion. It enables everybody to see at once what is proposed, how much of previous legislation it will change, and what will be the consequence of these innovations to the Army generally.

Mr. ATCHISON. I desire to hear the bill read. I do not even know what the object of it is.

Mr. SHIELDS. Oh, then I withdraw my motion.

VOLUNTEERS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. DAWSON. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the petition of certain volunteer companies in the District of Columbia, have directed me to report a joint resolution, which I ask may be considered now.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution for supplying arms to the Washington Yagers and the Washington Boone Riflemen.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be and he is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be furnished to the Washington Yagers and the Washington Boone Riflemen, two volunteer companies raised and organized in the District of Columbia, the necessary arms and equipments to said companies respectively, under such rules and regulations as may be deemed proper for the safety of such, and for their return to the Department.

The resolution was read a second time, and considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHIELDS. These are two volunteer companies in this District to which the Department cannot furnish arms under the present state of the law. The Department recommends that permission may be given to furnish arms to these companies, and to have the control of them, so as to secure their return.

Mr. WALKER. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Illinois whether it is the ordinary arms which it is proposed should be furnished to these companies, or whether new ones are to be purchased for them.

Mr. SHIELDS. It is the ordinary kind of arms, which the Department has in great abundance.

The resolution was reported without amendment, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CLAIM AGENTS.

Mr. BRODHEAD. The Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill to amend and extend the provisions of an act approved July 29th, 1846, entitled "An act in relation to the payment of claims," have instructed me to report the same back, with an additional section, and one or two other slight amendments, and recommend its passage, as thus proposed to be amended. The first section of this bill makes absolutely void all agreements and powers of attorney entered into for the purpose of prosecuting claims against the United States, if executed prior to the allowance of the claim, and the issue of a warrant for the payment of the same. The second section of the bill makes it unlawful for any officer of the Government, connected with any of the Executive departments, to be in any manner concerned in prosecuting claims against the United States, or furnishing information, except in the proper discharge of his duty, to aid in the prosecution of claims. The third section (which is the additional one proposed to be inserted by the committee) makes it unlawful for any member of either House of Congress to be concerned in the prosecution of any claim against the United States.

The provisions of this bill will, I think, commend themselves to the favorable consideration of the Senate. If it shall be adopted, as the committee propose to amend it, it will be in these words:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all transfers and assignments hereafter to be made of any claim upon the United States, or any part or share thereof, or interest therein, whether absolute or conditional, and whatever may be the consideration therefor, and all contracts or agreements hereafter to be made for allowing compensation to any agent for claims, or other person or persons, for or on account of services performed or to be performed in procuring testimony in support of, or otherwise aiding in obtaining the allowance of any such claim; and all powers of attorney, orders, or other authorities, for receiving payment of any such claim, or any part or share thereof, shall be absolutely null and void, unless the same shall be freely made and executed in the presence of at least two attesting witnesses, after the allowance of such claim, the ascertainment of the amount due, and the issuing of a warrant for the payment thereof.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any officer of the United States, or person holding any place of trust or profit, or discharging any official function under or in connection with any Executive Department of the Government of the United States, who, after the passage of this act, shall act as an agent for prosecuting any claim or claims against the United States, or shall in any manner or by any means, otherwise than in the discharge of his proper official duties, aid or assist in the prosecution or support of any such claim or claims, shall be liable to indictment as for a misdemeanor, and on conviction in any court having cognizance thereof, shall pay a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or suffer imprisonment not exceeding six calendar months, or both, as the court in its discretion shall adjudge, due regard being had to all the circumstances of the case.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted That any member of either Houses of Congress who, after the passage of this act, shall for compensation, paid or to be paid, certain or contingent, act as agent or attorney for prosecuting any claim or claims against the United States, or shall in any manner, or by any means for such compensation, aid or assist in the prosecution or support of any such claim or claims, shall be liable to indictment and prosecution as in the case mentioned in the 2d section of this act.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act, and of the act of July 29th, 1846, entitled "An act in relation to the payment of claims," shall apply and extend to all claims against the United States, whether allowed by special acts of Congress or arising under general laws or treaties, or in any other manner whatever.

Mr. BRODHEAD's motion to consider the bill at this time was not agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DOWNS, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill, providing for the issuing of patents for a certain class of confirmed private land claims in Louisiana; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Also, a bill for the relief of Leonard Dyson, as assignee of Edward McLaughlin, or his legal representatives; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. GWIN, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to grant the right of way through the public lands of the United States for the construction of the following railroads, to wit: From Benicia, by the way of Sacramento City, Marysville, and Shasta City, to Shasta Balle city; from San Francisco to San José; from Sacramento City to Nevada City; from Sacramento City, via Coloma, to Placerville; from Stockton to Moukolumne Hill; from Stockton to Sonora; from Stockton to Agua Fria; from Monterey, via San Juan, to Agua Fria; from San Pedro to Los Angeles; from San Diego, via San Luis Rey, Los Angeles, San Juan, to San José; and from Los Angeles to Agua Fria; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BROADHEAD, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Mrs. Mary A. Davis, widow of Daniel W. Davis; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. GWIN. Pursuant to previous notice, I ask leave to introduce a bill supplemental to the act of Congress, approved March 3d, 1851, to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California.

Leave was granted, and the bill was introduced and read a first time.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that this bill may now have a second reading, with a view to reference. In making this motion, I propose to show its object, and the reasons which induce me to urge that it may be speedily matured into a law.

It is known that under the governments which preceded the United States in sovereignty in California, a number of large claims had their origin, in virtue of which extensive bodies of lands are claimed as private property; and that before and since the change of government, and at the passage of the act of 3d March, 1851, there were titles of this class in which there was so much uncertainty as to what was their limits or position, that it was often impossible for settlers, in locating themselves, to know whether they were on the public lands, or upon what might be claimed under a Spanish or Mexican title. The consequence is, that settlers, innocent of any intention to encroach upon the claims of others, have gone to work and reduced into possession small parcels of land, and made valuable improvements within what it now appears is claimed as the property of others, under titles derived from the former governments. In doing this, they have imparted such additional value to the adjacent property as, in the ordinary transactions of life, might be regarded as a full equivalent for the small parcels they occupy. But I am not willing, even under this view of the case, that the owners of bona fide foreign titles shall lose a single acre of their lands. The object I have in contemplation is to do justice both to the settler and to the claimant under Spanish or Mexican titles. I wish to secure the bona fide settler in the soil covered by his actual improvements, according to the most minute legal subdivisions of the public lands that will embrace his residence and those improvements, and, at the same time, indemnify the Spanish or Mexican claimant by giving him other lands now the property of this Government. I think I know enough of the justice and liberality of the people of our country to satisfy me that a measure like this could not fail to be acceptable to them. I cannot believe that there is an extensive landholder or claimant in the State of California, that would be willing, had he the power, to dispossess and drive off the actual settler from the small piece of land on which he has established himself, and leave him and his family homeless, and without a remedy.

I propose, then, to quiet this class of rights, and to indemnify the parties claiming under written titles; and find that I am not only fortified in this measure by what seems to me an obvious act of justice under the circumstances, but by the policy of Congress in analogous cases. The whole legislation, general and special, of the country, indicates the tender and constant regard which has ever been extended towards settlers, and the liberal provision which Congress has felt to be their due. Hence, from the acquisition of Louisiana and Florida up to the present session of Congress, we find our statute books full of laws for the security of settlement rights. It was my anxious desire, and I made an effort, to have a principle inserted in the act of March 3d, 1851, kindred to that contemplated by the bill I now propose to introduce. The importance of the early passage of that act, and the apprehension that the enactment of it might be endangered for want of time if I insisted on this amendment, then induced me to defer the subject for a more suitable opportunity, knowing that my object could be effected in a supplemental bill. The time is now arrived, when it is necessary and of the highest importance to our people that this bill should be passed.

It is plain and explicit in its provisions, which are few and simple. The board have the power finally to confirm these settlement rights, and issue a certificate of confirmation. This is the mode prescribed in the fourth section of the act of Congress, approved March 3d, 1807, entitled "An act respecting claims to land in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana," by which the commissioners appointed for the purpose of ascertaining the rights of persons claiming land in those Territories had "full power to decide" according to the laws, usages, &c., and for a tract not exceeding a league square; which decision that law declares, "when in favor of the claimant shall be final against the United States, any act of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding;" and the fifth section of that act provides for the granting to a party of "a certificate (confirmation certificate) stating the circumstances of the case, and that he was entitled to a patent for a tract of land therein described;" and then, as proposed in the present bill, makes provision for the survey and the subsequent issuing of the patent. But I come now to consider the policy of Congress, and the reasons for it, in dealing with titles analogous to these. In our early legislation, laws were passed for ascertaining and adjusting titles and claims in the former province of Louisiana; and the sixth section of the act of March 3d, 1811, expressly interdicted the offering for sale of any "tract of land" to which a claim had been duly filed according to law for the purpose of investigation, until the final action of Congress thereon. Notwithstanding this, in the progress and rapid growth of the country, many of these claims, which were indefinite in extent or limits, or difficult of identification, were settled upon by our citizens. Sales of portions of them were made by the officers of the Government, settlement claims were confirmed by Congress as donations, and school sections allotted.

Congress, however, in forbidding the sale of lands covered by foreign titles, reserved the right "to do what should seem to itself agreeable to equity and reason on a full and final survey of the whole subject."

A profound jurist of this country, Mr. Legaré, late Attorney General of the United States, has placed our relation to this subject in a most striking point of view. "We all know," he said, "how impossible it is for the Government to stay, or even regulate the eager rush of our people into the new lands. It accordingly did, in that case, what it has been over and over again constrained to do, as against itself by its own preëmption laws; it sanctioned what it could not prevent, and made compensation to the claimant under a treaty with a foreign government, which it could no more execute literally than it could its own laws with regard to the sale of its domain. I say, claims under a treaty—claims against itself as a Government—claims which no court has any right to enforce, and which bind Congress, only in conscience, and bind the other Departments only so far as Congress has been pleased to acknowledge. For although by referring these claims to the decision of a district court, with an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, they are made, to a certain intent, judicial questions; yet it is only so far as regards their validity as claims, or jura ad rem. The inquiry, is this a good and valid, or a false and groundless claim? is, under these acts, to be answered by the courts; but the subsequent question, supposing it to be the former, how shall it be executed? is one which, under the acts of 1824 and 1836, (read together,) Congress has, in my opinion, in all cases, within the exception referred to above, reserved for its own decision, and in regard to which it has decided that the execution shall be by an equivalent in land."

And what is the provision which Congress made in this matter in the act of the 26th May, 1824, the first law that was ever passed for the adjudication of foreign titles by the court, being "An act enabling the claimants to lands within the limits of the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims?" Why, by the eleventh section, it is declared that, "if in any case, it should so happen that the lands, tenements, or hereditaments, decreed to any claimant under the provisions of this act, shall have been sold by the United States, or otherwise disposed of, or if the same shall not have been heretofore located; in each and every such case it shall and may be lawful for the party interested to enter, after the same shall have been offered at public sale, the like quantity," on other lands.

The justice and constitutionality of this measure necessarily came by appeal in review by the supreme judicial tribunal of the country, and were fully sustained, as we find in the case of Antoine Souldard's heirs vs. the United States. (10 Peters's Reports, page 100.) In that case there was a grant in 1796, by the Lieutenant Governor of Upper Louisiana, for a tract of 10,000 arpens, French measure, many years before we acquired the province from the French Republic, and an actual survey of it was made in February, 1804, being prior to the date in which possession, under the treaty of cession, was taken of Upper Louisiana in behalf of the United States.

By these proceedings the title of the sovereign had been diverted in favor of Souldard, and the tract absolutely detached and severed, by actual survey, from the map of the public lands.

Notwithstanding this, the Supreme Court sustained the principle now contended for, in decreeing the claim of the petitioners to the land "to be a good and valid title thereto, by the law of nations, the laws, usages, and customs of Spain, (under whose Government the title originated,) the treaty between France and the United States, for the cession of Louisiana, and the stipulations thereof;" (with which the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo is almost identical, in terms, in regard to the security of property,) "as well as the acts of Congress in relation thereto." For we find that the court, in decreeing the title valid in that case, did so, except as to certain parts of the lands surveyed for Souldard, which had been sold by the United States; and the court then further ordered and decreed "that the title of the petitioners to all said land embraced in said concession and survey, which has not been sold by the United States, is valid by the laws and treaty aforesaid, and is hereby confirmed to them, agreeably to the said concession and survey." That court, at the same time, in ordering the surveyor general to survey the land, directed him to "certify, on the plats and certificates of such survey to be made, what part or parts of the original survey of such land had been sold by the United States, with the quantity thereof;" and further declared the confirmees entitled to take the area of the interfering sales in other lands.

This act of 26th of May, 1824, for the adjustment of claims by the courts, and which was limited to Missouri and the Territory of Arkansas, was, with certain limitations, extended to Florida, by the sixth section of the act of Congress of 23d May, 1828, "supplementary to the several acts providing for the settlement and confirmation of private land claims in Florida," and, since the same act of 1824 was revived and extended to Missouri, Arkansas, Louisiana, and so much of the States of Mississippi and Alabama as is included in the district or country south of the thirty-first degree of north latitude, and between the Mississippi and Perdido rivers.

Thus we see the principle which Congress has deemed proper to lay down in making the courts the instruments of adjudicating foreign titles, and that the correctness of that principle has been fully sustained by the judiciary.

We will now see what course was pursued by Congress in regard to a large and important class of titles in Missouri, which remained unadjusted after the passage of the act of 1824, and before the enactment of the law of 17th June, 1844, and where Congress retained to itself the power finally to confirm or not. By an act, approved 9th July, 1832, "for the final adjustment of private land claims in Missouri," provision was made for the appointment of a board of commissioners for the examination of French and Spanish titles. The second section of that act required the board to lay before the Commissioner of the General Land Office a report, under a certain classification, of the claims so classed, "stating therein the date and quantity of each; whether there be any, and what, conflicting claims, and the evidence upon which each claim depends, and the authority and powers under which the said claim was granted by the Spanish or French Governor, commandant, or sub-delegate, to be laid before Congress for their final decision upon the claims contained in such first class." A report was accordingly made by the commissioners, on the 27th November, 1833, and communicated to the Senate in January, 1834. In that report the commissioners contemplate a state of things analogous to that for which I now propose making provision. They reported that—"There are numerous cases of lands lying within the French and Spanish claims, belonging to the individuals whose right of claim originated under the Government of the United States; some depend upon purchasers, some upon the laws allowing preemption; some others upon New Madrid locations; and some, again, upon settlement rights which have been conferred."

"Most of those persons have been for a long time settled upon their lands. Their claims being of a bona fide character, derived from the Government of the United States, they went on to improve their lands, making for themselves and families comfortable homes, without any belief that they would ever be interrupted in their possessions. Should the claims reported by the Board be confirmed by Congress in whole or in part, Congress will, in their wisdom, no doubt, notice the suggestions here made, and carve out such a course as will quiet the uneasiness and anxiety which are felt, by doing everything which even the most scrupulous demands of justice could desire."

Congress did notice this suggestion, and, in exercising the power and right of final confirmation in the case of the greater portion of the claims then recommended, declared, in the second section of the act of Congress, approved 4th July, 1836, "confirming claims to land in the State of Missouri, and for other purposes," that if it should be found "that any tract or tracts, confirmed as aforesaid, or any part thereof, had been previously located by any other person or persons, under any law of the United States, or had been surveyed and sold by the United States, this act shall confer no title to such lands in opposition to the rights acquired by such location or purchase; but the individual or individuals, whose claims are hereby confirmed, shall be permitted to locate so much thereof as interferes with such location or purchase" on other public unappropriated lands subject to private sale.

I think I have shown that the principle embodied in this bill is just, reasonable, and proper, and not at all inconsistent with our treaty obligations; that it is sanctioned by enlightened reason, sound policy, by the most deliberate legislation of Congress and solemn adjudications of the Supreme Court of the United States; and, wherever it has operated, it has been fully acquiesced in as equitable and necessary when applied to the most important and widespread landed interest of the country.

In behalf, then, of the hardy emigrants, of the industrious settlers, I ask of you to protect, by law, their settlements, to secure them in their homes, and, in the name of equity and good conscience, where such settlements are bona fide foreign titles, to do justice to that class of my constituents who are the owners of such titles by making them at the same time amply indemnity on other lands.

The bill was read a second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HUNTER. I move that all prior orders be postponed in order that the deficiency bill may be taken up.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator will allow us to take up the apportionment bill. It has been fully discussed, and can immediately be ordered to be engrossed and be put upon its passage.

Mr. HUNTER. It is for the Senate to determine which bill shall be taken up. If I thought the bill alluded to by the Senator from California could be disposed of without further discussion, I would not object to its consideration, but I must insist upon my motion.

The motion was agreed to.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852; the question pending being upon the first amendment of the Committee on Finance to insert the following clause:

For completing the floating dry-dock at San Francisco, California, authorized by act of 3d March, 1851, $330,000.

Mr. HUNTER. This is a sum which was originally estimated for the next fiscal year, and was accordingly placed in the civil and diplomatic bill for the next fiscal year, by the Committee of Ways and Means. But it seems that the dock will be finished sooner than was anticipated. It will be finished before the end of the present fiscal year; and it is recommended by the Department that we should pay it in this bill. The Committee on Finance concurred in that recommendation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to strike out the proviso in the following clause:

For compensation to temporary clerks in the office of the Third Auditor of the Treasury, employed in making out certificates of service from the muster-rolls of 1812, and the several Indian wars, $11,800: Provided, That no clerk shall receive more than at the rate of $1,000 per annum under this act;

And insert in lieu of this proviso, the following:

Which sum shall be distributed among the clerks, according to the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That no salary from this fund shall exceed $1,200 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert the word "temporarily," after the word "employed," in the following clause:

For compensation to extra clerks employed in the office of the Auditor of the Post Office Department, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twelve," in the following clause:

For subdividing fifty townships into sections, at a rate not exceeding $15 per mile, $36,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert the following item:

For compensation of the surveyor general of Arkansas, per act of August 8th, 1846, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert the following item:

For clerks in the office of the surveyor general of Arkansas, per act of August 8th, 1846, $6,300.

Mr. HUNTER. That is in pursuance of estimate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to strike out "five" and insert "six," in the following clause:

For surveys in the mineral region of Michigan, at a rate not exceeding $5 per mile, $20,650.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert the following:

For completing the improvements of New Jersey avenue, north of the Capitol, $9,000.

Mr. HUNTER. This is for the improvement of New Jersey avenue, which runs by the railroad depot. It is in pursuance of an estimate from the Department of the Interior. These improvements have been commenced, and the report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings shows how the money already appropriated has been expended. This amount will have to be expended either during this or the next fiscal year. It is for the Senate to determine which.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert:

For planting and finishing the roads and walks through that portion of the public mall surrounding the Smithsonian Institution, $7,000.

Mr. HUNTER. This item is estimated for by the Secretary of the Interior. It is proposed to appropriate this amount in this bill, instead of appropriating it for the next fiscal year, as this is the planting season.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert this clause:

For deficiency in the appropriation for defraying the expenses of preparing the Opinions of the Attorneys General, $1,220.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, to strike out, in the appropriation for extra clerks in the Pension Office, "one thousand," and insert "twelve hundred," in this proviso:

Provided, That no clerk shall receive more than at the rate of one thousand dollars per annum, under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert the following:

For expenses of establishing the superintendency of Indian affairs in California, authorized by the act of 3d of March, 1852, viz:
For salary of superintendent.....$1,318 68
For salary of clerk.....824 17
For rent of office for superintendent.....1,000 00
For stationery, fuel, lights, &c., for office of superintendent.....275 00
For messenger, expenses, &c.....400 00
For labor, miscellaneous items, and contingent expenses of the superintendency.....275 00

For presents and provisions for Indians visiting superintendent on official business.....$1,000 00
For traveling expenses of the superintendent and the necessary attendants.....2,500 00
For furniture for superintendent's office.....1,000 00
For iron safe for superintendent's office.....1,000 00
For erection of buildings for the use of superintendent.....17,000 00
For erection of warehouse for the storage of Indian goods, and public property.....8,000 00
Provided, That the entire cost of the buildings for the use of the superintendent and of the warehouse aforesaid, shall not exceed the sums hereby appropriated, including the expense of procuring sites.

For United States flags, for distribution among the tribes.....$500 00

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the question will be taken on all the items together, except on those in relation to the erection of buildings. I am opposed to the items in relation to the erection of buildings, and I am in favor of the others.

The PRESIDENT. That course will be pursued. The question will first be taken on the items previous to the one "for the erection of buildings for the use of superintendent."

The question being taken, those items were agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on inserting, "for erection of buildings for the use of superintendent, $17,000."

Mr. GWIN. I think I can give good reasons why this item ought to pass. If it does not, we shall have to pay that amount in rent nearly every two or three years. This is to cover the entire expense of putting up the buildings. We know that rents in that country are enormous. In addition to this, the superintendent ought to be entirely removed from the cities. He ought to have his residence where the Indians will not be tempted by the dissipation of the cities. He must have around him Indians all the time; because he must become familiar with them, and they must become familiar with him. It is absolutely necessary that the superintendency should be located at some point where he can have them out of the reach of vicious white men.

As I said before, if we do not pass this item, we will have to pay a large rent. The Government is now paying, for the custom-house, appraisers' stores, United States courts, and the post office at San Francisco, about $120,000 a year for rents. In this item the whole expense of buildings is limited to the $17,000 appropriated.

It seems, also, to be absolutely necessary that there should be a store-house erected. If the Indians there are to be treated as they are elsewhere, we must have a place to put the articles that are to be given to them. I think it would be economy to put up these buildings at once. The Department has estimated for them, after full examination.

Mr. HUNTER. In relation to the erection of these buildings, my impression is, that we had better postpone it until we know where the buildings are to be located—until we can have some accurate information on the subject. They may be located at a place where the natural resources of the country would enable us to build them much cheaper than is here proposed. I believe there was an estimate for a store-house for the Indian agent in Oregon, which was stricken out in the House of Representatives for some such reason as that, I presume. The amount, however, is not very large.

Mr. GWIN. The site has already been indicated by the superintendent. He has been instructed to select the site. I think the best thing to be done would be to erect the buildings at once, and thus get clear of the payment of rent. This proviso fixes a limitation beyond which it cannot go; and with that limitation the buildings can be put up at once.

Mr. CASS. I would ask the honorable Senator from California where the location of the superintendency is proposed to be?

Mr. GWIN. The superintendent has been instructed to make the location; and he will report in favor of a site near the confluence of the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers with the Suisun bay, near the head of the bay of San Francisco—a point where he can have immediate communication with the whole of the interior, by the rivers and the country up and down the coast by San Francisco bay. It is the best location which can be pointed out. It removes the Indians entirely from all the towns, while it is within two and a half hours run by steamboat of San Francisco.

It is at the mouth of two large rivers, where agents and messengers can be sent north and south, at any time. It is remote from all the towns, and is cut off by the bay from San Francisco, Benicia, and all those places where the Indians can get liquor, and become dissipated.

Mr. CASS. The question, to my mind, is about expending so large a sum of money for so temporary a purpose. It seems to me impossible that that can long be a station for the Indians. In a very short time, perhaps, they will pass away from there; and, therefore, I doubt the expediency of appropriating so large a sum for so temporary a purpose.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator is right, when he says they will soon pass away.

Mr. CASS. By their passing away, I mean going from the white settlements.

Mr. GWIN. There is a vast number of Indians in that country. Their number is variously estimated at from fifty thousand to seventy-five thousand. The point of which I have spoken is the most convenient to have communications with all the Indians. It is the very best place which can be selected. These rivers are well known to those acquainted with the geography of the country. One runs north, and the other south, and they come together at this particular point, and enter the Suisun bay. The Indians are on the sources of these rivers, and up and down the Pacific coast, which makes this location a very favorable one.

It is said that this must be a temporary establishment. Why, the superintendency in Missouri has been in existence for thirty years, although the Indians are passing away from that locality in a great degree. I am perfectly confident that their buildings ought to be made permanent, and that this appropriation ought to pass now, in order that the superintendent may be enabled to bring the Indian chiefs around him, to get them accustomed to the habits of our people.

Mr. CASS. I doubt the expediency of bringing the Indians there, at all. My experience has led me to doubt the expediency of holding out inducements for them to come within the white settlements. I doubt whether it does any good. If these Indians have any business to do, they always have some of their principal men to do it. I doubt very much the expediency of bringing large bodies of them in contact with the whites. I do not see any advantage to be gained by it; and I can see manifest injury which might be accomplished.

Mr. GWIN. It is not intended to bring large bodies of Indians to the superintendency, but merely to bring the principal men, who are to have intercourse with the superintendent. There are superintendencies established on a similar principle in other parts of the country. I am just informed that the Superintendent of Indian Affairs in Missouri has intercourse with Indians to the Rocky Mountains; but yet he has an office in St. Louis. I have said before, that the position which I have indicated, is the most convenient position in the State. I think, when located there, the buildings ought to be permanent. Unless you make this appropriation, the superintendent will be forced to go into the towns and hire houses.

Mr. ATCHISON. I do not know whether the object of this appropriation is to erect a dwelling-house for the superintendent, or merely to erect an office for his use.

Mr. GWIN. The superintendent must have a house to live in.

Mr. ATCHISON. In the city of St. Louis, I believe that even up to this hour the Government pays rent for offices. The superintendent has his own house. He pays for his own house.

As for the use of a warehouse, that must only be a temporary building for storing such goods as may be intended for the use of the Indians in payment of annuities and presents. It will only be temporary. Those things might, perhaps, as well be landed at San Francisco, and from that point distributed north, south, east, and west, to the Indians all over the State. I do not see the necessity of the erection of buildings for a warehouse. But, at the same time, I submit to the better knowledge and greater experience in California affairs of the Senator who represents that State. For my own part, I am willing to vote the appropriation. I am willing to take his word and his judgment in regard to it.

Mr. HALE. I have one objection to this. If you pass this year an appropriation of $17,000 to build a house, next year you will have to make an appropriation of $17,000 more for furnishing it; and we shall have to make an additional appropriation every year for furniture. I have had occasion to look at the estimates, on which are supposed to be founded the authority for buying furniture, and I find that they are very indefinite indeed. The furnishing of houses comes in under the head of "contingent expenses," as "furniture for Government houses," without telling what they are. I am perfectly willing to give to California everything she wants; but I do not want to build houses when I know what the result will be, for the next thing will be to furnish it; and furniture will not last a great while, and replenishing it will be very expensive. It would be better for us to pay a liberal rent. It would not cost near so much as building a house. These remarks apply to the dwelling-house. I know nothing about the necessity for a warehouse.

Mr. RUSK. I dislike to oppose this amendment. I know the difficulties under which California labors, in relation to the Indians, and I would be willing to vote a large and liberal sum to relieve her from those difficulties. But I think this is beginning entirely at the wrong end, and, so far from relieving, my deliberate opinion is, that it will but increase those difficulties. I believe the superintendent of Indian Affairs in California gets about $4,000 or $4,500 a year. And I see in this bill an appropriation of $324 17 for the salary of a clerk to the superintendent. And I see an appropriation of $1,000 for rent of office for superintendent; and for stationery, fuel, lights, &c., for office of superintendent, $275; for messenger, expenses, &c., $400; for labor and miscellaneous items, and contingent expenses of the superintendency, $275; for provisions for Indians visiting superintendent on official business, $1,000; for traveling expenses of the superintendent and the necessary attendants, $2,500; for furniture for superintendent's office, $1,000; for iron safe for superintendent's office, $1,000; for the erection of buildings for the use of superintendent, $17,000; and for the erection of a warehouse for the storage of Indian goods and public property, $8,000.

Now, this looks to a permanent establishment. If we build houses, at the public expense, for the Indian superintendent in California, it ought to be done everywhere else. Our Indian affairs have grown up to an enormous expenditure. Unfortunately, the number of agents that we have appointed, have not improved the condition of the Indians—rather the reverse. The principal thing, in my opinion, that a superintendent in California will have to do for some years, if he discharges his duty, will be to travel about and visit those Indians. They are not going to come to him. A few of them who will learn the tricks of cheating, and getting blankets and presents of various kinds, may go to him, while those who commit the depredations, will not come near him. Yet here we are to make a permanent establishment, at an enormous outlay of money. If we do it in this instance, we must do it elsewhere. The extent of our territory is very large. There are a great number of Indians in New Mexico; and if we make this appropriation, we must, as a matter of course, make like appropriations for permanent buildings, iron safes, and everything of that description, for the superintendency of Indian affairs in New Mexico. It will be the same case in Oregon, and it will be the same case in Texas.

The great objection which I have to all these gross appropriations, is this: I do not know of any officers who have improperly exercised their powers upon this subject; but here is a temptation to speculation and fraud upon the Government. Here is an appropriation of $17,000, to build a house. Well, you tempt a man to make false returns. You tempt him to build a house for five or ten thousand dollars, and falsify his accounts, by charging the Government the amount appropriated. These things are complained of. I know nothing in regard to them. But it is, in my opinion, an ill-digested plan for the expenditure of a large amount of money, without the necessary checks; and so far from accomplishing the object of keeping the Indians quiet, and preventing depredations on the white settlements, is inclined the other way, to increase them.

Mr. GWIN. I do not wish to detain the Senate about this matter, but the Senator from Texas is altogether mistaken when he says this is an ill-digested plan. It has been most thoroughly examined in the Department of the Interior, and there is no doubt that it will cost as much in a few years for the payment of rent as it is proposed to pay for constructing these buildings. This item is based on an estimate for these buildings. They are absolutely necessary. If the superintendent is compelled to rent an office in San Francisco, I presume he cannot get it for less than $500 a month. In addition to that, you must have store houses for the purpose of keeping the goods intended for the Indians. The rents alone, if the Government is to pay rent, will amount to this sum in two or three years. If the Senator is informed of the cost of labor and materials in that country, he knows that it will take this amount of money to put up such a building as will be required for the public business; and I wish to say to the Senate that the location of the superintendency ought to be permanent. Every Indian superintendent and agent in the country has a residence furnished by the Government. Persons who are appointed to these offices cannot sleep on the ground, and live in tents, as the Indians do. The superintendent of Indian affairs in California has an administrative examination of all the accounts of the agents and sub-agents in that State. He has the power of removing them instantly, and the controlling power over the whole management of Indian affairs there. If the Senator from Texas will look into this very bill, he will find an appropriation for completing buildings for the superintendency in Oregon. There is not one superintendent in the United States, with the exception of Missouri, where rents are cheap, but has some such building. The superintendent of the Indians, west of Arkansas, has a commodious residence prepared for him. These buildings are required, if you intend to give any efficiency at all to the office. It is not proposed that any tribe of Indians shall come to the superintendent here, but the chiefs will visit him at his home; and when he wishes to see the tribes, he will go to them. I wish him to travel extensively. Provision is made in this bill for his traveling expenses; but at the same time he ought to have a permanent office; and if he is to pay annuities to the Indians to get them to remove, he ought to have a safe in which to keep the money to pay them. This estimate was made by the Department after a full examination into the case. I know that it is economizing the public money to put up buildings at once.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The next amendment is to insert in the bill the following:

For the erection of a warehouse for the storage of Indian goods and public property, $8,000: Provided, That the entire cost of the buildings for the use of the superintendent, and of the warehouse aforesaid, shall not exceed the sums hereby appropriated, including the expense of procuring sites.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The next amendment is to insert the following:

For United States flags for distribution among the tribes, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The next amendment is to strike the following clause from the bill:

For payment to the Seneca Indians of New York, for moneys wrongfully withheld from them by an agent appointed by the Government for the management of their affairs, as per report of Thomas B. Stoddard, commissioner, selected by the Secretary of War, to make the requisite investigation, pursuant to the direction contained in the fourth section of the act of 27th June, 1846, making appropriations for the Indian department, $28,505 50: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby required, upon payment of the money herein specified, to take such further steps, if any may be necessary, as shall enable the United States to recover the amount due from said agent.

Mr. ATCHISON. I trust the Senate will not agree to that amendment. This appropriation has been frequently reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, in the shape of a separate bill. It is now recommended as one of the estimates—as a portion of the deficiency—by the Secretary of the Interior. I will state the facts of the case briefly. In 1836, 1837, and 1838, there were certain funds belonging to the Seneca Indians, a portion of which were to be paid by an agent, as the agent of this Government, to them. He reserved them in his hands. He never did pay them over—he never accounted for them. There were other funds—not, perhaps, funds of the Government of the United States, but the funds of the Indians—that were placed in his hands—under his control—for their use, and for their benefit, as had been the case with the former agent for that tribe of Indians. This agent's name was Stryker. He embezzled this money—defrauded and cheated the Indians out of it, and never paid them a dollar. An act of Congress was passed, authorizing the President to appoint a commissioner, who should go and examine into the matter, and ascertain whether the agent Stryker had embezzled the money of the Indians, and withheld it from them; and if so, what was the amount. The name of the agent thus appointed was Stoddard. He went, instituted an investigation into the matter, and made a report; and he found that the sum of $28,000 proposed here to be appropriated; was due to the Indians—that they had been swindled out of it by Stryker. Year after year frequently, since I have been a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, this matter has been brought before us, and I believe there was never any dissent to the appropriation in the committee. The House of Representatives have now made this appropriation a part of the deficiency bill, and sent it to the Senate, and the Committee on Finance propose to strike it out, which I hope will not be done. I have thus stated briefly the sum and substance of this matter.

Mr. PEARCE. I recollect that two years ago, when the Indian appropriation bill was up for the consideration of the Senate, an amendment, appropriating this sum of money, was offered by a then Senator from Delaware, the Committee on Finance having refused to insert it. They then examined into it. I was then familiar with all the papers and facts. I will not profess to be so now. But I have a general recollection of the ground upon which the Senate, very deliberately and with a full argument of the case, rejected it. This man Stryker, it is true, was the Indian agent. He received and embezzled the funds of the Indians; but it was not as Indian agent that he did it. Besides being the Indian agent, he was the agent of the Seneca tribe of Indians; and this sum of money consisted but in small part of the moneys which he received from the Government, and in a very considerable degree of annuities due the Indians from the State of New York, and from other sources. I do not recollect the amounts, but my general recollection is, that a very large amount of the funds which he thus embezzled never came from the Government of the United States in any shape whatever.

Now, if the Government of the United States is liable for anything, it is liable only for so much of the embezzled funds as were derived from it and paid into the hands of Stryker, as Indian agent. He was constituted by the Indians their agent, and held their moneys; if it had not been for that, he would have been obliged to pay over, and no doubt would have done so. But they trusted in him. Besides the trust reposed in him by the Government of the United States, there was a special, private trust reposed in him by the Indians themselves. He was their constituted agent for all these purposes; and in the capacity of their agent he committed the embezzlement. I dare say the Senator from Kentucky must remember that when this subject was formerly under discussion the question was asked, if anybody could say that the bond of this agent would be responsible for any of the peculations. I do not recollect that any member of the Senate had the least idea that it would; and we thought that if his bond would not be liable to the United States, surely the United States were not liable to the Indians. I was willing to admit that, if the agent of the United States had not paid over the moneys which the United States had placed in his hands, there being no other circumstance to enter into the consideration of the case, then the United States ought to make them good. But when the Indians had made him their agent to hold their money, and he was to account to them, he was accountable to them, and the United States Government could not be called upon, and ought not to pay the money. And most undoubtedly, if the United States are responsible at all, they are responsible only for the portion of the funds which went into Stryker's hands as Indian agent of the United States; but this provision of the bill does not so discriminate, and, therefore, I think it ought not to pass.

Mr. MILLER. I was in favor in the committee, of retaining this part of the bill. There is no doubt of the fact, that this Indian agent received the money for the Indians; that he has never paid it over to them; that he defaulted, and that they have lost the money. It also appears by the report which was made by the commissioner appointed, under the authority of law, to the War Department, that the money was received by this Indian agent in his official capacity; that it was paid to him as Indian agent, and, as such, to be paid over to the Indians. It may be that he was constituted by them as their agent. But we acknowledged him also as our agent in the transaction of the business upon which he was sent; and it is stated in one of the reports of the Secretary of War that it has been the policy of this Government, in treating with the Indians, to make all the funds, not only which they are to receive from the United States, but which they have been receiving from the different States, under contracts with them, pass through the hands of our agents, so that no other person should have, at any time, dealings with the Indians. It can be shown, if any gentleman has the report, that the money was paid into the hands of the agent, not at the mere request of the Indians, but that it was under the authority and direction of the Secretary of War; and that although the Indians consented to it, yet it was because that direction was given to the money by the Government at Washington. It may be true that Stryker was not technically the agent of the United States in this matter, that he may have been constituted, by the consent of the Indians, to receive the money, yet they trusted in him because this Government trusted him—they trusted him with the money because he was our agent; and if our agent committed default, and pocketed the money, surely the Government is legally and morally bound to the Indians for that money. That is the case here; and not only that, but the Secretary of War, in his estimates, has recommended the appropriation. Before the report of the commissioner was made, there was a doubt about the matter; but on that report being made, the Secretary of War estimates this as a part of the expenses of the Government, and recommends it to be passed. Under these circumstances, it appears to me that although the agent may not have been technically the agent of the Government in this matter, yet he was recognized as such, the Indians understood him as such; and therefore we are bound to pay the money.

Mr. SEWARD. I think when the Senate come to examine this subject they will find that this is the very last appropriation in the bill which ought to be struck out. It is well known, that from the foundation of this Government the United States have assumed the office of guardian and protector of the Indian tribes. As such they, a few years ago, extended their guardianship and care over the Seneca Indians of New York, who were the remains of the ancient and renowned Six Nations, who had, until that period, been under the guardianship of the State of New York, living independent of the control and supervision of the United States. The Government appointed the agent Stryker, to exercise the office of superintendent, which office is that of actual guardian for the interests and affairs of the Indians, nothing more and nothing less. They deputed to this person the office of taking care of the affairs and interests of this relic of the Six Nations. Having invested him with their confidence, and with the possession of the funds which were to be paid by the United States to the Indians, he was in possession of the highest confidence of the Government. The Indians finding such confidence reposed in him by the United States, necessarily, as the wards of the United States, also reposed in him their confidence, and intrusted him with their money—money which somebody must keep for them; and who so worthy as he? The funds which thus came into his possession by virtue of the confidence which they yielded to him, he abstracted, and after the most strenuous efforts on their part they were unable to obtain any compensation or indemnity. They came to the Government of the United States and asked relief. The Government instituted an inquiry into the facts, through the agency of Mr. Stoddard, thus implying that if it should be found that the funds which the Indians had intrusted to Stryker, by virtue of his character as the agent of the Government, had been embezzled by the public agent, the Government would indemnify them. The report was complete and satisfactory, and the Secretary of War—to whose province the superintendency of Indian affairs then belonged—recommended the appropriation. It seems to me, therefore, that this is a case in which, whether you consider the nature of the subject, or the relations of the parties, the Government of the United States will not plead specially so as to exempt themselves from the legal obligation to pay these moneys, but that they will, in the spirit of the relation which they hold towards the Indians, and in the discharge of their responsibility as guardians, indemnify the Indians for the money they have lost by the act of an agent who had obtained their confidence, at the instance of the Government of the United States.

Mr. COOPER. It seems to me that there can be no difficulty whatever in this question. If the facts be as stated by the Senator from New Jersey, viz: that the agent Stryker received the money as agent of the United States, then the United States are bound to pay the Indians. If it be regarded simply as a legal proposition, under that state of the facts the United States are liable to the tribe. It does not matter at all that Stryker was the agent of the Indians as well as of the United States. In a court of justice, if it were a question between individuals, if the facts are as stated—and if my memory serves me right the Senator from New Jersey is correct in the statement he has made of them—the Government would be liable. It placed the money in the hands of the agent; to be paid over to the Indians; the agent embezzled the funds; he embezzled them, not as the agent of the Indians, but as the agent of the United States. It was the duty of the Government to see that the funds took the proper direction, and reached the proper hands, and it was its default that they did not. Now, I repeat again, in a contest between individuals, the facts being as stated, the law would be with the Indians, independent of that humane, generous policy which this Government has always thought it its duty to pursue towards the helpless and ignorant Indian tribes. I can see no reason why this money should not be paid over. If the agent received it as the agent of the Indians, and reaped to the Government for it as such, then, of course, in a legal point of view, the Indians, whose agent Stryker was, would be the losers; but if, on the contrary, he received it as the agent of the Government of the United States, it remained in his hands as its agent, and the loss must be the Government's, and not the Indians.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I dislike to prolong this discussion, and should not do it but for the reason that there are some facts that were submitted to the consideration of the Committee on Indian Affairs, which had this subject under discussion, which seem to have escaped the attention of the different Senators who have spoken upon it. The objections which this claim has heretofore encountered, proceeded on the ground that the agent of the United States received this money, not in his character as a United States agent, but as the agent of the Seneca tribe of Indians, selected by them as such, and upon other considerations. If that proposition were true—which it does not appear to be in point of fact—this claim would, of course, be entirely different in its character, and it would be the mere ordinary consequence of misplaced confidence on the part of the Indians, a mischief which we would be under no obligation to redress for them. Such, however, was not the fact. The Seneca Indians, receiving some of these moneys from the United States, and some by way of annuities from the State of New York, and from a private land company, had, from a remote period, no other agent for their administration than those successively appointed and indorsed by the United States, refused, in terms, to intrust them to the United States until he was so ordered, authorized, and his obligation to do so, to receive them, recognized by the United States. I call the attention of the Senate to two letters, which were written from the War Department to Mr. Stryker, recognizing his obligation to receive the money from the previous agent of the United States, and to make a certain disposition of it on the part of the Seneca Indians:

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 11, 1819.

SIR: I am informed by Mr. Parish, sub-agent to the Six Nations, that there are in your possession bonds and mortgages which belong to the Seneca Nation, and that you are ready to give them up to him, whenever he produces an order from this Department to that effect.

This is, therefore, to request you to deliver to Mr. Parish all such bonds and mortgages, and other property belonging to the Six Nations, and likewise all public property belonging to the agency you lately filled, which may remain in your hands.

I am, &c.,

J. C. CALHOUN.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS, August 7, 1832.

Sir: In addition to the further evidence and explanation required of you by a letter forwarded this day from the office of the Second Auditor, you are directed to place in the hands of your successor, Mr. Stryker, whatever amount you may now hold by nature of your office of agent, as the trustee of the Indians, and if you have invested any portion of the amount you have so received, you will transfer to the same gentleman, the securities upon which such investment has been made. His receipt will be required as your voucher, upon which the amount now charged to you will be passed to your accounts.

I am, &c.,

ELBERT HERRING.

JUSTUS INGERSOLL, Medina, New York.

The letters just read were two letters directed from the War Department to the sub-agent, at the time Mr. Calhoun presided over that Department. They show, conclusively, not only that he received the money by the express directions of the Government, but that he was directed to charge himself with the amount of money received, and that the Department was to settle with him for these funds, and with no other person whatever. The letter alludes, also, to money received from the State of New York, denominated trust funds. His authority embraces not only the trust funds, but also those which were the annuities from the United States to the Seneca Indians. Our relations, indeed, with those Indians have never assumed their full capacity to manage their own affairs, but have been those of mild and paternal authority and guardianship on one side, and confidence and dependence on the other. Thus, all their national funds, whether by law or usage I cannot say, had been uniformly invested and administered by our agents, and as uniformly turned over to their successor, until this sweeping embezzlement left nothing but a claim upon our justice. This must leave the fact beyond question or dispute as to the authority which this Government exercised, and the obligation of the sub-agent to receive them in consequence of the orders of the Secretary of War of the United States.

There is but one other fact to which I wish to refer. It is a fact showing that, in consequence of what has been stated, and in consequence of subsequent legislation upon the subject, our investigation is confined to a much smaller compass than Senators have supposed. If it is in order to advert to the past legislation of the other House as well as this, it can be shown that, in 1846, this subject was before Congress, and was the subject of disagreement between the two Houses. The one insisted on the insertion of this article, and the other that it should be expunged; and the result was—a compromise recommended by the committee of conference—the enactment of the fourth section of the act of 1846, referring the whole matter over to the investigation of a commission, to be instituted under the authority of the Department of War. That commission was authorized to inquire what amount of moneys had gone into the hands of the agent, and what amount thus received by him had been embezzled or withheld from the Indians; in other words, the real extent of the defalcation. This investigation was a very searching one, and the report very voluminous; and it showed the true amount to be due to the Indians, and embezzled by the agent, to be that for which an appropriation is proposed. In this manner was the doubts of Congress, in 1846, removed. The question which it referred to that commission covered the whole controversy, and their report leaves us no other duty but to appropriate the amount, as was contemplated by that act of Congress.

Thus, sir, you perceive that the facts of the case have already become an adjudicated matter; and it appears to me, that the subject narrows itself down to the smallest compass, and that the question really before us is, Whether the amount contained in the bill is the result of the investigation of the agent of the Government authorized for that purpose? I will not trouble the Senate with any further remarks upon the subject, than to express my hope that the amount may not be struck out.

Mr. PEARCE. I have found the report to which I alluded. From this, it appears that the claim consists of various items. The first is one of $7,143, known as the Phelps & Gorham annuity fund. This money the Indians obtained by the sale, in 1788, of some lands to persons of that name.

The Government had no connection with the sale, but the agent of the tribe had always managed it. While Stryker was agent, it was made use of by him, and although he mortgaged his property to them to secure it, yet they never obtained any portion of it, the property being exhausted by prior liens or mortgages. The annuity on this was $500 per annum, from 1837 to 1850, inclusive; in all, $7,500 more.

The next item is, for the amount of an annuity of $500 per annum, payable by the State of New York, under an arrangement made in 1815, which the same agent received for two years, 1837 and 1838, but never paid over to the Indians.

The third item arose in this way: In 1838, the Indians had some difficulty in relation to the distribution of part of the annuity due from the United States, "in consequence of a change in the established custom of paying such money to the chiefs, to be disposed of by them, by distributing the annuity money directly and equally among the heads of families." The money, at first, was deposited in the bank of Buffalo, to the credit of certain chiefs, who drew it from the bank and took it to the council house, and it was afterwards re-deposited in bank to their credit. They were induced by Stryker to let him have it for distribution, and then he embezzled it. This is $3,482 50.

The last item is for moneys deposited by Polly Jameson, a wealthy woman of the tribe; it was her own money—no part of any annuity or Government fund.

The only passage in the report showing the charge which the agent had over these affairs, says:

"This superintendent or agent has always had charge of, and been required by his appointment and instructions to exercise a careful supervision over all their affairs and interests;" and "the Indians have ever looked up to him as a safe depository of their interests, and as a person to be confidently relied upon in all matters connected therewith."

I suppose no doubt that his official character gave him credit with and the confidence of the Indians. They were induced by his official character voluntarily to place their funds in his care; and they authorized him to receive their dividends from the bank in the same way as Mrs. Polly Jameson had been induced to place her individual funds in his hands; and I think the Senate must decide, as they did three years ago, that these funds were not placed in his hands as the agent of the Government, and that, therefore, the Government is not responsible, unless we mean to affirm that the United States guaranty the fidelity and responsibility of all Indian agents to whom the various tribes may choose to intrust funds of which the Government has no knowledge, and over which they have no rightful control.

Mr. ATCHISON. The Senator from Maryland has stated the facts pretty nearly as they exist. A portion of the funds in the hands of this agent were the funds of Indians, intrusted by them to his care. They made him their trustee. Now, I take the broad ground that he is responsible as agent of the United States for any default that he may have made when acting in that capacity; and that the Government is bound to recognize any breach of trust to the Indians; for when you send an agent or a sub-agent to an Indian tribe, you indorse his honesty, and you guaranty all the losses that the tribe may sustain by means of his villainy or his fraud, and should be responsible for them. Now, the Government of the United States sent this man (Stryker) to take charge of these Indians, both in regard to the interests of the Government, and the interests of the Indians themselves. If, then, they could not place confidence in him, in whom could they place confidence? Their great father sent them this man, giving him a letter of credit, fully indorsed; and I hold that the United States is responsible for all frauds perpetrated on that tribe by him; and not only on the tribe, but on individuals of the tribe—just as if I gave a letter which was fraudulent, or calculated to deceive the friend to whom it was addressed. I hold that this doctrine as applied to Indian agents has peculiar force.

Mr. DAWSON. Will the Senator from Missouri answer me one question in relation to this matter? I see, among the letters dated 1832, that this agent was instructed to procure the assent of the Indians to act as their agent; and to obtain it in writing as a power of attorney; which he was instructed to deposit in the proper office in Washington. Is it not so?

Mr. ATCHISON. I am not able to answer the question.

Mr. DAWSON. What I want to know is, whether the instructions were complied with, and whether the power of attorney was obtained, and placed here as required?

Mr. ATCHISON. I am not able to say; but I think that the letter read at the Secretary's table sustains the position fully, both that the act of Stryker was sustained, and that it was ratified and sanctioned in Washington city.

Mr. BRADBURY. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me, I will state that the fact adverted to by the Senator from Georgia, is contained in the latter portion of the letter which was read. That letter, which related to the receipt of the property of the Indians, also required that the previous assent of the Indians should be obtained and filed, in writing, and deposited with the Department.

There was another qualification in one of the other letters deserving of notice, which speaks of "whatever may be held by virtue of your office as trustee of the Indians;" thus limiting the application to such funds as may be, by virtue of his office as agent, intrusted to him, and which has no reference whatever to funds received in any other capacity. It related to those funds which went from the United States, and not to any funds which were intrusted to him either by the State of New York, or by the Indians themselves, for if he misapplied the funds derived from the State of New York, that State might be called upon to make reparation.

Mr. CASS. I understand that this is demanded as a deficiency by the War Department?

Mr. HUNTER. It is.

Mr. CASS. Then I shall vote for that appropriation.

Mr. HALE. That is right.

Mr. CASS. This is the last and feeble remnant of one band of the great tribe of Iroquois, who, at the time that our forefathers landed upon this continent, carried their victorious arms from Canada to Florida. We have driven them before the great tide of civilization west of the Mississippi to the forests and the prairies. We have got their country, and now gentlemen get up here and ask us to argue this point, as though we were arguing a suit for six and a quarter cents before some justice of the peace. Mr. President, I trust that it rests on higher and better principles and feelings. Here is an agent of the United States sent to them by the President of the United States, whom they call in their language, their "Great Father." He has got the money for which we all agree that we are responsible. He has also got their money from the State of New York, which was placed there by them for safe-keeping, and as they had been in the habit of doing for years and years.

Mr. BADGER. Ever since the year 1794.

Mr. CASS. And now I ask, if gentlemen are willing to place this on a principle so small? You have got their country; you have driven them from their native soil; your agent has got their money, and embezzled it, and you are bound to refund it. That is all there is about it.

Mr. BERRIEN. From the statement which has been presented to the Senate, and from the letter submitted by the honorable Senator from Arkansas, I am compelled to believe that this appropriation ought to be made by Congress.

The claim consists of moneys which had been embezzled by an agent of this Government, of two different descriptions: First, of money placed in his hands by this Government, for the purpose of discharging a debt due to the Indians. Secondly, of money which he had received from the Indians as their agent or trustee. In regard to the first, there can be no doubt that it was a debt due by the United States to the Indians; and the Government had endeavored to discharge it by placing money in the hands of their agent. He embezzled the money instead of paying it to the Indians. The Government is therefore responsible. In regard to the second, I doubt whether it is necessary to go into the general principles adverted to by the honorable Senator from Michigan. In my judgment there is a direct responsibility. If this Government had furnished Stryker with a letter of introduction to that people saying, "We send this man as our agent, for the purpose of transacting any matters that may occur between us, and we recommend him to you as a man in whom you may safely place confidence—under these circumstances, I apprehend, the failure of Stryker to discharge any trust reposed in him by the Indians would have involved the Government of the United States; and I ask what stronger letter of recommendation could have been given him than by constituting him their agent in these matters? I apprehend there is a distinct liability on that ground; but when I look at the letter submitted by the Senator from Arkansas, all doubts seem to vanish. The Government had been aware that there were funds belonging to these Indians held by the predecessors of Stryker; they required his predecessor to transfer these funds to him, and thereby constituted themselves the trustee of those Indians, and were responsible for the misconduct of the agent in their character as trustees.

I observe that reference is made to a section of that letter, by which the agent is directed to obtain the assent of the Indians, and to transmit the written evidence of that assent to the Department. That provision can have no effect as to the liability of the Government. It was directory on the part of the Government to their officer, who was constituted their agent for the purpose of executing this trust. In whatever possible view the subject is considered, it seems to me that the claim is just.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The next amendment is to strike out the words—

For compensation to three special agents, and four interpreters for the Indian tribes of Texas, and for the purchase of presents, and to negotiate with said Indians under instructions from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for their removal from that State to some designated unoccupied territory of the United States, $25,000.

Mr. RUSK. Before the question is taken on striking out, I wish to amend that portion, and I hope I may be able to suggest such emendations as will render that part of the bill acceptable. I propose to amend by striking the words "compensation to three special agents, and four interpreters for the Indian tribes of Texas, and for;" and further to amend by striking out the word "said," and insert the article "the," and also to insert after the words "Indians" the words "in Texas," so that when thus amended it will read as follows:

For the purchase of presents, and to negotiate with the Indians in Texas under instructions from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for their removal from that State to some designated unoccupied territory of the United States, $35,000.

Mr. BADGER. Will the Senator from Texas explain why these amendments are necessary or proper?

Mr. RUSK. I will, sir. As that portion of the bill now reads, it stands thus:

For compensation to three special agents and four interpreters for the Indian tribes of Texas, and for the purchase of presents, and to negotiate with said Indians under instructions from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for their removal from that State to some designated unoccupied territory of the United States, $25,000.

The special agents have been provided for in the annual appropriation bills, which amount is not expended. There was a bill passed by the last Congress, making permanent Indian agents, and in the next fiscal year we made an appropriation for their salaries; so that, so far as that matter is concerned, there is no necessity for this appropriation. With regard to the other, however, I consider that there is an important necessity. Sir, I suppose the explanation of the other amendment will more properly be made after the question has been taken on the first one.

Mr. HUNTER. I understand it is proposed to strike out the provision which relates to the three special agents and the four interpreters.

Mr. RUSK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BELL. Is that the proposition of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. RUSK. It is, sir.

The question was then taken on striking out the words "compensation to three special agents and four interpreters for the Indian tribes of Texas, and for;" and the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The next proposition of the Senator from Texas is to amend line 259, by striking out the word "said" and inserting the word "the;" and after the word "Indians," the words "in Texas."

Mr. RUSK. As I apprehend that the Finance Committee would not have proposed striking out this part of the bill if they had had the necessary information, I wish to give that explanation to the Senate.

There are a great many Indians, Mr. President, in the State of Texas who do not belong to that State. The Seminoles, and Creeks, and Cherokees, and portions of various other tribes of Indians, whose lands have been purchased and who have been moved west to lands given to them by the Government of the United States, have left these lands, and become intruders in Texas for a number of years past. The intercourse laws in relation to Indian tribes, which would apply to them in the territory to which they belong, do not apply to them in Texas; and for years past we have been obliged to submit to their depredations, without any sort of appeal to the intercourse laws in regard to Indian tribes. Now, it is clear and palpable injustice, that the United States should take these Indians, and either force them, or permit them, to settle down in our territory. They do us an immense mischief; and it is for the purpose of getting rid of them that we ask for this very small appropriation, and to negotiate with them to induce them to go back to their own tribes, and to the lands assigned to them by the Government of the United States, and to cease their intrusions upon us. All we ask for this is $25,000.

Mr. BADGER. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to ask him, if he strikes out these words, how the fund is to be administered?

Mr. RUSK. We have Indian agents there already, and, therefore, do not need others. They were provided for under the annual appropriations.

Mr. BELL. I would like to know if these gentlemen who are to have the management of this fund are the agents who have been there for two or three years?

Mr. RUSK. No, sir. Two of them have been appointed recently—one of them, a gentleman named Howard, has been appointed within the last few days. Another is a gentleman from Maryland, with whom I have not the pleasure of an acquaintance. These three Indian agents are there under the last annual appropriation, and they are capable men.

Mr. BELL. I understand that these funds are to go into their hands; but I do not understand the object of the amendment which was agreed to a moment ago.

Mr. RUSK. I will read that portion of the bill as I propose to amend it. It runs in these words:

For the purchase of presents, and to negotiate with the Indians in Texas, under instructions from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, for the removal from that State to some designated unoccupied territory of the United States, $25,000.

Mr. BELL. I would like to inquire if these refugee Indians, of the Creeks, Cherokees, Seminoles, or whoever they may be, have established places of residence, if they have villages in Texas? I have understood that a large portion of them, especially those who are so mischievous, are Indians who are beyond the control either of Texas or of any of their own tribes; that they are really outlaws who live a free and roving life, having fled from the Cherokees, Chickasaws, and Creeks. If this is so, we cannot control them any more than we can control the wild Camanches, who have always plundered the borders of Texas. I should be glad to have the honorable Senator from Texas, as I know he has well settled opinions on that subject, explain to us whether he supposes there will be any good resulting from further expenditure, with a view to that object. I think we have appropriated to this object heretofore large sums of money, for the purpose of enabling agents to treat with them. I think they have been threatened in those cases where they have been settled in villages with being driven off.

I make these inquiries in order to learn the views of the honorable Senator from Texas, who, I know, has examined this subject with his usual good sense and candor. I know that, by the amendment he has proposed, it is implied that he thinks there is some chance of effecting a valuable object. For my own part, in view of our past history in connection with this subject, and the efforts made to restrain the Indians both by Texas and the United States Government, it appears to me that we cannot expect any good result from holding conferences with them. They will receive this $25,000, or what remains after the agents are paid; they will profess every sort of friendship with their fathers, and a disposition to forbear hostilities upon the frontier; but they will only keep their pledges until they feel the impulses moving them on to make depredations, or until they become necessitous. I take it there must be some other policy than this to restrain these outlaws of the great tribes settled on our western frontier, as well as the Camanches; some policy to restrain, if possible, their inroads upon the frontiers besides that of an annual distribution of presents. For although they may not come in regular bands to murder and rob upon the frontiers, there are those among the bands who perpetrate these outrages, and who disclaim any interest with the bands. I wish the honorable Senator from Texas to state what are his views, whether we have any grounds to suppose that it is worth while to hold conferences and make treaties with them, and bestow presents upon these wandering bands of outlaw Indians, who cannot be restrained by the tribes themselves? If the Senator can give any reason for hoping that they may be removed from Texas, I shall be glad.

I would be glad if he would designate some territory of the United States upon which they may be located, where they will not be the robbing and murdering bands which they now are. Where will he place them? Will he place them on the western border of Missouri, or carry them to the borders of New Mexico, and let them unite with the other tribes there, the Navajos or the Camanches, or will he carry them further North? Nowhere is there any place where he can send them, where they will not cause the same annoyance to those persons settled on the frontiers of the United States. If he can suggest any place or point where, under the instructions of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, there is any probability of effecting his object, I will cheerfully go with him.

Mr. RUSK. I begin my explanation to the Senator—and I am sorry that I have no more time to make it—by stating that not one dollar has ever been appropriated by this Government, for the purpose of bringing back its roving Indians from their encroachment on our territories. And I can accompany that statement by another: that thousands of dollars have been appropriated by the Government of the United States, to put arms into the hands of those very Indians, to murder the women and children on the frontier of Texas, at the hour of midnight. For eighteen or twenty years those Indians have been encroaching on us.

I desire the attention of the Senator. There are some questions that he asked me, which I cannot answer. He asked where we are to remove these Indians? That is a question I cannot answer, except by saying that the United States had no right to thrust them on Texas. That is a question for the Government of the United States to consider.

I am necessarily compelled to be more concise on this subject than I could wish; for it is one that has been a source of annoyance to me for many years. In 1833 a treaty was entered into between the United States and Mexico, requiring the United States, on their pledged faith, to restrain these Indians, and prevent their encroachments on the territories of Mexico. But they went over in large bands—several thousands of the Cherokees, several thousands of the Kickapoos, and almost the entire Caddo nation, besides several other tribes—and commenced their depredations. The matter was brought to the attention of the Government of the United States, but nothing was said or done to remedy the evil. In 1835, in the face of that treaty—having the same provisions as the treaty which now exists between the United States and Mexico—the Government of the United States made a treaty with the Caddo Indians, one article of which was, that they were to leave the territories of the United States, and never to return to them again. There was no other territory to which they could go but that of Texas. And this was in the very teeth of the treaty, with its obligations binding on them, to protect Texas! It did more: another article bound the United States to pay $10,000 per annum to this tribe of Caddoe Indians. They immediately complied with the terms of the treaty, by removing from the territories of the United States, and settling down on those of Texas. And every day when their $10,000 became due, they came to the agent of the United States—for Texas was not then admitted into the Union—and they received their $10,000 donation in arms and ammunition; and scarcely traveled a hundred miles before they commenced their depredations—not on men, but on women and children—with the means you had furnished them. Sir, I speak what I know, and what I have seen.

Mr. BELL. What Indians were they?

Mr. RUSK. The Caddoes. These people are there now. They have settled in villages, and their chiefs have more influence than those of any other tribe. You have thrown them on us; and we now ask you to remove them, and give them a portion of your own territory. But not a single dollar has been appropriated for this purpose.

Mr. SHIELDS. There is no feeling on the part of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, as I understand him, to oppose this appropriation. I have a question in my mind in relation to this matter, which I propose to ask of the honorable Senator from Texas, and I hope he will treat it dispassionately. I would like to know whether the object of this is to remove, not the Indians who have gone in upon Texas from the territory of the United States, but the original Indians, living along the Rio Grande—some of them in little pueblos? I wish to know whether it is meant to apply to all the Indians now in Texas? for the honorable Senator knows very well that some of these Indians were in Texas before the whites, and are there still. If so, I would like to know it. And I would ask the same question which the honorable Senator from Tennessee propounded: Where are we to send these Indians? If we remove them out of Texas, and send them to New Mexico, shall we not be compelled to remove them out of New Mexico, and send them elsewhere? Now, there are along the Rio Grande tribes that are half civilized, that have their little towns and pueblos; and this provision will apply to them as well as to those bands who have gone in there—those refugees, as the Senator from Texas calls them.

I wish to vote for this appropriation, and, therefore, I would like to have a satisfactory answer to the question, where are they to be sent, and who are to be sent? Who are to be removed, and where are they to be removed? And if they become troublesome again, where are they then to be removed? Are we to continue to remove them until we get them into the Pacific?

Mr. RUSK. This is not an amendment of my own. It comes from the House of Representatives, suggested, evidently, by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. What purpose he has in view, it is impossible for me to tell. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to limiting it to the taking back of those Indians that properly belong to the United States.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is right. Confine it to them, and there will be no trouble.

Mr. RUSK. I have no objection to that at all. This amendment comes from the House of Representatives, and was asked for, I presume, by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I see that it is put under his control to enter into these negotiations. I will not detain the Senate longer. I shall have occasion hereafter to advert to this subject, and then I shall go into the whole matter from the beginning to the end. All that is asked here now, is a very small amount to be appropriated for the purpose of removing, or of entering into negotiations to remove, those Indians who are clearly not entitled to be there. If it is the policy of the Government of the United States—if it is the policy of this Senate—when they have troublesome Indians, to thrust them upon us because we have some territory, and to take no sort of steps to remove them, or to defend the frontier against their depredations, the Senate may strike out the amendment. That is all.

Mr. BELL. I do not think the remarks of the honorable Senator from Texas answer my suggestions at all. I have often heard him allude to the facts which he has alluded to to-day, with a good deal of feeling then, as now; but I have no feeling upon this subject. This is the remnant of an old quarrel which remains here between Texas, as an independent State, and the United States. I do not remember the article alluded to in the Caddoe treaty; but I think it is very likely to be what the honorable Senator has stated it to be. If there be any such article in the treaty, it is certainly an improper and an unneighborly one towards Texas or Mexico, whichever might then be regarded as being on our frontier. But I deny that it has ever been, within my recollection, the policy of the Government of the United States—I mean a policy recognized and acted upon—to send the Indians out of our territory into that of any of our neighbors. That treaty may have been a departure from the policy, and may have passed the Senate of the United States without reference to the policy of intruding the Indian tribes upon our neighbors.

My remarks before were based upon the hypothesis that the honorable Senator sought this appropriation for the purpose of removing back to some other territory of the United States these Creeks, and Cherokees, and Seminoles, as well as other lawless bands of Indians. I think the honorable Senator, in his first remarks, alluded to them. I heard then no reference made to the remnant of the Caddoe Indians, that had been settled in villages. I had always understood that they were a peaceable, and rather an imbecile, and not a warlike tribe of Indians at all. If they have become so, I think it must have been since they founded themselves in a part of the territory of Texas; and that, by uniting with the Comanches and the refugee Cherokees, Creeks, and Seminoles, they may have had their original habits deteriorated, and may have become robbers. I did not understand that this appropriation was asked for the removal of the Caddoes on the ground of the national courtesy between the two nations at the time the stipulations of the treaty were entered into. But even in regard to that, if the appropriation is to apply to the Caddoes, while I am willing, if that be the object, to vote this appropriation, yet I doubt very much the practicability of removing them out of the territory of Texas. It may be that some of them, in the western part of Texas, may have found the most suitable home for themselves—certainly I know of no other more suitable. If you take them northwest of the Cherokees, Choctaws, and Chickasaws, as they are now settled, you take them upon Indian territory, or territory applied to the outlet of those tribes. If you take them still further north, you bring them in contact with the western frontiers—with the white settlements. So, then, I can perceive no probable good result from this appropriation.

In regard to the general policy of the Government towards Texas, I consider that the Government of the United States, in virtue of the guardianship which it assumes over the Indian tribes, and the powers which it claims of directing intercourse with the Indian tribes upon the great policy of preserving peace on the frontier, is bound to remove all those Indians as speedily as may be, with safety and with propriety to the people. And whenever there is a proper demand by the growing population of the State of Texas, this Government is bound, furthermore, in virtue of the same power which it has assumed to control the affairs of the Indian tribes, to preserve them in peaceable relations with the people of Texas as far as it is in its power to do so. I understand that this is the policy of this Government, now recognized as being proper. We expend hundreds of thousands of dollars annually for the purpose of preserving peace upon the frontiers of Texas against these Indians. I understand, indeed, that it is done but very ineffectually; that murders and robberies are still committed; and that they would be committed, if there was no Creek, nor Choctaw, nor refugee Seminole, nor Caddoe, within the territory of Texas. Will the honorable Senator deny it? Would there have been peace and quiet? Would there have been no plundering, no robberies, no murders of women and children on the frontiers of Texas, but for these Indians having been thrown into that territory by the Government of the United States?

Mr. RUSK. I conscientiously believe there would not.

Mr. BELL. I cannot deny that that is the Senator's belief. But whence the accounts we daily receive from the Rio Grande, of bands of Comanches making inroads into that country, carrying off horses and cattle? Some of those desperate and warlike Seminole chiefs have thrown themselves upon that country, and become the leaders of these hostile Indians. Now, can we repress those bands? Does the honorable Senator suppose we have it in our power to hang or to shoot "Wild Cat," unless we have him in our power?

Mr. RUSK. We had him once.

Mr. BELL. Yes; but we cannot catch him again. Nor is it a very easy thing to catch any of those desperate leaders who fled from the United States. The policy of the United States, and its duty to Texas, is to defend that frontier; and whenever we can find territory to which to remove these Indians, to make treaties with them—not at the expense of $25,000, but at an expense of $500,000, or even of $1,000,000, in one bill, or even a larger sum, to get rid of them. Although these tribes are not large, it would be economical for the United States to appropriate three or four millions at once, if you could effect the object of removing these Indians altogether from the territory of Texas by that amount; because, in four or five years, it will cost us that sum to keep them in order.

My interrogatories to the Senator from Texas were with a view to have him satisfy us—to satisfy the Senate—or that, in regard to my own course, he might give me some reasonable expectation that the object of removing these Indians would be effected by voting these $25,000. Seeing, however, that the honorable Senator manifests so much feeling and solicitude about the matter, I am not disposed to vote against it, even if he gives no other reason for it, because I see that his heart is in it. I presume him to be perfectly patriotic; and though his grounds may not altogether satisfy me, yet I will trust him as a Senator and representative from that part of the country, for the conclusion that it may conduce to some good result, and relieve the frontier of Texas.

Mr. SHIELDS. To accomplish the object which the honorable Senator from Texas has in view, and which I think is a very proper object, and to make the amendment clear and definite, I move to add after the word "Indians," the words "in Texas, who have been intruded into that State from the territories of the United States." That, I presume, will accomplish the object in view.

Mr. HUNTER. I understand that the Senator from Texas agrees to restrict the amendment so as to apply it only to the Indians forced into Texas by the Government of the United States. That being done, I hope that we shall pass the item.

The amendment of Mr. SHIELDS was agreed to.

Mr. ATCHISON. I now propose to strike out, after the word "State," the words "to some designated unoccupied territory of the United States."

I wish to make this amendment for this reason: It is obvious that those Indians who have intruded themselves into Texas from the territories of the United States, should be removed from Texas. There are two ways of getting them out of Texas. One is by negotiation, as proposed here; the other is by the use of the United States troops and the Texas rangers. We can make an effort to negotiate them out, at an expense of $25,000, or $50,000, or $100,000, if necessary. If they cannot be got out in that way, then the other means of forcing them out must be resorted to. If the words which I propose to strike out, are stricken out, it will then leave it with the United States to restore the Seminoles, who have intruded themselves into Texas, to the territory belonging to them; and to restore the Cherokees to the Cherokee country, the Delawares to the Delaware country, and the Kickapoos to the Kickapoo country. It will leave the Government of the United States to purchase them out of Texas, and restore them to their own tribes; or, if that cannot be done, then, as I said before, resort must be had to the sabre and the rifle.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. The question now is on striking out that portion of the bill recommended to be stricken out by the Committee on Finance, as it has been amended.

Mr. HUNTER. As the clause has been amended, there is no object in striking it out. I believe that, as amended, it is right.

The PRESIDENT. The question must be taken.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I would like to have the section proposed to be stricken out read as it has been amended on the motion of the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Illinois.

It was accordingly read, as follows:

"For compensation to three special agents and four interpreters for the Indian tribes of Texas, and for the purchase of presents, and to negotiate with said Indians in Texas who have been intruded into that State from the territories of the United States, under instructions from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, for their removal from that State, $25,000.

Mr. BADGER. As the clause now reads, it would seem to imply that these Indians had been instructed to go there by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to transpose the words "under instructions from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs," so as to insert them immediately after the word "negotiate," and to strike out also "Commissioner of Indian Affairs," and insert "Secretary of the Interior," so that the clause will read:

"For compensation to three special agents and four interpreters for the Indian tribes of Texas, and for the purchase of presents, and to negotiate, under instructions from the Secretary of the Interior, with said Indians in Texas who have been intruded into that State," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BORLAND. I now move to amend the clause proposed to be stricken out, so as to strike out the words, "and for the purchase of presents." I think the power to negotiate is sufficient. I have always thought this giving of presents was an objectionable feature in our legislation. I have looked upon it as paying tribute, pretty much the same as we formerly paid tribute to the piratical tribes on the Mediterranean.

Mr. CASS. I merely wish to inquire precisely what is to be the object and effect of this proposition. Is it meant that, under the power to negotiate, presents may be given? If that is meant, what is gained by not saying so? If it is proper to give presents, it is proper to say so.

Mr. BORLAND. I do not like to make a confession that we are to buy peace.

Mr. RUSK. There is no Indian treaty, to my knowledge, that has not contained a clause for the giving of presents.

Mr. CASS. I think it would be better to retain the clause; because, if it is stricken out, it may impose some difficulty on the Department.

Mr. BORLAND. In order to satisfy gentlemen, I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT. The question is now upon agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Finance, to strike out the clause as it has been amended.

The motion to strike out was not agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to add to the clause, "for continuing the collection and for publishing the statistics and other information authorized by the act of 3d March, 1847, and subsequent acts, $17,000," this proviso:

Provided, That the work shall be completed in five volumes, and that at least one volume shall be published in each year until the whole series of five volumes shall be finished.

Mr. BADGER. I should like to hear some explanation of that proviso.

Mr. HUNTER. This proviso was put in after consultation with the Department of the Interior. I addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Interior; but he had been called away. I then went to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; and, after consultation with him, I found that the work would probably be finished in five volumes, and at the rate of one volume a year.

Mr. BORLAND. I would like to ask the honorable Senator from Virginia if he knows the amount of money that will have to be paid for these books? What will the five volumes cost?

Mr. HUNTER. I think they will cost about $20,000 a volume for the publication and printing, exclusive of the salary of Mr. Schoolcraft, and, perhaps, one clerk. I am not aware whether one or two clerks are employed. I can hardly give the Senator all the information he desires now, but I can do it by to-morrow morning.

Mr. BORLAND. I certainly have had a good deal of gratification in examining the two volumes of this work which have been published. It is the most beautiful piece of work that I have ever seen in my life. I believe the world cannot furnish such a piece of typography as we have in this book; but I have not examined its contents with sufficient care to be enabled to pronounce an opinion satisfactory to myself in regard to it. I am inclined to think, however, that we may draw the distinction here which was drawn in the criticism of several works, between a work that is very beautifully got up, and a work which is, in itself, not very beautiful; or, to express the idea more clearly, perhaps I had better repeat a criticism that was applied to a book of poems some years ago. In a criticism upon a certain poetical work that was published in our country a few years ago, a remark was made that it was a very beautiful book of poems. Such was the announcement of the critic. The question was asked whether the term "beautiful" applied to the book or to the poetry? Here is certainly a very beautiful book; a magnificent book as a piece of book-making; but can any one tell whether the book contains anything that is really valuable or not?

Mr. BADGER. It contains some beautiful pictures.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes, sir, very beautiful; and the typography is more beautiful. I believe it is the best specimen of typography that the world has ever produced.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator desires it, I can now furnish him the information. I have here a statement of the cost of this work. The amount expended in the course of the last five years has been $39,361. That is independent of this deficiency. Here is a letter in which there is a statement of that deficiency. The Department states that this work can be completed in five volumes.

Mr. WHITCOMB. From whom is the letter?

Mr. HUNTER. From the Department of the Interior, to which I addressed inquiries about the matter.

Mr. BORLAND. We have here, then, a statement about equivalent to what the Senator said before as to the cost of the volumes. He said—and this statement now proves it—that they would cost about $20,000 a volume; so that the whole work will cost $100,000. Can any one say, from examination of the work, or from his knowledge of the materials, that it is worth that, or will be worth one half of that? Of what does it consist? It does not consist of matters which are necessary for our legislation. It adds nothing to the scientific knowledge of the country; but it consists of speculations upon what we may call, I suppose, the romance of the history of the red men of this country. It does not state anything beyond mere speculations. It states nothing that can be relied upon with any great degree of confidence; but it consists of certain philosophical speculations upon the character, and condition, and probable fate in the future of the various Indian tribes of our country. It may be very valuable, but I do not think that we have such assurances of its value as will justify us in expending $100,000 in its publication. For one, I am not satisfied to that extent, and for that reason I shall be unwilling to continue it. The books are very beautiful. I have received the different volumes, and I have examined them with a great deal of interest; but I have not discovered in them that character, kind, and amount of information which I think would repay us for the money we propose to expend in the publication of the work.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, having arrived, in the progress of our investigations and inquiries into the amendments proposed by the committee to this bill, at the stage at which we now are, it seems to me there could be no more fitting occasion for the Senate to adjourn. We cannot get through the bill this evening.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope we shall not now adjourn. We may get through all the amendments but the last—that in relation to the Collins line of steamers, which I know will be debated. The others, I think, can be adopted without much debate.

Mr. BADGER. There is a previous amendment which the Senate has not yet reached, which I wish to debate. It is one which undertakes, by act of Congress, to regulate what the officers of the Senate shall do.

Mr. HUNTER. When we get to that, I shall ask the Senate to let it lie over, for reasons which I shall state.

Mr. BADGER. There is only one formal amendment between the one we are now on and that.

Mr. HUNTER. I think we had better get through with them before we adjourn.

Mr. BADGER. We can accomplish nothing by sitting here any longer. It is a dark and a dismal day. The feelings of everybody are depressed, and after the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas as to this book of "pictures," [laughter,] or this romance of history, as he called it—I should rather say history of romance—I do not think we can get to the question. As I do not believe we can get to a vote upon the amendment to-day, and as it is a fit time to adjourn, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER asked for the yeas and nays upon the motion; and they were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bell, Berrien, Brooke, Cass, Clarke, Cooper, Davis, Dawson, Felch, Fish, Geyer, Hale, Mangum, Miller, Morton, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Smith, Spruance, Sumner, and Upham—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Borland, Bradbury, Brodhead, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Downs, Gwin, Hamlin, Hunter, James, Jones of Iowa, King, Norris, Underwood, Wade, and Whitecomb—17.

So the motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 20, 1852.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

The SPEAKER has appointed the following gentlemen as the select committee to whom has been referred the existing laws and orders on the subject of the public printing, viz: Messrs. MARSHALL of Kentucky, HARRIS of Alabama, CHANDLER, FULLER of Maine, and HAMILTON.

The SPEAKER announced as the first business in order the consideration of the bill of the Senate to enforce discipline and promote good conduct in the Navy of the United States.

CLOSE OF DEBATE ON HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I rise to a privileged question; and that is, to move the usual resolution, to close the debate on the homestead bill, which has been the special order since the first of March—more than seven weeks—when there are ten general appropriation bills of this Government to be considered; and if we give but a week to each of those bills, it will take us until August to get through. I would move to close the debate to-morrow, at one o'clock; but if gentlemen are anxious for a little more time, I will allow them until Thursday, but I cannot allow them more than that. I offer the usual resolution, to close the debate on the homestead bill on Thursday next, at one o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The gentleman from Arkansas seems to manifest some anxiety in relation to the termination of this debate, and while manifesting that anxiety, he indicates to the House that he has this thing entirely under his control, and that he will allow—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I have not indicated any such thing. I am in favor of the passage of the homestead bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman to say that he would allow us more time.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I meant so far as my motion was concerned.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I wish to say that but very little of the time of the House has actually been consumed in the discussion of this subject.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Fifteen days, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Not at all.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I say, sir, that fifteen days have already been devoted to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes that gentlemen will recollect that this is not a debatable question.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I do not propose to debate it.

The SPEAKER. If the House will indulge the gentlemen, the Chair will be very happy to hear them.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to inquire of the Clerk how many days have been devoted to this bill.

Mr. STANLY. I want to get on with the public business, and therefore I must object to this discussion.

Mr. ALLISON. Several gentlemen here are anxious to be heard upon this subject. I hope they will be heard, and that the debate will not be thus summarily closed. [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"] It is true that this bill has been before the House for a very long time.—[Loud cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Debate is out of order.

Mr. McMULLIN. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. A motion to close the debate on the homestead bill on Thursday next, at one o'clock.

Mr. SMART. Oh! withdraw it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I never will, while there is so much of the public business to be done.

Mr. McMULLIN moved to amend the resolution by striking out "Thursday" and inserting "Monday" in lieu thereof.

I beg the indulgence of the House to say one word in reply to the argument of the gentleman—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. It is the duty of the Chair to enforce the rule; and he begs the indulgence of the House in saying that debate is out of order upon this question, and cannot be allowed by the Chair.

Mr. McMULLIN. It is not out of order for me to speak, any more than it was for gentlemen over the way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is out of order, and will take his seat.

Mr. McMULLIN. But it was not out of order for the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] to—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is out of order. The Chair did call the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. JOHNSON] and other gentlemen to order. He cannot permit any further debate.

Mr. ORR demanded the previous question; and on the question, Is there a second to the demand?

Mr. CLINGMAN called for tellers; which were ordered.

Mr. SWEETSER. Is it in order to move to lay the resolution of the gentleman from Arkansas upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It is in order.

Mr. SWEETSER. I make that motion.

Mr. HOUSTON demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the question being taken, the result was—yeas 108, nays 52; as follows:

PUBLIC EXECUTIONS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. FICKLIN. I now ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up the Senate bill, which passed that body and came here yesterday, to do away with public executions.

As I understand it, a man by the name of William Wells was convicted of murder, and sentenced to be hung. That sentence is to be executed on Friday next. If there is no objection upon the part of the House, I desire, at the request of numerous citizens of this District, that that bill be taken up, and that the sense of the House shall be taken upon it, without delay.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object.

DISCIPLINE IN THE NAVY.

Mr. PRICE. I would inquire of the Chair, if the first business in order is not that in reference to the enforcement of discipline in the Navy?

The SPEAKER. That is the first business. There is a motion pending to recommit the bill, and there are also sundry amendments pending.

Mr. PRICE. Well, sir, I claim the floor upon it.

Mr. ORR. I desire to ask the gentleman to waive his right to the floor for the present, that we may have one hour devoted to the call of committees for reports.

Mr. PRICE. I desire to inquire of the Chair if the consideration of this bill is not confined to the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. It is only the regular order for the morning hour.

Mr. PRICE. I shall probably occupy the whole of that hour, or nearly so.

Mr. ORR. I do not desire, by any means, to deprive the gentleman from New Jersey of the floor, but I would suggest that, by unanimous consent, one hour be devoted to receiving reports from committees, and that then the gentleman shall have his hour to speak upon the Navy bill.

Mr. PRICE. I have no objection, if the House will agree to that.

The SPEAKER. This bill constitutes a portion of the business for the morning hour, and, as unfinished business, will take precedence of the calling of committees for reports.

Mr. ORR. But, by unanimous consent, the morning hour could be extended so that we could have one hour for each, could it not?

The SPEAKER. It could, with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. ORR. Then I hope it will be given.

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I desire to say, that I am anxious, as the House knows very well, to arrive at some conclusion upon this bill. I am disposed to accommodate the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. ORR,] and I shall not object to the arrangement he proposes, if the House agree to it. But I desire, at an early period, to have some definite action upon this bill, and to have it disposed of in some way or other.

Mr. RANTOUL. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to ask that the gentleman from New Jersey, and the House, will allow me to make a personal explanation. It will take but two or three minutes.

Mr. STANLY. From public considerations I am compelled to object. The gentleman, perhaps, will not take up more time than he says, but somebody will want to reply to him. Let the gentleman publish his explanation.

Mr. RANTOUL. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection. My explanation will need no reply, because it does not reflect upon anybody in this House.

Mr. STANLY. This species of explanation is a great abuse of the public time. I feel it to be my duty to object.

Mr. PRICE said: Mr. Speaker, from my long association with the Navy, I naturally feel a lively interest in any measure or law relating in any way to that branch of our country's service; and particularly do I regard the bill now under consideration as important to the well-being of the Navy, and in consequence is depending its value and worth to the country, as the efficiency of the Navy depends entirely upon its discipline.

I have not lost the attachment, regard, and sympathy created whilst associated with those brave, noble, and generous sailors constituting the right arm of our country's defense. They expect me, sir, to raise my voice here, whenever any measure is before this House that so intimately affects them, as I am the most immediate and direct representative of the Navy has ever had upon this floor; and whatever views I may express here, believe me, sir, will be the honest convictions of my mind, drawn from my knowledge and experience of naval affairs, derived from ten years' service, as best calculated to promote harmony and good feeling on board our national ships, and tend most to elevate the officer and the man. I regret, sir, that the obligation has not fallen upon one more experienced and capable than myself. Without any eloquence or powers of rhetoric, I fear that I shall not do the subject justice; that I shall disappoint my old associates, for all I shall say will be said in simple and plain terms, and, I fear, fail in enlisting any feeling upon this subject, or creating any sympathy for our gallant Navy. The indifference exhibited here upon all naval matters almost forbade my saying one word upon a subject I consider of the first importance to the country; so chilling and paralyzing is the air of this House upon naval matters, that the honorable chairman of the Naval Committee [Mr. STANTON] tells you that he is discouraged in the hope of anything being done for the Navy.

Now, sir, the title of this bill is unpretending, and may seem to most members unimportant in comparison to the political speeches which are daily made here to the exclusion, postponement, or delay of this and other legitimate business before this House—a practice that is indulged in in Committee of the Whole, which, in my humble opinion, is wrong, against the rule, and depreciating the character of this House before the country and the world. We were not sent here to make presidential speeches, and waste the time and money of the people in expressing our personal preferences, or advocating the claims of candidates for the Presidency. Our constituents do, and have a right to complain of such irregularities in our proceedings. Nor has the National Legislature to do with the local, State, or sectional differences of party, which have been brought in here this session, and so openly and fully discussed, with such a great consumption of time. I solemnly enter my protest against such abuse, and mean thereby to exonerate myself from any censure which may be cast for allowing debate irrelevant to the subject under discussion.

But, sir, let us reflect upon the object of the bill before us—to enforce discipline and promote good conduct in the Navy. Is this a subject to be treated indifferently or lightly? Is naval discipline unimportant? Is not the power, efficiency, and value of your Navy dependent upon its discipline? And is not the Navy the surest standard of a nation's greatness and power? And, sir, if we continue to trace this chain of reasoning, we will find that naval discipline is one of the keystones of the arch upon which our grandeur as a nation rests, and is to be maintained. Unless discipline is maintained, we had better sink our ships and save the annual cost of our Navy, which is $6,000,000 or $7,000,000; for without discipline the Navy is only calculated to bring dishonor and disgrace upon our flag; and with discipline, it is our country's shield and glory. Sir, by good conduct and good discipline, our Navy has won imperishable renown, and added a golden empire to the area of freedom. We are now the first naval and maritime power on the globe. The victories won by our ocean steamers, and the yacht America, and the performance of our clipper ships, have fully attested our superiority on the ocean, and the truth of what is well and truly said by the poet:

"The empire of the sea has passed away from Albion's shore; Columbia rules the ocean now—Britannia ruled of yore."

The importance of maintaining discipline in the Navy is in the prospective still more important; for in the progress and spread of republican principles, they are sure to come in conflict with the monarchical principles of the Old World, and many sanguinary battles are to be fought upon the ocean before the great truth is acknowledged by the Powers of Europe, that man is capable of self-government. The necessity of keeping our Navy well prepared to meet such a crisis, which is inevitable, is most apparent. Her career must be the most conspicuous; and in any contest, the Navy, if she is appreciated and sustained properly by Congress, I can foretell, will reflect the brightest victory which the historian has yet recorded, and continue to promote and extend Democratic republican principles and government. I hope, sir, I may impart some of my feelings and views and enthusiasm to this House.
